Our Queen left Osborne for Windsor last week, and on Tuesday came to Buckingham Palace—her London home—there to hold a Drawing Room, the last of the season. It was very fully attended indeed. The Prince of Wales was present, but not the Princess. The Princess Christian, the Queen's youngest married daughter, and her husband accompanied Her Majesty, also Princess Louisa and Princess Beatrice. Princess Beatrice is only eleven, and, of course, was the youngest lady present; debutantes are not presented until they are at least seventeen, this being accounted a preliminary step to an introduction to society. Her Royal Highness wore a white tulle dress, over white silk, caught up with apple-blossoms; she does not wear a train, being so young, and appears in quite a short dress, her long hair floating about her shoulders, crêpé and confined by a band of green velvet across the head, with a bunch of apple-blossoms on one side. The Princess Louisa looked wonderfully well in a green moire train trimmed with silver, worn over a petticoat of white tulle caught up here and there with chatelaines of green leaves. Her head-dress was composed of green leaves interspersed with diamonds, pearls, and, of course, feathers, and a long tulle veil—an indispensable part of a Court costume; she is the only marriageable Princess we have among us, and it has been much talked about here that the Crown Prince of Denmark is to be her husband. If there is any truth in the report it is not by any means finally arranged, and the papers have been authorized to correct the assertion that the young couple are positively engaged; but where there is smoke there is generally a little fire, and it is very probable that we shall hear more of this by-and-by.

As I have detailed the dress of her younger sisters, I think I ought to tell you what Princess Christian wore, especially as her toilette was very magnificent. It consisted of a train of white and gold brocade, and a petticoat of white silk trimmed with Honiton lace and gold braid and tassels. The so-called petticoat is, you know, the dress, or at all events the dress skirt, the train and the body being alike, the train coming from the waist to nearly the front of the dress, and is generally caught back with bunches of flowers and rosettes of ribbon. Sometimes, however—and this fashion was more adopted on the last occasion than usual—the trains are worn from the shoulders, whence they fall in heavy folds after the manner of the old sacque dresses of Queen Anne's time. In this case the body and the petticoat are alike, and the train a thing by itself; this way of wearing it gives a very commanding and regal appearance to a fine, handsome woman, but is very heavy-looking and unbecoming to little people.

Of late years the Drawing Rooms have been thinly attended, but on Tuesday there were three hundred presentations and more than a thousand people present, all ladies except two hundred gentlemen, who are only allowed to appear when accompanying female members of their families. As a rule gentlemen can not be presented at Drawing Rooms; there are exceptions, however, especially in the diplomatic circles, and I see that a distinguished citizen of the United States, Mr. George Peabody, presented by the Secretary of State, proved the exception this time.

It is a very imposing sight to watch the crowd of carriages in their gorgeous liveries—most of them spick and span new, in honor of the occasion—making their way down the Mall, facing Buckingham Palace. On Tuesday the line began to form about one, and when the reception commenced at three half the people were not set down; indeed a good many left the palace before others reached it. The Queen only remained three-quarters of an hour, and the company were then received by Princess Christian; this was a great disappointment to many. The show of diamonds and costly lace was great and brilliant. The newest shade of color worn was a light tea-rose shade, very delicate, but neither becoming nor wonderfully pretty. Green was more generally adopted than any other shade; indeed, green is the color worn by our belles on all occasions now. The old styles of dress of the Louis XIV., XV., and XVI. periods, a little modified to suit our modern tastes, are coming into vogue as quickly as possible, and most becoming they are too.

Every body seemed to look pretty at the Drawing Room; the hair was worn turned off the face, with enormous chignons at the back, and great high puffs and rolls of hair at the top of the head; in front of which bunches of flowers, tiaras, and the like, were arranged, all with the view of giving as much height to the head-dress as possible. Long curls on each side, and sometimes falling in a shower at the back, were also worn. But the great features of the toilettes were the height to which the hair was dressed at the top of the head, and how very closely our beauties seemed to have tried to copy the appearance of their great-grandmothers. The dresses are worn wonderfully low for England, where, as a nation, we set our faces against such fashions. They were unbecomingly low, too, especially at the back, and the short sleeves were mere shoulder-straps. A profusion of necklaces, consisting of several rows of beads, are worn, and chains from which twelve or fourteen lockets are suspended; but not content with these, in addition to them (for they fall somewhat low on the collar-bone) satin ribbon about an inch wide, the color of the dress, is tied tightly round the throat with one locket suspended from it, or sometimes it is studded with jeweled buttons or beads, after the manner of the so-called "dog-collars" much in vogue here three or four years ago. In most cases these are tied with long loops and streamers at the back; but a new style called the "Watteau" is being introduced, viz., a little piquante bow just in front of the throat, from which the locket hangs.

On the morrow the Queen, who had remained all night in London (she so rarely does this now that it is quite a great event, and consequently a good deal talked about among us), laid the foundation-stone of St. Thomas's Hospital.

The Prince of Wales had largely patronized St. Bartholomew's Hospital, of which he is a Governor, and every exertion was used by the Governors of St. Thomas's to induce the Queen to befriend them, and, in consequence of their solicitations, her Majesty graciously consented to lay the foundation-stone of their new edifice. Disraeli and his wife were there and were loudly cheered. Indeed Peers and Commons, distinguished doctors, and distinguished people of all kinds were present. The ceremony took place about twelve, and the streets were thronged, and every body seemed pressing toward the great attraction of the moment as early as nine o'clock.

The hours of waiting were whiled away by the band of the Grenadier Guards, and of course there was plenty to amuse one in the company and the place. The architect, Mr. Henry Curry, had the honor of handing the trowel to the Queen, when the mortar had to be spread by the royal hand; a trowel of such elaborate workmanship, with a carved crystal handle, inlaid with gold and turquoise, the blade solid silver, that poor mundane mortar must have been sadly humiliated by the contrast.

As usual, her Majesty appeared in the deepest mourning, and her sombre dress made her all the more conspicuous amidst the brilliant coloring on all sides. A loyal address was first read by the President, Sir John Musgrove, and the Queen presented him in return with a written reply, which was not read, and then the actual ceremony began. Her Majesty left the dais and advanced toward the stone, a square block of granite, suspended by pulleys and surmounted by flags. The formal laying of stones all the world over, I suppose, alike. Our Queen has performed the act so often that she does it now in quite a masterly fashion. A jar, containing copies of the charters granted by Edward VI., together with the current coins of the present reign, was first deposited by the royal hands in a cavity prepared for it in the stone; then the mortar was spread; the stone lowered by unseen means, as though by magic, amidst a flourish of trumpets; its accuracy was tested by a plummet and line; the Queen tapped it three times with a silver mallet, and the thing was done.

In conclusion the Archbishop of Canterbury prayed for a blessing on the undertaking with great fervency and reverence, and in a few seconds the royal party were gone, and the crowd dispersed far more quickly than they had come.

A great man, who has almost outlived his generation, has but recently passed from among us. On the 7th of May, at the ripe age of ninety, Lord Brougham died, gently and peacefully sleeping away into the new life, the rare privilege of old age. For some years past he has been in the habit of spending each winter at his beautiful villa at Cannes, in the south of France, called Eleanor Louise, after his last surviving child, for whom it was built, and who there died. "Inveni Portam," I have found a haven, were the words inscribed over the portals of his home; and indeed he seems to have found there a most pleasant resting-place. His brother, William Brougham, and his wife—now Lord and Lady Brougham, for by special decree the title was allowed to pass to his brother—lived with him. His advanced age has of late told much upon him, all his old pursuits were abandoned, and he spent the greater part of the day driving about in his comfortable carriage. This he did the very day he died; no one noticed the slightest change in him; he went to bed as usual; but when his servant came to him, the last thing before himself retiring to rest, he found that he was gone.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

THE visit of the Chinese Embassy to this country awakens new interest in the entire nation. The peculiar customs and habits of the Chinese will doubtless be somewhat modified, in the course of years, by freer intercourse with other nations. The time may even come when women will be regarded among them as worthy of some consideration and respect. At present, however, their condition is very servile, as may be inferred from one of their proverbs: "The girl is subject to her parents, the wife to her husband, the mother to her son." A daughter is regarded as a burden in the family, and is kept in seclusion until her marriage. She is treated as a servant, and her whole education consists in learning to cook and to sew. The Chinese woman is not consulted in regard to her marriage; she does not know her future husband—perhaps has never heard his name. Among the wealthy the married women are carefully secluded, going abroad only in sedan chairs, by special permission from their lords. The lower classes enjoy a certain kind of liberty, which is dearly purchased by the hard labor to which they are condemned. It is said that the grotesque paintings of Chinese women which have come to this country are mere caricatures—that many of them have the complexion and characteristic beauty of the Creoles—a small and beautiful hand, pretty teeth, superb black hair, and slender waists. Of course they have small feet; and it is one of the "Celestial Sayings" that "the tongues of women increase by all that they take from their feet."

There certainly should be some severe penalty inflicted upon persons who "for fun" point firearms—loaded or unloaded—at their companions and neighbors. Every little while a supposed unloaded gun, pointed at somebody in sport, is discharged, and murder is done. A Missouri paper gives an account of an "accident" which recently happened in the vicinity of Pennville. A young man went with his rifle to the school-house, where a number of young people were assembled to rehearse for an exhibition. While on the way he pointed his gun at several persons whom he met, saying playfully, "Look-out, or I'll shoot you." On entering the school-house he repeated his miserable joke, although assured by some that such actions were not very agreeable. At length, by a sudden movement, the rifle was discharged, the ball entering the head of a young man, who instantly fell and expired. The author of this fatal practical joke, horror-stricken, fled into the woods. Nobody ever wants to see a gun pointed at himself, even if assured that it is not loaded; and he who will amuse himself at the expense of another's comfort, and at the possible risk of another's life, is not only wicked, but contemptibly mean.

At Genoa the Princess Marguerite was received in a novel and charming manner. At the railway station, ranged along one side of the platform, were three hundred young girls of the working-class, all dressed in white, with tulle veils. As the Princess descended from her carriage they began to sing a cantata composed in her honor. The Princess seemed much gratified, especially when one of the prettiest damsels presented her with a magnificent bouquet. Scarcely had the royal party left the station before a perfect rain of flowers commenced upon the carriage containing the Prince and herself. From the balconies and topmost stories of the houses rose leaves were so thickly cast upon them as to quite fill the air.

For some weeks past the flower markets of Paris have been overflowing with spring flowers of all kinds. There are six extensive flower markets there, besides shops innumerable where they are sold, and itinerant vendors of bouquets on nearly every corner of the streets. It is roughly estimated that $5,000,000 are annually expended in flowers by the people of Paris, of which no less than $80,000 are spent in the purchase of lilacs.

"My dear," said a lady to her six-year-old child, who did not seem specially impressed by the magnificent view of Trenton Falls which they had come to see, "why don't you look at the Falls? You don't seem to care any thing about seeing them." "But, mamma," replied the child, glancing at the bunches of sweet blue violets she had been plucking by the way, and which were clasped in her hands, "I didn't come to see the Falls; I came to see the flowers." So it is. Little children love flowers, and birds, and quiet running water, and all things that are sweet and simple—especially flowers. Their delight in bright blossoms is charming to witness, and is a healthful pleasure which every mother may well foster. Let each little one have a little flower-bed, or at least a few plants, for its own, to water, to weed, and to pluck. Give a little instruction as to the care of the plants—not too much by words, however—make gardening a genuine recreation, and it will naturally become a great help in the physical, mental, and moral development of the child. Those who live in the country have the advantage of plenty of ground; but even in the city a small spot can be found which will be quite satisfactory to the children.

A curious marriage-custom is related of the Nestorians. After the ceremony is performed, the wedding-party go in wagons to the house of the bridegroom's parents. The bride occupies one wagon alone, and when that reaches the gate of the house the bridegroom's mother comes to meet it with a baby and three suits of baby clothes in her arms. She throws the child and the clothes into the arms of the bride, who is required to undress and dress the baby three times in the presence of her mother-in-law, who watches every movement as only a mother-in-law can watch a daughter-in-law. If the newly-made bride does not perform the operation to the satisfaction of her severe judge she is considered unfit for her new position, the wagon is turned around, and she is taken back home for further instruction, and the poor bridegroom is compelled to live in single blessedness until his wife is educated up to the proper standard.

A case of suspended animation occurred in Cleveland, Ohio, a short time since. A young lady had been dangerously ill with what the physician pronounced typhoid fever. She rallied, however, and, under careful nursing and skillful treatment, was in a fair way to recover, when she had a relapse, and sank rapidly, until the breath seemed to leave her body and she was pronounced a corpse. Preparations were made for the funeral; but her mother could not believe her dead, and fancied she perceived warmth about the body. But every effort to resuscitate her failing, the funeral day was appointed, about a week after her supposed death. The day before that fixed for the burial, while one of the neighbors and the mother were standing by the side of the supposed corpse, the door, which had been left open, blew together with a loud noise, which had the effect of so acting upon the girl as to bring her to, and set her life-blood in motion. She sprang up in bed, and throwing her arms around her mother's neck, wept tears of joy over her escape from the horrid death of being buried alive. The young lady describes herself as being conscious of what was going on during her trance, but wholly unable to move or speak.

AN OLD FRENCH TOWN.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "JOHN HALIFAX, GENTLEMAN."

I WAS growing nearly wild with the whirl of Paris. To people unused to cities, and taking no natural delight in them, but in a totally different class of enjoyments, the noise and confusion of any large town soon produces a feeling which I can only compare to that of a Sioux Indian or a Caribbee Islander caught and put under the benevolent wicker cage of civilization. First there comes weariness, then irritation, then a frantic desire to run away "anywhere, any where out of the world"—that "world" which delights in streets and squares, gazing in at shop-windows, and promenading in parks, with intermediate morning-calls and evening re-unions, where we all smile and look so sweet, knowing the whole time that—

But let me not be cynical or unjust. There are, doubtless, as many good people in towns as there are in the country—only, perhaps, the good would be better if they lived in the country. They would not have their nerves torn, their tempers aggravated, and their strength exhausted in the frantic jostle of city life; they would be able to meditate as well as to work, to feel as well as to enjoy. That restless craving after excitement, the perpetual hunger for something new, which one so often sees in town-bred people, in the country dies out for lack of nutriment. There you are, perforce, thrown back upon yourself to find your own mental food, or you must starve. Which is the reason, I opine, that a certain order of natures do starve, and rush back wildly into London or Paris, where they have not to cater for their own amusement, but will find plenty of people to feed them with all sorts of pabulum—good, bad, indifferent—if they have only the money to pay for it. No blame to these; still there are others who prefer a peaceful, self-dependent, self-contained life, where all their food is of their own earning; and to such all cities are, after a short time, intolerable.

Paris is a degree less so than London. Its roar and confusion are not so great, its distances not so exhausting. Besides, its atmosphere is so much clearer and brighter that many people declare they are "always cheerful in Paris." Well, and it is a cheerful city; and one goes about it with a sense of real enjoyment for a while. But those hapless folk I have alluded to, who can not live in cities, who after a few days suffer under a calenture of longing for green trees, soft grass, and silence: above all silence—I can imagine lively Paris becoming to them ere long a perfect Pandemonium.

So we made up our minds to have "a day out" for as many miles as a return journey would allow, bringing us back in time for evening festivities. Out neither to Versailles, Fontainebleau, St. Denis, nor any of those places where Parisians and Paris visitors are in the habit of going; but to some quiet, unknown, or unappreciated spot, where, for a few hours, we might escape into blessed country peace. And then we thought of Chartres, which, with its beautiful cathedral, had often been spoken of to us by one who well understood what beauty was, and whether we had been strongly advised to go, "because nobody ever went there," which now seemed to us the utmost desideratum.

To the extreme astonishment of the hotel garçon—who could not understand how any body, taking the Chemin de Fer à l'Ouest, should pass by Versailles and go on to Chartres—we extracted from him all needful information and started. It was a gray morning—not actually wet, but looking as if it would have liked to rain if it could, if the keen cold wind would let it; and we had the usual long waiting at the terminus, in that dull patience which all native voyageurs seem to possess, but which is rarely the peculiarity of the British tourist. And as dull-looking as the day were our fellow-travelers—a big, coarse farmer, with enormous hands; and a young fellow—I believe Parisian slang would apply to him a term which corresponds to our word "swell," only indicating a feebler, more foppish, and generally inferior animal, though he was good-looking in a sort of way, too. His hair was long, his hands were long, and his finger-nails reminded one of a genteel Nebuchadnezzar: they must have been the care and the terror of his life. His dress was partial evening-dress, and he looked as if he had been up all night dancing—which, it being just past the Carnival, was not improbable. His manner was languidly elegant, and he seemed to think about nothing in particular. Life was evidently a great burden to him: a "bore," in short; and though it was little past 10 A.M., he soon took refuge in sleep. Cynical Britons would set him down contemptuously as "just a Frenchman;" but I shall pass him over as an exaggeration or deterioration rather than a fair type of la grande nation, as it calls itself, and which, in spite of our criticisms, may have something greater in it than we know.

Once only did this lethargic young gentleman rouse himself sufficiently to tell us, in a faint drawl, where was the Palace of Versailles—the back view of it, and a very ugly view too. Up to that point the country had been uninteresting—flat, tame, and villa-haunted, what we should call Cockneyfied; but now we got into something like rurality, and it was very refreshing to see the green fields, the hedges, and trees; bare, but still tinged with that faint, reddish shade of swelling buds which shows they are beginning to dream of spring. But there was nothing at all picturesque or beautiful to be seen, even at Versailles. The nearest approach to the picturesque was that ruined aqueduct begun by Louis XIV., and, after three years of lavish labor, left incomplete. Its fine arches still remain visible for leagues along the hill-side, like fragments of a grand imperfect life.

We watched them, moralizing, while the train rested a moment at the little station of Mainton, near where is the old castle which Louis XIV. gave to Veuve Scarron, and whence she took her name—that remarkable woman who, with all her faults, was the good angel of the Grande Monarque, over whom she exercised a silent influence deeper than any acknowledged queenship. This, in spite of her waning beauty and advancing age—for she was fifty years old when the king married her. It is somewhat touching to read of the childless woman's devotion to "mes enfans" of Saint Cyr—the girls' school she founded, now turned into the well-known college for young men. We had passed the station "Saint Cyr" on the road, and thought of Madame de Maintenon and this last home, where, after her strange and brilliant career, she died at last, old and lonely, except for the "enfants" of her adoption. One can not help lingering over these dead and gone people, wondering how, if they could "come alive again," we should think of them and feel toward them; whether they would seem to march with the step of gods, or be no larger than those of our own generation—now common mortals like ourselves, but whom history will elevate into heroes and heroines.

Our languid friend might be one of them—who knows? or he might have carried in his veins the blue blood and borne one of the aristocratic titles of that old time, before there came the grand crash of patrician and plebeian. In those days, no doubt, he would have turned up his large, well-cut nose at the common people as much as any of the rest of them—these poor mad "aristocrats," who themselves helped to light the match of the powder-magazine which destroyed them. But times were changed now. He had to sit calmly in his corner of the ordinary railway carriage, a mere passenger, no more, and endure the intrusion of another passenger—a little, yellow-faced, white-capped old woman, carrying, in large gloved hands, an ordinary market-basket. She examined us all with her acute, black, bead-like eyes, and then settled herself in her place—next to the young dandy—with composure. She had paid her money, and had as good a right to travel first-class express as he; a fact which her self-possessed politeness indicated quite sufficiently to all comers. But we could not help smiling, thinking of the difference between the days of Louis XIV. and Madame de Maintenon, and to-day.

Chartres at last. We recognized it at once by the stately cathedral towering clear above the little town; not a town possessing a cathedral, but a cathedral with a small appendage of a town, which sits admiringly at its feet and looks up to it with infinite respect, just as we do when we happen to have a great man in the family. Well, and it must be a pleasant pride to have a great man in the family; and I have always thought it would be a very pleasant thing to live in a cathedral town, and glorify one's self in it, admire it profoundly, and love it dearly. It would be a kind of architectural hero-worship; almost as enviable in its way as to have a noble progenitor; dear as a human father should be, and yet revered as one reveres by self-election one of the great men of the earth.

Eagerly we descended, and emerged from the railway; but the great man had disappeared behind his humbler relations: the cathedral was blotted out by the houses of the town—gray, irregular, old-fashioned, sloping up the low hill-side from some public walk or other, and looking—oh bliss!—as if leagues upon leagues removed from Paris, and as if a modern villa had not been built in the place for centuries.

And entering the market-square, the Place des Epars, as our guide-book informed us, we found it occupied by a large horse-fair, carried on apparently just as it may have been carried on for centuries.

It was very different from an English fair—one could hardly say in what: still there was a general outlandishness about every thing which probably strikes people who have spent all their lives at home more actually than it would those accustomed to foreign traveling. The very horses seemed tied up in a different way—and here I must protest that it was in a much crueler way—by ropes fastened round the under-lip, instead of the ordinary halter. I am sure if they could protest against it they would, even though their very neighing had been in French, as we fancied it sounded.

The men who attended them were like—and yet how unlike!—the same set of men which one finds at an English fair. Equally unlike—as different as Buckinghamshire plowmen from Cockneys—were they the Parisians we had left fifty miles behind. The whole type of race had changed. The sharp city face and small wiry active frame was merged into a large-limbed honest loutishness; not the same as British loutishness, but still essentially provincial, and—dare I say it?—refreshing accordingly. It was quite comfortable to look at those tanned fellows, big and burly, rosy and light-haired, lounging about in their blue blouses and enormous sabots, and chattering to one another in that awful patois of which we could only catch an intelligible word here and there. There were only left men enough to guard the beasts, the remainder, farmers, horse-dealers, or as they would be called in Scotland, horse-coupers, being absent at their déjeuner; for it was between eleven and twelve in the forenoon.

Now nothing strikes one in different countries more curiously than the difference in their feeding. Only imagine taking a British farmer at a fair, and setting him down to a mid-day meal of coffee, bread-and-butter, a few apples, or a bottle of vin ordinaire! Yet I declare, in all the eating-houses we passed, the Café de France, de Monarque, and several others, which surround the Place des Epars, and peering into whose wide glass windows we saw were filled with customers—I perceived no other kind of food or drink. Yet the consumers were stout, healthy men, large-limbed and strong made. As they sat at their little marble tables, ate their enormous lumps of bread, and quaffed their innocent drink, they seemed just as merry, nay, jolly, as any lot of English farmers intent upon their beef and fat bacon, their beer or brandy, and ending their meal in a condition so common as to be considered quite inseparable from attending fairs.

In one thing, I own, my heart turns to the French peasant; he is not a drunkard. Sometimes, as we heard in Normandy, he succumbs to the influence of that wonderfully nasty compound, cider brandy; but it is so potent, so noxious, that he drinks himself to death very soon: he does not live in that perpetual state of semi-fuddle, peculiar to our beer-drinking agricultural laborer. Nor is he brought up to consider beer or spirituous liquors essential to a working-man's strength: he knows, or proves without knowing, as all simple-living, anti-wine-bibbing folks do, that alcoholic stimulant is not a necessity; that it is not a food, but a medicine; useful in its way, as all medicines are; never to be turned into an habitual want. But this is preaching, and, cynical readers may say, without my text, since, if the French peasant could afford strong drinks, he would get as drunk as any Englishman. He might; but still at present, undoubtedly, he does not. In all those faces which we saw about the fair we never saw one which was that of a confirmed sot.

We were eager to see the cathedral, so we passed quickly through this market-square, so full of busy life, human and bestial, though the quiet horses looked almost as sensible as Christians; and there were no other animals except a few funny little calves, inclosed in pens apart, and guarded by equally funny little lads as frolicsome as themselves; lads who might have sat for the portrait of little Landry, in George Sand's charming story of "La Petite Fadette;" as true, I hope, to one phase of French life as her brilliant, wonderful, horrible novels are, alas! to another. There were also a few booths erected, where two or three men were arranging for sale sundry articles—earthen-ware, ironmongery, hosiery, linen-drapery—all of the humble and useful kind. Of fancy stores or booths of entertainment there were none: certainly the fair was one of business, not pleasure.

We quitted it, and meandering on after the fashion so delightful in traveling, finding one's self in a perfectly strange town, where any street is quite as good as another—where one has nothing to do, and plenty of time to do it in; and every thing one sees is sure to be amusing or interesting—we came into a gray, quiet street, or rather a congeries of streets, which might have stood just as they were since the Middle Ages.

Chartres is recorded as "one of the most ancient towns in France." Its cathedral undoubtedly dates from the beginning of the eleventh century—that is to say, contemporary with our Norman Conquest—and it is not impossible to suppose that some of these houses in these substantial old streets were built by respectable burghers whose grandfathers, our great-great, indefinitely great-grandfathers had killed at Cressy, Agincourt, or Poitiers. Now, public buildings of antiquity are all very fine and interesting, but there is something in domestic architecture—mere houses that ordinary folk built and lived in—which is more than interesting, pathetic. One could not look at these, inhabited by the various families of a country town, year after year, and generation after generation, without thinking of the endless histories, tragic or comic, dramatic or dull, that must have been transacted within them, upon which the rough-carved, fat-faced Gothic cherubs, which seemed the favorite doorway ornament every where, had looked so calmly—staring at all out-comers and in-goers, as they now stared at us, with their stolid stone eyes. But how difficult to realize the truth, that all these people were real people, as real as ourselves, and sharing like ourselves in old Weller's comical description of himself in the character of a verb—"always a-bein', sometimes a-doin', and continually a-sufferin'!"

Laughing over them, but with the sadness that often lies at the root of laughter, we went on to investigate this curious old town, meeting scarcely any of the inhabitants, and finding nothing very remarkable, until, seeing a priest enter a building which looked like a church, we followed him, and stood in the centre of a beautiful half-restored old chapel. But it was so full of scaffolding, hammering, noise of workmen, and clouds of falling dust, that we only stopped to watch the priest kneel down at his prayers: to him it was a consecrated place still—and hastened on, hungering for a sight of the cathedral. It was hidden, but we could occasionally catch glimpses of its two towers, not dominating over or interfering with the houses, but rising quietly above their heads (the parallel of the great man and his relations still), being a little nearer heaven than they.

All cathedrals have their prominent characteristics: that of Chartres seemed to me to be grandeur and calm. This, in spite of its great degree of ornamentation; the front being, it is said, covered with no less than eighteen hundred separate figures; yet it seems neither florid nor over-adorned. The proportions are so immense, and yet so perfect, and the mass of Gothic figures spreads so levelly over the whole, that no special one distracts the eye; while, at the same time, if we once begin to individualize them, their beauty is endless. But the tone of color is so subdued, so soft, that they affect one like the beauty of an old woman—grander and tenderer than that of any young women, and full of the one quality in which youth fails—expression. Standing at the foot of the flight of steps, gray, old, and broken, which leads up to the entrance of Chartres Cathedral, I thought of what an artist had, the week before, said in showing me the portrait of a young beauty he was at work upon: that though youth and beauty are delightful things, still, speaking professionally, he preferred the character, the records of a lifetime's education, which time writes upon almost any middle-aged face—hieroglyphics which in all young faces must necessarily be a blank. And so it is that all deeper natures instinctively like old houses, old towns, old churches, better than any thing which is new.

At the cathedral door we came upon the very genius loci in the shape of a dried-up old woman—one of those live mummies with bright black eyes, who seem peculiarly French, waiting to take from townspeople or visitors her chance of a sou. Above her head—curiously indicative of the sort of worshippers that visited the cathedral—was a "defense," forbidding entrance to all "paniers, fardeaux, et chiens"—something like the stern behest I once read over a Devonshire church door: "Take off your pattens!" Having none of these impedimenta, we walked leisurely in.

The first impression given by the interior as well as the exterior of Chartres Cathedral is enormous height—height rising into such dimness of shadow that it takes away the idea of any roof; one looks upward as if to the sky, and with the same sensation of peace. Amiens Cathedral has this in degree; but then Amiens still gives the feeling of newness: one is inclined to say, "How grand! and who is the architect?" But at Chartres one never thinks of the architect at all: it seems as if the whole building was not made, but had grown. One's soul's wings begin to tremble and stir, just as under the open sky, with no fragment of mortal roof, however safe and ornamental, to keep them in and restrain their liberty, even under the most beautiful bonds. I can not clearly describe the feeling; but those to whom the very breath of religious life is freedom—perfect freedom—will understand it and what it symbolizes.

The cathedral was quite empty—that is, it seemed so at first—very silent, very dim, as if its huge aisles were always in shadow, and its wheel-windows caught their colors from something far beyond common earthly sunshine; for there was none outside—the day had remained solemnly gray. But oh! the peace of the place! the heavenly quiet—the majestic calm! Entering its doors felt like the last benediction of the Catholic Church, the vade in pacem, dismissing a tired soul out of all the storms of life into the divine tranquillity of death.

At first we saw no sign of service going on, or of accidental worshippers, till, turning to the left, we came upon a shrine, hung with all sorts of votive offerings, with numerous lights burning in front of the figure of a black Virgin—an actual negro Madonna—decked out in very fine clothes, flowers, etc. This was la Vierge Noire, or Notre Dame sous terre—a miraculous image which ever since the Middle Ages has been the object of profound veneration. How it originated, or what part it has played in the history of the town of Chartres, not being an archaeologist, I can not tell. It was a very queer-looking thing, this image; one of those extraordinary mixtures of the pathetic and the ludicrous so constantly seen in Roman Catholic churches. In front of the funny black doll, two women, common peasant women, of the class to whom it had been found necessary to interdict "paniers, fardeaux, et chiens," knelt, absorbed in prayer, for ever so many minutes; then one of them rose and went toward a small erection hard by—a sort of shop-counter, behind which sat intrenched a young priest. She whispered to him, and he whispered back to her; then some little transaction passed between them like the sale of a ticket, and he dismissed her, accepting her respectful courtesy and her money with a condescending smile. Instantly he reabstracted himself from all mundane things, and buried himself fathoms deep in the leaves of his breviary. I have seen many Protestants make to themselves against all unpleasant human duties a barricade of their Bible—reading it forever, though if they loved it as they profess to do they must long since have known it by heart, from Genesis to Revelation, and be able to say of it, as a faithful girl once said of her locked-up love-letter, "Oh, I don't need to read it, I can remember it all!" But I never saw even the most bigoted Bible-reader plunge at it in the ferociously sanctimonious way with which that young priest darted into the study of his breviary.

I hope it was an interesting work, but to me there would have been something far more interesting in two little works of Nature which just then trotted past me, clinging desperately to their mother's two hands. An exceedingly poor mother, and the boy and girl with her were, like herself, almost in rags; yet she had arranged the rags tidily together, and come fearlessly to say her prayers in the magnificent cathedral. She was not afraid of it, or of the Vierge Noire. As soon as she came in sight of the image she made the two little things kneel down before it, and then knelt down herself between them quite motionless. So were the children. Their little bare knees pressed uncomplainingly the cold stone floor, and the expression of their faces was that of extreme awe as they looked at the lighted altar and all its curious adornments. I wonder what they thought of it, these tiny creatures—one was three and the other six, apparently; but being so small and starved-looking they might have been older. I wonder what their mother was thinking of or praying for; and what sort of a home, if any, she had come from or was going to; and what she hoped the Vierge Noire would do for her. Probably the only thing she wanted was what all can not get—not even mothers—daily bread, mere daily bread!—for she had such a hungry face: and so came to ask it of her whom Protestants as well as Catholics somewhat profanely call "the mother of God." She could not hear, but God Himself might, and answer too, in spite of the deluded and delusive prayers. It is a blessed thing to remember amidst all our disputes about truth, our teaching and unteaching of it, and our vehement quarrels over one another's half-teaching and half-learning—that through this maze of confusion, in His own silent secret way, the one Divine Teacher is patiently instructing us all.

We left the woman praying, with her babes in front of her, close to the feet of the Black Virgin, and wandered away round and round the great, silent, solitary building; through nave, choir, chapels—there are seven—penetrating to the deserted high altar, and mounting inquisitively the empty pulpit—trying to feel how a preacher would feel who looked down from that eminence on the vast void below filled with eager faces—eager for what he had to tell them. Suppose—just suppose—for it must have often happened—that what he had to say he did not believe in himself?

Being neither architectural nor archaeological, I do not attempt to describe the cathedral, but I can well imagine it is a treasure to antiquarians. There is, for instance, a screen of stone-work, composed of very well sculptured reliefs—scenes from the New Testament history, which alone would occupy days of study. It was begun in the sixteenth century, and not finished for two hundred years. What generations after generations must have expended their life-long work upon it, and departed without even the hope of seeing it complete! Truly these workmen of the Middle Ages must have "died in faith," after having labored in faith—for their labor was of that delicate, careful, interminable kind, of which they could never see the fruits. What a contrast to us—this impatient generation—hasting to be rich, and eager to spend our riches even before we get them; spending them, too, upon ourselves and our own personal luxuries—is the quiet patience, the solemn unfulfilled hope, in which must have lived and died these medieval people! Compare the men who build houses—"elegant mansions" "and desirable residences"—splendid crumbling shams, meant to last only a few years, with the men who used to build cathedrals!

We could have lingered for hours in this one, every stone of which preached a sermon, and all the better because there was no guide or guide-book, or intellectual interference of any kind with the purely spiritual influence of the place. But in spite of the spirit the flesh was weak. We began to be frightfully hungry—thirsty too; we felt as though we had been feeding on the dust of ages. As we went out, striving to find our way back into the town, and passed one by one those comfortable, respectable closed doors, whence grinned those easy-minded cherubs, and inside which we knew not a soul nor a soul knew us, our spirits drooped a little. It is a queer sensation, to be in a place so utterly strange that you feel your only reliance must be on the money in your pocket, if you happen to have it—but what if you have not? We were libeling human nature. Let me in contrition relate the next episode.

We came to a little corner shop. It contained nothing eatable, drinkable, or purchasable, only coffee-berries, sugar, mustard, and such like attractive condiments, so tantalizing to starving people, abundantly displayed. Still it was a shop, and in it sat a good-natured looking woman. Despair gives courage; I went up to her and begged—with the apology of being "étrangers"—the stranger's charity: the immemorial "cup of cold water." She rose up at once, took us through the shop into the little back-parlor, placed chairs for us, and with the sweetest, kindest grace went herself to fetch what I think was one of the purest, most delicious draughts that ever refreshed thirsty souls. She would have added wine to it, or bread, or any thing; indeed she urged this, and made us heartily welcome to sit and rest as long as ever we liked. We did stay some minutes in her neat parlor, talking about the town, cathedral, etc., and as regarded the latter being corrected in our moderate adjective, "grande," by her earnest and rather reproofing exclamation, "C'est magnifique!" But when in bidding her adieu there was made the awkward and truly British suggestion of "something to pay," it was charming to see the air with which she drew herself up—this smiling little French woman—and the annihilating negative she put upon every thing but thanks, even accepting these with a dignified deprecation: "Ce ne mérite pas." She has doubtless quite forgotten us, but we shall long remember her, and wish her the stranger's blessing and the reward of those who give cheerfully only the cup of cold water, which when I referred to I do not think she understood, Catholics being usually better acquainted with their Prayer-book than their Bibles; but she smiled sweetly, and looked after us with a kindly air. She did not know it, but she had done us good unawares.

In the Hôtel du Duc de Chartres, we were entertained in no ducal manner: the demi-poulet, which seems to be a French waiter's first and last idea in the matter of extempore food, must have run upon its long legs for several summers, and the mouton was—well, let us forget it! But the café au lait, the bread and the butter, were, as they are all over France, excellent. And the neat-handed damsel who waited upon us, and got us every thing as fast as she could, for we had no time to lose, was also thoroughly French in her quick way of divining our wants, and her cheerful civil attention to them. She told us in summer Chartres is full of "étrangers," but now we were evidently regarded as the first swallows of the season, and inspected accordingly.

Indeed we felt convinced that "Anglais" must be plainly written upon our exterior, for in passing through the market-square and lingering at one of the booths, trying if we could find, as a memorial gift to bring home to a friend, something a little less inconvenient than a sauce-pan, a frying-pan, or a three-legged stool, and trying to make the dealer comprehend what we wanted, we were painfully humiliated by a second man's coming up voluntarily to explain in a patronizing voice, "Ye'es, von franc—dat is ten-pence." And when we praised his English and inquired where he had learned it, he beamed all over with satisfaction, and informed us that he had been for a week at "Lonedone"—at the TOWN OF CHARTRES.

Great Exhibition. Then he began to dilate on all his experiences there, and the wonders he had seen—his companion listening with much respect, and evidently regarding him as a traveled personage—the monkey who had seen the world—who was, on the whole, rather a credit to his native Chartres.

Our small purchase completed, we again sauntered through the market, and stopped to watch, with considerable amusement, another business transaction of a much more serious kind. A grave old farmer was buying a horse, which the seller and a friend—a young fellow, having the peculiar sharp look which horse-dealers and all people who have much to do with horses seem to acquire—were trotting out before him, and urging upon him with a wild clatter of tongues, in which the only distinguishable word was “garanti, garanti!” repeated many times. But still the knowing old farmer shook his head, and after having felt the creature all over, and examined him with the eye of a connoisseur, he apparently declined the bargain, for the two young men marched their animal off, and themselves likewise, with a somewhat crest-fallen air. I suppose even at Chartres there may be such a thing as a “do;” and that there, as with us, people are not always so innocent as they look.

On again, through those quiet and half-empty streets, meeting only Chartres children with their bonnes going out for an afternoon walk, and Chartres ladies, dressed in all their best, going apparently to pay calls; and a barefooted, bare-headed Dominican friar, whose costume looked so queer contrasted with that of modern civilization, but who stood, indifferent to all observers, contemplating the cathedral front. For there, of course, we had drifted back, impelled by a kind of fascination.

It was the hour for vespers. From one of the towers a deep-throated bell was sounding, and several very respectable-looking persons—chiefly women—were entering at the door. We entered too, and joined the thinly-sprinkled congregation, which dotted here and there the enormous aisle, through which began to roll a sound not unlike the sound of the sea—bass voices, with violoncello accompaniment, singing the evening Litany. In the vast cathedral it seemed a mere murmur; and yet there was something at once fine and pathetic about it, as it swelled upward, wave-like, toward the great windows, and lost itself in the mists of the almost unseen roof. It seemed to carry with it, as the sea does, the burden of the nations: the cries and prayers of centuries, that have beat themselves out moaning for a little while and vanished away. A mere human life—even a generation of human lives—how very, very small it seems!

Outside the choir lingered one or two people—a few old women, whose sabots clattered faintly across the stone pavement, and one stout, middle-aged, very common-looking père de famille, who knelt down in a corner, and said his prayers with extreme devotion. Otherwise there was no sound but the low bass murmur of vespers, which seemed to make the rest of the cathedral more silent than before.

Vaguely wandering round it once more, in that complete content of enjoyment which I fear is becoming a small monomania, we came upon an affiche, which attracted the English Protestant mind as so “odd” that I stopped to copy it out. It was a printed paper, stuck on a pillar, and headed, “Sort spirituel pour le soulagement des âmes du Purgatoire.”

“On dit ordinairement un De Profundis, un Pater, et un Ave pour les âmes dont le chiffre répond au numéro sorti. Des personnes zélées ne laissent pas même sortir leurs amis de leur chambre avant d’avoir tirés un sort et dit Requiescat in Pace.”

Now I have no wish to joke upon this rather peculiar affiche, or to recoil from it in frantic horror. I have not the slightest fear, nor, I trust, contempt, for the Pope or his Church; but I would just like to ask any sensible, sincere, large-minded Catholic: What does it all mean? Is this “sort spirituel” a lottery for departed souls, in which the relatives of the deceased are to take tickets before the corpse is removed from the death-chamber? How are the said souls to benefit thereby, and for what length of time? and is the time proportioned to the money? Are the results guessed at, or calculated as we calculate averages in life-assurance tables? And will a proportion of the Catholic community in Chartres believe it, and pay? which fact one could understand of people like the woman with her two ragged children, or the good folk who come to church with the “paniers, fardeaux, et chiens;” but of the intelligent, educated people, who live in those comfortable houses, and send out those pretty, well-dressed children with their bonnes—those respectable middle class of our nineteenth century—is it possible? Do they sincerely believe that, by paying so many shillings or pounds, the souls of their dead friends will be seen—as by the blessed Jean d’Alberac—(who in the wide world was that gentleman?)—“flying upward like sparks from a fiery furnace?”

I will allow there is something in human nature which clings to—nay, seems out of its own need to have created—the doctrine of Purgatory. It is a doctrine neither incredible nor impossible—within limits. Nay, I will go so far as to say that it is much easier, much more consonant with our highest idea of God, to believe in heaven and purgatory, or heaven and annihilation, than in heaven and hell—which one day may no Christian soul dare to believe in! And while human love remains so strong, and human creatures so weak—while the good, hating sin, are continually yearning with a passion of pitying tenderness over the sinner—while there was never a lost life yet which some fond heart could not see excuses for, as none else but God could see—so long will there exist a craving after some sort of intermediate state after death, where all hope is not extinct, but in which the infinite number of souls who seem half good, half bad, who have fallen away under sore temptation, or succumbed to circumstances which they were naturally made too weak to resist, may have given them another chance as it were, and be purged from evil, and educated through any amount of suffering into that ultimate perfect holiness which is the only real “salvation.” It may be a most heretical thing to say, but I am sure there have been many men and women—women especially—who, could they have really believed in purgatory, would have given their whole substance in masses for the dead; or spent half their existence in barefoot pilgrimages to shrine after shrine, praying for beloved departed souls, dear to them as their own, whom death had snatched from the possibility of attaining to good or atoning for evil in this world; leaving to the survivors as their sole refuge and consolation God’s mercy in the world everlasting.

Yes, there are few of us who can not understand, and perhaps in our secret hearts even wish for, purgatory, or some state similar: it would heal so many wounds, clear up so many difficulties; but to suppose that we—or above all, our purses—can influence it; that taking a lottery ticket can lift our beloved out of that mysterious state of trial into the bosom of God!—Well, many wise and good people have believed in many foolish and bad things; but still I should like to have caught one of those priests who sung their vespers so complacently, and asked him what the Catholic Church—no, the intelligent Catholic laity—really thinks on the subject.

We had no time to ponder much upon it, serious as it was; for the afternoon was fast flying, and by evening we had to be present at a very different scene from this gray, sombre, silent cathedral. We walked round it once more, trying to view all its beauties from their several points, and fix them upon our minds as one does all delightful things that we know will return no more. This is the great regret of traveling—one feels as if one would like to stay in every pleasant place, as poor young Shelley used to say, “forever.” One deludes one’s self with the promise. “We will certainly come back again,” conscious all the time that it is a delusion—that we never shall come back—that by-and-by we shall not even wish to come back: that before we are aware the “forever” has changed to “never;” and that even if our own minds were constant to their first impressions—which they so seldom are—the eternal progression of things goes sweeping on, making our inconstancy unregretted—nay, almost unperceived.

We are never likely—perhaps should scarcely care—to see Chartres Cathedral again; but we feel glad to think that long after we are disembodied spirits, whom nobody will take lottery tickets for, these lofty arches will lift themselves up toward the mist-clouds of the roof, and the lovely colored lights will tremble through the three wheel-windows; while down below the low monotonous murmur of vespers will go on day after day; and the poor old women will creep in and go clattering in their sabots over the pavement; and many a sick or sorrowful soul, of poor or rich—for both are alike with God—will come and lay its burden before the Vierge Noire. But we shall have laid down all our burdens, done all our journeying, and entered into rest. And there comes a time—I am sure it does come in old age, and even before then—when that rest, which to youth is such a terror and dismay, seems as natural, right, and merciful as the nightly dropping of “tired eyelids over tired eyes.”

Between the cathedral and the railway station we passed through a pleasant region, sloping down the low hill-side on which the town sits to a place half rampart, half garden, where were trees and gravel-walks and seats, evidently a favorite promenade. There elderly gentlemen were turning out to take the air; and young ladies in jackets, hats, and chignons, and middle-aged ladies in bonnets and shawls, were wandering about, no doubt the society of the little old town, coming forth to amuse itself before dinner. We noticed their pleasant provincial look, and speculated on their domestic life—probably as simple and undistinguished as their appearance. Nay, we investigated it so far as to penetrate boldly through the open door of a maison à louer—two merry young menuisiers were singing over some piece of carpenter’s work, with a still more juvenile painter and decorator chiming in from his scaffolding inside.

This youth took the pains to inform us, with the utmost courtesy, and “Pardon, Madame,” without end, that it was not the slightest use our applying for the house—which he evidently thought our errand—since, though it was still put up à louer, it was in reality sold to a family who were coming into it immediately. Nevertheless, Madame was quite free to go all over it as much as ever she liked. Yes, it was a very pretty house, and would soon be put into beautiful order, and the young workman was evidently rather gratified by its being admired.

So we went over room after room of the unknown home for some unknown family—doubtless as thoroughly a “family” as any of ours—perhaps more so—for in French provincial life the domestic tie seems strangely strong, stronger than we in England have any idea of. It was entered by a broad walk, dividing a square walled-in garden, where on either side were flower-beds—some newly-planted, some gay with crocuses, violets, and red, yellow, and lilac primroses, which looked as if they had rooted themselves there, and bloomed spring after spring with a loving persistence, as faithful old-fashioned flowers do. On either side of the door were the salon and the salle-à-manger—Anglicé, the two parlors—prettily papered and freshly painted; behind was the neatest little kitchen in the world. Above, a queer narrow stair led to three tiny bedrooms, two facing the front garden and one the back—which latter was an extraordinary specimen of horticulture, being a mere terrace-bank, ascended by a sort of step-ladder, and planted with a few herbs and vegetables, such as would supply the small menage with materials for its pot-au-feu.

Every thing about the place was as simple as possible, but so cozy, compact, self-contained, that the inhabitants might live in it as snugly, as quietly, and as much to themselves as birds in a nest, swinging safely on a tree top, out of every body’s way, which always seemed to me a sublime idea of true felicity. And then with the cathedral towers protecting them from behind, and before, a sunny view of the smiling green paysage, sloping down and then up again toward the horizon, dotted with farm-houses, and intersected with rows of trees—what a peaceful, happy life this family—it must be a small family—might lead there—a life as unlike that of Paris as our English provincial life is unlike London! We hoped it might be so, and we left our blessing behind us on these unknown people, for whom their “home” (and the French know what home is, though they have no name for it in their language) was so pleasantly preparing.

We almost envied them—for we had taken a liking to this quiet Chartres, and would gladly have spent a summer there, or many summers perhaps, after the fashion of Shelley’s “forever.” But our hour was come—and our train—and before long we had left it all behind, and were whirling away back to Paris, which we found just as it was, though an interval enormous seemed to have come between us and it since nine in the morning. True, we had not done much—indeed I doubt if we had seen as much as we might, and as most tourists would have seen. But all we had seen we had felt thoroughly, and as thoroughly enjoyed, making of it a permanent picture, to go back upon for many a year.

Yes, we returned to Paris, and enjoyed it too, or made the best of it, which is the next wisest thing. But I am afraid, under all its splendors and amusements and dissipations, I left a little bit of my heart lying buried under the red primroses of that pretty garden belonging to the tiny maison à louer in the gray old town of Chartres.

CHARTRES CATHEDRAL.

SONG OF JUNE.

My thoughts are gentle waves that run
Ever to thee, their golden shore;
Soft glowing airs that, with the sun,
Fondle thy beauty o'er and o'er;
Glad mounting larks by whom is given
All their sweet joy to thee, their heaven.

My hopes are violets that steal
To sweet life round thy blooming Spring;
Swallows, that o'er thee playful wheel,
And track thy May with happy wing;
Motes that dance in thy sun, and bless
Their hours, with thee and happiness.

My songs are bees that to the rose
Of thy dear beauty murmuring cling;
Where'er thy May of gladness glows,
They hovering boom on happy wing;
Thy flush of sweets, how can they see
Nor murmur joy and love to thee!

My dreams are loving stars of June,
Hung over thee, their world, by night;
My life is one warm summer's noon
That clasps thee in its throbbing light;
All my glad moments can but be Moths, lured by thy sweet light to thee.

TYRO.

O RIVER, shining River, winding River, golden River!
Swift rushest thou by mead and wood;
The sunbeams follow with thy flood,
The winds are songs to soothe thy rest,
The stars are gems to deck thy breast,
And Earth was only made to be
A cradle, holy Stream, for thee.

O River, trackless River, changeful River, endless River!
I wander on thy sedgy bank,
Where the dark reeds grow tall and rank,
Waiting that mystic hour when he,
Thy god, thyself, shall come to me,
And we again, linked hand in hand,
Above thy starlit deep shall stand.

O River, wondrous River, magic River, sacred River!
What is this god who holds my soul
Resistless 'gainst his sweet control?
His breath is fiercer than thy breath,
His grasp is strong as love and death,
And with his kiss there comes to me
The odor of the barren sea.

O River, fatal River, darkling River, deadly River!
Since I have seen his godlike face,
I grow to hate my mortal race;
Since I have leaned upon his breast,
I taste no more soft sleep or rest:
All life is melted into this,
The bitter-sweet of his salt kiss.

SONG OF JUNE.

O River, sighing River, moaning River, walling River!
Dark are thy dreams of coming days;
Dimly I see the hideous ways
That lie before these weary feet,
The dreadful noontide's tropic heat,
The lonely night, the galling chain,
A cycle of despair and pain.

O River, dancing River, gleaming River, joyous River!
Love keeps no count of days to come;
Love knows no fear of death and doom;
And while above thy deep I stand,
My hand locked fast in his strong hand,
And on my brow his salt-sea breath,
What heed have I of doom or death!

THE ALOE.

"Well, till that Aloe flourish!
So be it." Thus I said,
As I stood with thee in the twilight room,
And the Love-star shone o'erhead—
As I stood with thee by the window lone,
'Midst exotics bright and rare,
And the trailer's blossoms from above
Fell mingling in thy hair.
And the dance was done, and the music o'er,
And the floor no longer stirred,
And the voice of the merry company
From other rooms was heard.
And there you stood in that twilight hour
In your lovely summer prime,
With eyes whose lifting made the dawn
To many a heart by mine.
And yet to mine was their glance upraised
In beauty not unmoved,
As we said we would be friends for aye,
And love as then we loved!

Yes; till the Aloe flourish!
Though many a year must run
Ere the stately plant we looked on then
Will open to the sun.
And life with thee 's so sweet and fair,
Each day new joyance giving,
That the young heart all else forgets
In the very joy of living!

Now six short months are hardly flown,
And the snow is on the ground—
And I sit by the midnight fire alone,
And hear the muffled sound
Of a passing footstep in the street,
Or else the broken lay
Of some reveler letting his gladness out;
But my thoughts are far away—
Away over hill, and moor, and stream,
To summer-hours again,
To the radiant day we shall meet, and stroll
In our own romantic glen!
And half with a smile and half a sigh
I wonder, with a start,
If any of this winter's snow
Has chill'd my dear one's heart!

THE ALOE.

BOARDING.

"THERE is an evil which I have seen under the sun, and it is common among men."

I refer to boarding. The wise man referred to something else, mainly, I infer, because he always kept house, and did not go to the country in the summer.

This common evil, growing daily more common, has its root in error and pride, and its fruits are worthy of its source and soil.

Without doubt, setting the solitary in families was an act of Divine beneficence, with innumerable advantages arising from the domestic relations. Setting the solitary in boarding-houses, as is the custom in the latter day, is a human invention with no end of evils in its train.

Boarding is one of the most unsatisfactory ways of keeping alive. It is only a trifle better than visiting for a living, or sponging on a mother-in-law.

It is an evil because a boarding-house atmosphere, full of reminders of the past meal and unsavory hints of the coming one, is not conducive to the growth of grace and virtue. King Lemuel's model woman would never have thriven in it, and the possibly perfect man, of whom James hints, was intended to live in a house of his own, I am sure.

It is an evil because it sacrifices comfort and independence on the altar of vain show.

It is an evil because, considered by any rule of profit and loss, the profits are doubtful and the losses certain.

It is an evil because it involves much expense and secures little comfort; it necessitates large bills and grants small rations.

It is an evil because it dispenses hash for breakfast until hash becomes a weariness.

It is an evil because it denies the luxury of cakes except at rare intervals. The rare intervals are marked by distressingly unequal proportions, said proportions being twelve cakes and thirteen persons. You always happen to be the thirteenth.

It is an evil because you help pay for the cook, and the cook never consults your taste.

It is an evil because the soup is always flavored with onions and the pumpkin pies with ginger. You never eat onions, and ginger is your especial aversion.

It is an evil because a timid suggestion on your part excites indignation on the part of the landlady. "Who ever heard of soup without onions, or pumpkin pies without ginger?" she inquires, wrathfully.

It is an evil because the meat is overdone and the potatoes underdone; the tea is weak and the butter strong; the bread is sour and the coffee muddy.

It is an evil because there is no appeal from the authority of the autocrat in the kitchen. She rules with a rod of iron, which, if it be only a poker, is powerful as a sceptre in the king's hand.

It is an evil because the landlady reminds you of the high price of groceries and the fearful expense of early vegetables, until you feel like a criminal in asking for a second spoonful of sugar, and eat June peas with a heavy sense of guilt.

It is an evil because there is a possibility of black looks on the landlady's face when you send your cup to be refilled with coffee.

It is an evil because there is a probability of finding your neighbor's spoon in the cup when it returns.

It is an evil because it suggests horrible doubts whether the hair in your soup belongs to the cook or the chamber-maid, and whether the button in your hominy came off the cook's gown or the waiter-boy's jacket.

It is an evil because there is no catering to weak appetites that crave delicate morsels. Boarding-house fare is selected on the supposition that all men are in perfect health and equal to roast beef, cabbage, and heavy desserts. If illness indisposes you to eat these you get no substitute.

It is an evil because the parlor is always monopolized by the young lady with a lover, and the register is held by some right of squatter sovereignty.

It is an evil because it admits of no choice of companions. It gives you a neighbor at table who is Calvinistic in his doctrines, while you pride yourself on your anti-Calvinistic creed, and it places your political foe opposite who gives you continual stabs.

It is an evil because the chamber-maid hides your boots, and drinks your wine, and makes free with your hair-oil, and steals your cologne, and borrows your soap, and rummages your pockets, and leaves stains on your books, and fingerprints on the velvet case of your lady-love's miniature, if you happen to be unmarried. If you are married she is insolent to your wife and unkind to your children; she kindles the fire with your morning paper before you have a chance to read it; and brings bones and carries bones of gossip throughout the house.

It is an evil because you are powerless to discharge the chamber-maid when you find her guilty of pilfering or listening at the keyhole.

It is an evil because it bounds you on all sides with annoyances. In the room next yours there is sure to be a musical family. The father practices all hours of the day and night on a violin, the mother divides her time between impossible operas and tuning guitar-strings, and the little boy begins picking at a banjo at the early hour of five in the morning. On the other side of you there is certain to locate a young man given to private theatricals, and he raves and rants in a manner that makes your wife nervous and frightens the baby. Just above you there settles without fail a woman with a sewing-machine made after an early patent, that makes a racket equal to a threshing-machine of several horse-power; and just under you there moves in an invalid who sends up a request that you will always step on tip-toe, and never by any possibility give way to a sneeze.

It is an evil because you are never safe from intrusion. Your fellow-boarders are forever dropping in, after the manner of Paul Pry, when you have a headache and especially pray for quiet, or when you have a book to read or a letter to write; and if some domestic broil has ruffled your temper and reddened your wife's eyes, some spy of the establishment is mortally certain to be socially inclined at that time, and you are subjected to a painful and vexatious espionage.

It is an evil because, whenever your wife takes advantage of a rainy day to clean the bureau drawers, some of the loungers about the house come in for a chat, and take an account of your stock of clothing.

It is an evil because it leads to a public knowledge of private affairs. Your number of socks and your wife's supply of handkerchiefs are certainly known in the house and reported throughout the land.

It is an evil because your age and your wife's age, and the difference between your two-year-old and the baby, are known and commented on with a degree of certainty that could only have been derived from a peep into the Family Bible.

It is an evil because every body knows the amount of your income, and speculations are rife as to whether you have the ability to indulge in meerschaums and gratify your wife's taste for silk dresses.

It is an evil because every body understands the peculiarities of your disposition, and your wife's temperament, and your children's propensities.

It is an evil because every body knows your pedigree, and your wife's ancestry, and every shadow of a spot on your family escutcheon.

It is an evil because all the events of your past life are known to your fellow-boarders. They seem to have some invisible book of record in which are written all your errors and foibles and regrets.

It is an evil because, with some secret clairvoyant sense, the same people consider themselves competent to predict the future of yourself and wife and children. Not a dream but they know it, not a hope but they guess it, not an expectation but they anticipate it.

It is an evil because in every boarding-house each family hears the rattling bones of the skeleton in his neighbor's closet, and every man and woman thinks that he and she holds the key that will unlock the blue chamber in his fellow-boarder's life.

It is an evil because the people in boarding-houses imagine and make up what they fail to know.

It is an evil because it suggests gayety to a man and gossip to a woman they had never been guilty of in their own home.

It is an evil because it leads to dissipation in men and idleness in women.

It is an evil because economies that had been possible, and not unpleasant under your own roof, are hopelessly merged into reckless extravagance in a boarding-house.

It is an evil because borrowing is the habit of boarding-houses, and you are expected to practice the millennial virtue of lending, hoping for nothing again. Men borrow your money and clothes and ink and books; and your wife has continual demands on her wardrobe and patterns and stationery and jewelry, and whatever she possesses.

It is an evil because it leads into temptations you had never known in your own house. Men who show only their agreeable society faces flirt with your wife, and you unconsciously fall to complimenting the pretty lady opposite, who thinks that being a married man is your worst failing.

It is an evil because mutual flirting leads to mutual recrimination. Your wife draws disparaging comparisons between yourself and the gallant man who pares her oranges at dinner, and you indulge in open admiration of the sweet-tempered young lady opposite who shows no signs of fading. Sulks come next in order, tears follow, and a breach is made in the domestic relations.

It is an evil because your children are scolded on one side and flattered on the other; because they are thrown into society when they should be in the nursery, and inevitably become saucy, forward, and presuming.

It is an evil because you are never at liberty to be at home. You must talk when you would be quiet, and listen when you would converse. You must laugh when you would be sad, and wear a solemn face when you are inclined to gayety.

It is an evil because men and women who board never know the blessedness and beauty of the sweet word—home. Marco Bozzaris was not appealing to men in boarding-houses when he urged them to strike for their altars and their fires.

It is an evil because the holy of holies of your domestic sanctuary becomes common ground for strange and unhallowed feet. In fact, when a family enters a boarding-house, the veil that divides the holy of holies from all the world is rent in twain.

It is an evil because it debars you from all thoughts of hospitality. You hesitate before you dare ask your own father to dinner, and blush with shame to send your sister to a hotel.

It is an evil because it leads to mental measurement and mutual disappointment in people out of their normal condition.

It is an evil because it results in a current belief in man's total depravity and woman's inherent frailty.

It is an evil because it makes you think less of the world, and it makes the world think less of you, and you are half conscious that you deserve it.

If you have a house keep it. Don't sell it, lease it, mortgage it, or squander it. If you have not a house work for one, camp out, or go to New Jersey. Don't board, if you value your own peace of mind, your reputation and self-respect, the comfort of your wife, and well-being of your children.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

JULIA.—Chameleon silks are the same as the shot silks you see described in foreign papers. The ground of one color is overcast with another shade, presenting different hues when seen in different lights.

M. R. H.—Chip bonnets are exceedingly fashionable this summer. The bonnet may be either of solid chip or merely bands of the chip braid with puffs of white frosted tulle between. The flowers for trimming should be of a very deep, rich color to contrast well with the thick white chip.

J. M. R.—Valenciennes lace bows may be worn either with linen or lace collars. They are made either of the regular barbe or of lace sewn together to make a finished edge on both sides, and may be worn with or without a brooch.

INQUIRE.—A Marie Antoinette aigrette is a cluster of feathers, of flowers, or of jewels worn directly in the centre of the diadem. It is seen on the bonnets of late importation, some of which we will describe next week. It is worn standing erect.

MATTIE H.—Etruscan gold jewelry is in good style for day wear. It has a bright yellow appearance that requires much care to keep in order. Massive balls, crescents, and bars with long pendants and gold fringe are popular styles.

H. H.—White waists and chemises russes, such as we have illustrated in the Bazar, are much worn, and form a conspicuous feature of the fashionable Pompadour suits. Girdles are not worn; instead we have waists and bretelles, or a simple belt, made of the material of the skirt, with a short sash. Coat-sleeves are more stylish than bishop sleeves. Muslin and lawn morning dresses are made with sacques. Brussels net and tulle with a quilted border, trimmed with folds or simply tucked at the ends, are used for bonnet strings in half mourning.

MRS. M. J. M'CHESNEY.—As we have often stated, we furnish no patterns, except the numerous ones contained every fortnight in our Supplement.

A SUBSCRIBER.—Hamburg edging and insertion are sold by the yard. The edging costs from twenty-two cents to $1 25 per yard, and the insertion from thirty-seven and a half cents to $1 25 per yard. Coventry ruffling is sold by the piece, according to the width, and ranges from sixty cents to $1 50 per yard. The chemise russe is merely a blouse waist, plain on the shoulders, buttoned in front, and left loose at the waist, instead of being gathered into a belt. A fancy belt to match the skirt with which it is worn confines it at the waist.

BLUEBELL.—It is not too late to begin the piano at twelve, especially with a good teacher.

ORANGE.—Orange-blossoms belong specially to the bride, and can not be worn by the bridesmaids.

YOUNG HOUSEKEEPER.—Napkins and table-cloths are marked bias, in the corner, like handkerchiefs. We can not be expected to answer questions in the next Number, or perhaps even the next but one, after the receipt of a letter; for a newspaper is not prepared in an hour, and the following Number is often already printed when a letter arrives urging an immediate reply to some question.

A SUBSCRIBER.—We have already given full instructions in the art of Decalcomania, in Harper's Bazar, No. 23. A lambrequin is a drapery or hanging applied to various purposes, from the ornamentation of a curtain to that of a work-box or cushion.

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly-invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by News-dealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

LYMAN BEECHER'S AUTOBIOGRAPHY, &c. Autobiography, Correspondence, &c., of Lyman Beecher, D.D. Edited by his Son, CHARLES BEECHER. With Three Steel Portraits and Engravings on Wood. 2 vols., 12mo, Cloth, $5 00.

A more entertaining biography has not been published in many a year, and it will be many a year before another like it appears. Dr. Beecher was a singular great man, with marked peculiarities of thought, habits, and style; original, energetic, bold, religious, sincere, loving God and his fellow-men profoundly, and seeking to do good in his own way. The manner of getting up the book is quite as peculiar as the subject. For years past, before the patriarch's departure to his long home, his gifted children have been in the habit of gathering around him and listening to his reminiscences of former days, asking him questions, and drawing out his views of men and things. Mrs. Stowe's questions are indicated by her initials, and Miss Catharine Beecher's by her own, and the boys have theirs; and these queries and replies, being interspersed with the story, give animation and variety. Then there is a rich material in the correspondence with men and women on public and domestic matters, religious, political, and literary; letters to and from these rare children in the various stages of their intellectual and moral development, beautiful pictures of home life in the country, with rapid and startling remarks on preachers, teachers, and their opinions—the whole making up a book possessing uncommon interest for all types of readers.—New York Observer.

THE GREAT NEW ENGLAND REMEDY.

DR. J. W. POLAND'S
WHITE PINE COMPOUND

Is now offered to the afflicted throughout the country, after having been proved by the test of twelve years in the New England States, where its merits have become as well known as the tree from which, in part, it derives its virtues.

THE WHITE PINE COMPOUND

CURES

Sore Throat, Colds, Coughs, Diphtheria, Bronchitis, Spitting of Blood, and Pulmonary Affections generally. It is a remarkable Remedy for Kidney Complaints.

This medicine is free from any thing deleterious, pleasant to the taste, safe, yet sure and effective in its action.

Boston, January 20, 1866.

POLAND'S WHITE PINE COMPOUND.—After having given it a thorough trial, we can confidently recommend Poland's White Pine Compound as a very valuable article for the cure of colds, coughs, and pulmonary complaints generally. In several cases we have known it to give prompt relief when all other remedies which had been tried had failed. It is an article which, in a climate so promotive of sudden and severe colds as is that of New England, ought to be in every family; and we are sure that those who once obtain it and give it a fair trial will not thereafter be willing to be without it.

A VALUABLE MEDICINE.—Dr. Poland's White Pine Compound, advertised in our columns, is a successful attempt to combine and apply the medicinal virtues of the White Pine bark. It has been thoroughly tested by people in this city and vicinity, and the proprietor has testimonials to its value from persons well known to our citizens. We recommend its trial in all those cases of disease to which it is adapted. It is for sale by all our druggists.—Independent.

The White Pine Compound is now sold in every part of the United States and British Provinces.

A good man, but ill-instructed, out West, had a call to preach. Being unable to read, he employed a friend to read the selection from the Scriptures. On one occasion the chapter was the twenty-second of Genesis, which contains these words: "These eight did Milch bear to Nahor, Abram's brother." From these words he proceeded as follows: "Brethren and sisters, let us consider our blessings. We have all the comforts of life. We have flocks and herds, and gladness. Morning and evening our wives and daughters milk the cows, and our wants are all supplied. In the days of good old Abram the case was different; for then, as you have heard, it took eight to milk a bear, and they didn't get much at that."

We have heard of the old lady who triumphantly pointed out the "Epistle to the Romans," and asked where one could be found addressed to the Protestants? The Catholic Mirror happily retorts by telling us of a negro Baptist at the South, who said to the Methodist minister: "You've read the Bible, I s'pose?" "Yes." "Well, you've read in it of John the Baptist, hasn't you?" "Yes." "Well, you never saw nothing about John the Baptist, did you?" "No." "Well, den, you see, dar's Baptist in de Bible, but dere ain't no Methodist, and de Bible's on my side."

A foppish nobleman, who saw Descartes enjoying himself at the table, having expressed surprise that a philosopher should exhibit such fondness for good cheer, got this answer for his pains: "And pray, my lord, did you think that good things were only made for fools?"

EXTREME POLITENESS.—Etiquette requires, in the Chinese conversation, that each should compliment the other and every body belonging to him in the most laudatory style, and deprecate himself, with all pertaining to him, to the lowest possible point. The following is no exaggeration, though not the precise words:

What is your honorable name?

NEW BOOKS.

Some writers seem to fancy there is something in a name, at any rate as far as regards a work of fiction. Perhaps they think that readers are attracted by a title, like plebeian millionaires. We shall not be surprised if, before the year is over, the following new works are announced as being "nearly ready" for the public:

Corks or Bladders. By the Author of Sink or Swim.
The Harvest of a Busy B. By the Author of The Harvest of a Quiet I.

Big Bores. By the Authoress of Little Fozes.

Crack it Up. A Sequel to Live it Down.

Sweets to the Suite. A Tale of the Court; being a Companion work to Tonic Bitters.

As Much Again as Half. By the Author of One too Many.

Cap and Scissors. By the Author of Sword and Gown.

Winks through a Window. A Sensation Sequel to Lights through a Lattice.

Good-tempered Greengages. A Romantic Novel, written by the Author of Cross Currants.

The following is Aunt Betsy's description of her milkman: "He is the meanest man in the world," she exclaimed. "He skims his milk on the top, then turns it over and skims the bottom."

"What are you doing there, Jane?"

"Why, pa, I'm going to dye my doll's pinafore red."

"But what have you got to dye it?"

"Beer."

"Who on earth told you that beer would dye red?"

"Why, ma said it was beer that made your nose so red, and—"

"Here, Susan, take this child."

"Mike, why don't you fire at those ducks? Don't you see you have got the whole flock before your gun?"

"I know I have; but, you see, when I get a good aim at one, two or three others will swim right 'twixt him and me."

A young woman's conundrum. Who is our favorite Roman hero?—Marius.

"Father, why don't we ever see any faces at the window?" asked a son of his parent, as they were passing an insane asylum. "Because their heads are turned," was the affectionate father's reply.

LAUGHING IN THE PULPIT.

Said Mr. C., a Presbyterian minister of some notoriety, "I never laughed in the pulpit only on one occasion, and that came near procuring my dismissal from the ministry. At one of the first discourses I was called to deliver, subsequent to my ordination, after reading my text and opening my subject, my attention was directed to a young man with a very foppish dress and a head of exceeding red hair. In a slip immediately behind this young gentleman sat an urchin, who must have been urged on in his devilry by the Evil One himself, for I do not conceive the youngster thought of the jest he was playing off on the spruced dandy in front of him. The boy held his forefinger in the red hair of the young man about as long as a blacksmith would a nail rod in the fire to heat, and then on his knee commenced pounding his finger in imitation of a smith in making a nail. The whole thing was so ludicrous that I laughed, the only time that I ever disgraced the pulpit with any thing like mirth."

A little boy, returning from the Sunday-school, said to his mother, "Ma, ain't there a kitten-chism for little boys? The cat-chism is too hard!"

The attempt to start an asylum for useless young men failed, as no building could be constructed large enough.

Silk and Bead Mushroom Net.

MATERIALS: Two skeins of black silk twist, crystal beads; a whalebone hoop twenty-inches in circumference.

This net is used for drying mushrooms. The original is made of black silk twist and crystal beads, and is kept in shape by means of a whalebone hoop. On this hoop fasten three cords which terminate in bead tassels. In the centre, which forms the bottom of the net, put a large bead tassel. For making the net cast on a mesh, three-fourths of an inch in diameter, 66 stitches; join in a round, and work 21 rounds; work the 22d round over a mesh a little over an inch in width. Now prepare the bottom of the net with crystal beads; for this string 22 beads, join them in a ring, string again 22 beads, run the thread through the 8th of the last 22 beads, counting from the beginning; in doing which run the needle from left to right, * then string on seven beads, pass over two beads of the ring, and fasten the thread on the thread on which the ring of beads was strung, run it then back through the last five beads, string on seventeen beads, run the thread again, sticking the needle from right to left, through three of the seventeen beads, and repeat from * nine times. At the end of the round string on, instead of 7 beads, only 2, and fasten the thread. In the 2d round join the bottom to the net; for this commence with a new thread, which fasten between the 7th and 8th bead of one of the bead-loops of the last round which are still free, run the thread through the next two beads of this loop, * string on two beads, run the thread through six stitches of the last round of the net, push these stitches close together, run the thread through the 7th and 8th bead of the next loop, and repeat from * in the round. Then fill with crystal beads those holes of the net which extend upward six stitches apart over the knots made by fastening the net to the bead bottom. Begin by joining the thread to one of the squares, then string on four beads, wind the thread around the opposite thread of the square, run the thread back through these beads, again wind around the thread of the square, and string on four beads, and repeat in this manner till the square is filled. In the pattern each square contains three rows of beads.

In passing from one square to another, run the thread through the last row and pass it through the knot. Now fasten the foundation stitches to the whalebone ring by stitches, on each of which is strung 16 beads. At regular distances fasten on the three double cords with tassels. The tassel on the bottom of the net is similar. This net may be also worked of gray wool without beads.

SILK AND BEAD MUSHROOM NET.—REDUCED SIZE.

ADAPTING OURSELVES TO THE NEW AGE.

ONLY the most obtuse sort of people fail to see revolutionary changes when they have fairly set in, and only the most frigidly conservative neglect to conform themselves to their new requirements. Most plastic of things, this world, in its political, social, and circumstantial forms, is ever being moulded into novel shapes, for which we can not altogether prepare beforehand, but which, when challenging us as accomplished facts, we should promptly accept, and as promptly incorporate into our schedule of life. To neglect this is not simply to lag behind the age and be stifled by the dust and debris that its moving wheels leave after them, but it is to cheat yourself of the greatest advantage of society, in losing the impulse which it imparts to all who keep abreast with its mighty movements.

Recent changes have affected the entire economy of American life, and, either directly or indirectly, have extended to every interest, pursuit, and enterprise in the land. No man can think, write, act as he once thought, wrote, acted. Europe after the Crusades was not more thoroughly shaken up than we have been, nor was it more troubled to find solid foundations for the reconstruction of society than we are just now to adapt ourselves to the imperative demands of the strange régime. The trouble is the greater because of the immense complexity of interests, each clamorous for itself, each overstating its own wants and selfishly unmindful of its neighbor's weal. But there is one thing we can all understand, and the sooner we understand it the better for us: viz., the country is too big for any pet interests; too vast for any focal concentration on this or that local need; too much threatened, moreover, with collapse for any sectional or class favoritism. So closely are we now united together, so firmly welded into one compact mass, and so freely does capital circulate from the centres of the country to the extremities, that what one portion feels all must feel, and what works injury in one part does damage to the whole. To some extent this was always the case; and the main oversight in our former management of national matters was in not realizing the deep import of the fact. But as things now stand, a new epoch opening, a new class of problems insisting on a speedy solution, it is the instinctive suggestion of the common mind of the country to shun any and every thing in legislation, or even in sentiment, that would tend to foster one interest at the expense of another, or prejudice one class against another.

The worst sign of degradation is shown by a people when it is too imbecile in mind or too callous in heart to learn any thing from the bitter lessons of experience. Heaven has no help for such, and no pity. In the new condition of affairs our experience in the past is worth more to us than any ancient logic or historic precedents; and if we are skillful to turn that experience to good account, we can extricate ourselves from the entanglements in which we are involved. But fool-hardiness is in the way. And this fool-hardiness is "legion" in the number of its sources and the multitude of its shapes. By the time one enumerates the fool-hardiness of wealth, of extravagance, of affectation, of rash daring, of power, of fanatical intellect, of crazy schemers, he is well-nigh ready to despair of the country. Obviously enough this high-pressure state of things can not last. Business must get back into regular channels. Gambling can not continue to impose upon our credulity by means of handsome words. Speculation must be left to those who can afford to confront risks. And in the present crisis of thought and principle—no less a crisis than that approaching to trade and industry—we can all put forth our manhood to exorcise that demon of looseness and latitudinarianism which has taken up its lodgment in the heart of the country.

One of the greatest of truths is, that a prosperous and powerful people need the self-restraint and the self-guidance which the spirit of exact economy prescribes for public and private life even more than a struggling and suffering people. Prosperity and power have no reality, no permanency, no value, if we let go this old-fashioned, sturdy virtue. A deluge of good-fortune is, indeed, very generally welcomed; men and women have no alarms then, and no forebodings; and Providence is fashionably talked of, and the feeling grows that life after all is worth having. But we do well to remember that it is nevertheless a deluge, and that because it is a deluge it is certain to sweep away a vast amount of honesty, integrity, virtue, and happiness. And hence the need of adaptation—a moral, and social, and political need beyond the compass of words to express. The hardy pioneer who takes his muscle and will from the oaks and rocks with which he keeps company, or Kane near the North Pole, or Du Chaillu in the heart of Africa, can be much more easily acclimated to their hazardous positions than we of this day and country. The air is full of Champagne, very pleasant to breathe, but can we keep our heads?

PRIMROSE-DAYS.

INSCRIBED TO ROSIE REID.

'Tis many a year since last we met—
Twenty years of changing weather;
And yet I never shall forget
The happy days we passed together.

And you were young, and more than fair,
And I was—well! I'm greatly altered;
They're streaks of gray amid my hair,
But still my love has never faltered.

It was my first love—in its way
Something Platonic in affection—
Which might have seen our wedding-day
If guided in the right direction.

But you were young, and I was young:
Our parents said that we were heedless,
And proved that Shakspeare wisely sung
About the course of love—'twas needless.

But still, this feeling which I knew
When life was in its primrose season—
And it was May the whole year through,
Despite of almanacs and reason—

Has never changed, but still remains
The very same, perhaps 'tis stronger;
For love, 'tis said, like lemon-stains,
Gets brighter as it lasts the longer.

I know 'tis folly to recall
The hours we passed with one another,
Ere I was married to Miss Hall,
Or you'd become an anxious mother.

But why—this puzzles me!—at night
Should, in my dreams, you come to bless me,
When all day long, as is but right,
It is my wife who doth caress me?

Am I to live those days again,
In, so to speak, a second childhood,
When, free from life's dull care and pain,
I rambled with you through the wild-wood?

No! precious golden days of youth,
You never can return to cheer me!
And—well, forgive the sober truth—
The days are best that now are near me.

WOODHURST COTTAGE, FORDHAM, June, 1868. BARRY GRAY.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

SATURDAY, JULY 4, 1868.

WHOLESOME NEGLECT.

THE nimia diligentia, the too great diligence, or excessive interference with nature, so emphatically denounced by the satirist, is probably as prevalent a fault in these modern as it was in ancient times. The overbusy finger is nowhere more apparent than in the physical rearing—to which we now only refer—of the young. Children are apt to be regarded merely as lumps of clay, to be fashioned at the will of their parents. They are, however, it should be recollected, living beings, with an inherent principle of growth which is to be developed. The main purpose of education should be to educe this original element, and allow it all the expansion of which it may be capable. It is, however, too often the practice of parents to do the reverse, and try to mould their children into forms of which nature has given no indication.

The artificial process begins as soon as the child is born. The very swaddling-clothes are so many bonds by which it is restrained of the natural freedom of its body, and its growth so directed that it may assume a shape conformable to some conventional notion or other. This continues from infancy upward, and the dress is a constant obstacle to the natural development of the physical structure. Until the mother gets rid of the idea of giving a form to her child, and learns that it is her duty to accept what nature bestows, the health and vigor of whole generation will continue to be sacrificed. In early youth the great essential of physical development is freedom. The clothes, accordingly, should be so loose as to allow of the freest play of the very flexible body and limbs of infancy and childhood. In the cut of their garments no regard should be had to any fashion or notion of taste which may interfere with ease of movement. It is particularly important that there should be no obstacle in early life to the natural growth, for at that period the human structure is composed of a soft and pliable material, which may be made to assume almost any shape, however perverted; and a deformity thus and then produced will remain a deformity forever.

The overanxiety of fastidious mothers in regard to the manners of their children, leads also to an interference with their grace and vigor of growth. Romping boys and girls are often checked for being noisy, while they should be encouraged. Their racing and shouting are instinctive efforts at development, and essential to the strength of lung and muscle. Those who are unable to bear the noise of children are unfit to have or take charge of them.

The lengthened silence and constrained postures imposed by most school-teachers upon their youthful pupils are as inhuman as they are absurd. Let any grown person, in the possession of all his maturity of strength and power of will, place himself or hold a limb in any fixed position, and see how long he can do either. The action, however easy at first, is soon, if persevered in, followed by weariness and pain. There is only a single posture—that of a person lying at full length—which can be borne unchanged for a long time. All other positions of the body and limbs being assumed contrary to gravity, and consequently costing an effort of will and muscle, soon become wearisome, and finally impossible. All muscular action requires variety for relief. It is contrary to nature, therefore, for teachers and parents to enforce fixed positions upon their pupils and children. "Hold up your heads!" "Sit straight!" "Keep down your hands!" "Don't lean on your elbows!" "Don't bend your knees in walking!" and the other importunate commands so often heard in the nursery and school-room, are not seldom harmful interferences with natural action. Nature, after all, is the best posture-master, and gives lessons not only of health but of genuine grace. Let parents and teachers be less busy, and leave their children's bodies and limbs at least to their natural movements and attitudes. Such an abstinence of interference may appear to careful mothers a neglect, but we assure them that it would be a wholesome neglect.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

Another Letter to Jane.

MY DEAR JANE,—I have received your little note asking me what I advise you to do since you must now support yourself, and saying that the occupations really open to women are so few as to be utterly disheartening. Not so few as you suppose, my dear Jane. You meet this subject for the first time, and you know very little about it. But a woman like Mrs. Dall, who has made it the point of her reflection and investigation for many years, can tell you in how many handicrafts women are engaged and proficient. Fifty years ago all the dry-goods and grocery shops in Nantucket were kept by women, who went twice a year to Boston to renew their stock. In 1745 a sister-in-law of Dr. Franklin was printer to the Colony of Rhode Island. And she advertised that besides the laws she would print linens, calicoes, and silks in lively and durable colors. Margaret Draper printed the Boston News-Letter, and was so good a Tory that the British Government pensioned her when the Revolution began. There are a great many women employed in printing-offices now, and a very few years ago a Printers' Convention at Springfield, in Illinois, resolved that the employment of women in printing-offices was a decided benefit in point of morals and steady work, and offered better wages to a deserving class; and the gallant and sensible printers recommended such employment wherever practicable.

And now that we are in for it, my dear Jane, let us look at a few more facts that are interesting as well as serviceable. Twenty years ago, in the textile manufactures of the United States (and if textile is a hard word, say woven fabrics), there were 53,828 men employed and 75,710 women. This proportion, or a still greater, appears in all the factory returns of that time. Then there were twenty-seven other employments mentioned in that census which engaged about 7000 women. The occupations ranged from makers of glue and grinders of watch-crystals up to physicians and stereotypers. Mrs. Dall adds ten other employments from her own experience. The census of the city of Boston for 1845 gives twenty-eight employments in which women were engaged. But there were many omitted. Five years later there were twice as many women as men making shoes in the shoemaking town of Lynn. But "Hannah binding shoes" received only half as much money in wages. All such facts, of course, are very imperfectly collected; and the result of observing them is that the number of women who are employers is absurdly disproportioned to that of those who are employed.

Now, my dear Jane, I know that you will ask me of what use can it be to you to know that there are so many possible employments, when you are not skilled in any; and you will add that, even if you were, you know how coldly, even if politely, your offer to work would generally be received. But there you are not quite correct. It is only in a certain kind of employment that the woman is considered to be at least a doubtful worker. And even there it springs from a false theory both upon her part and that of the employer. In many instances the fault is in the woman. I remember, my dear Jane, when the School of Design was started in New York, the object was to instruct women as designers of patterns for muslins and prints of all kinds, and a class was formed of wood-engravers. I was interested in the school, and it seemed to me that women might especially succeed as wood-engravers, so I went to one of the most experienced and successful engravers in the city and consulted with him.

"Don't you see the difficulty?" he asked, with great kindness and interest.

"No," said I; "you must instruct me."

"Well," answered he, "I have employed women here very often, and I wish I could feel more encouraged. But the truth is, that when a young man comes to me, and begins his work, he feels that it is his life's business. He is to cut his future out of the little blocks before him. Wife, family, home, happiness, are all to be carved by his hand, and he settles steadily and earnestly to his labor, determined to master it, and with every incitement spurring him on. He can not marry until he knows his trade. It is exactly the other way with the girl. She may be as poor as the youth, and as wholly dependent upon her labor for her living. But she feels that she will probably be married by-and-by, and then she must give up wood-engraving. So she goes on listlessly, she has no ambition to excel; she does not feel that her happiness depends upon it. She will marry, and then her husband's wages will support her. She may not say so," said the engraver, "but she thinks so, and it spoils her work."

It is idle to say that a girl ought not to think so; that she ought to remember that every girl is not married, and that many of the noblest and most famous and most useful women in the world have been single. My dear Jane, I do not quarrel with any apple blossom upon that tree in the orchard because it secretly believes that by next October it will be a fine, round, rosy, ripe apple. Its deepest instinct is to believe it. I know that the relentless storms of September may shake it off; that the worms and insects may ruin it; and that, even if it survive to be an apple, it may be a wretched, withered, gnarly, sour little failure of a fruit. But it is an apple blossom, and it asks what are apple blossoms for but to become apples? I confess that I have no answer to that question. And when the young girl says, "I shall probably be married, and then my husband will earn our living," I am dumb again, and I feel profoundly that Queen Elizabeth, and Elizabeth Fry, and Dorothea Dix are no reply.

Besides, here is the usual tone of feeling and conversation confirming my young lady in her opinion, and appealing to the very instinct itself as proof. The clergymen and the lecturers—many of them, the excellent Timothy Titcomb among them—declare that the heaven-ordained career of woman is the family, which is undoubtedly true as a proposition, but is senseless as an argument in the discussion. Then come the poets, those prodigious mischief-makers; and somebody in the "Spanish Student" says, "What I most prize in woman is her affections, not her intellect." True for you, high-stepping Don of the blue blood—but après? What then? Are you positively enamored of fools and simpletons, provided they are affectionate? Then, as for the newspapers, alas! my dear Jane, hearing this sort of talk upon all sides, what is a poor woman to do but to say to my friend the engraver, "I am willing to learn this business, because I must do something for my living. But I am sure all the time that Frederick Augustus Alfonso is coming up stairs, and when he arrives and knocks at the door, and asks me if I am ready, I must, of course, drop my knife and wish you good-morning."

Then what is my friend the engraver to do but say, "My dear young lady, I should never have been a master engraver upon that principle, nor could I have built up any business whatever; and as here is my young friend John, who has his living to earn, and wishes to earn it by wood-engraving, and I have room but for one, I must take the one who can be of most service to me and to himself; and so, before Frederick Augustus Alfonso has even reached the first landing, I must, with the sincerest regret, wish you a good-morning."

Of course, the poor girl is bewildered. She had a natural feeling, which has been carefully fostered by all the influences around her. She expresses it, and this is the hard result. Now, if I met her upon the stairs, as she came perplexed and sorrowful down, I should say to her: "My dear, listen to an old bachelor, who would gladly help you. You are right in supposing that the natural domestic destiny of a young woman is marriage. But you make two mistakes. The first is in assuming that, of course, you will be married, when you see that, despite the destiny, so many young women remain single; and the second mistake is, in supposing that a married woman need not have any remunerative employment. I grant you that there are difficulties. A poor woman, with young children, whom she must take care of, because she can not hire a nurse to take care of them, can not go very regularly to an engraver's office to work. That is plain, and why deny it? Then all I say is, that if Frederick Augustus Alfonso does come, you may be taken from your work either partly or wholly. If only partly, you will have made a great mistake if you have so imperfectly and carelessly learned it as not to make your labor desirable to an employer. If wholly, then a result will have occurred which it was foolish in you to take for granted. It is fair and true enough to say that it is the destiny of women to be mothers. But, now that you are obliged to earn your living, remember that it is very probable that you will be an exception; and, even if you should not be, remember that no work which is not good work will give you a living, and that work is good only by being sincere and intelligent. What is worth doing, says Poor Richard, is worth doing well."

When I was in Italy, my dear Jane, I was one day in the studio of a celebrated sculptor—well, why should I not say at once, since I am going to tell only an honorable story, that it was the studio of Hiram Powers—and we were speaking of his early struggles and his great success.

"Why, Mr. Bachelor," said the sculptor, "I was a very young man when I was married, and I hadn't a cent in the world beyond my wages; and my wife hadn't a cent either. What did we do? We clubbed our industry and determination, and when we were married each of us thought himself twice as rich as before."

And so they were; and I commend the story to the attention of people who think that they can not afford to marry. But what was the secret of this wealth of united poverty? It is very plain. Each felt it to be a duty to contribute to the common support, and mutual affection made it a pleasure, and stimulated to the utmost exertion. We wise people shake our heads dolefully over young men who have no profession or no employment. But why not over young women? It does not matter how rich a youth may be, we say, he ought to know how to do something. And how about the young women? If we do not expect or require them to have any means of support we expect them all to be rich or to be maintained by husbands. Very well, my dear Jane, in Massachusetts there is a prodigious surplus of unmarried women in the population. Nor only that, but there are a great many more women of all conditions than men, thousands and thousands of them. Now, if all of these thousands who can not marry because there are not men enough, are not rich enough to support themselves, and have not rich uncles and brothers enough to support them, what are they to do? The Reverend Doctor Slopely tells us that God planted the first pair in the Garden and all subsequent pairs in the nursery, and that home is woman's sphere, and the care of the cradle her natural right. Brother Flapdoodle informs us in his paper of the same fact. Will Slopely and Flapdoodle have the goodness to mention upon which male person the female person for whom no mate is provided is to draw for her next quarter's rent? In the actual circumstances would it not be just as wise for us to exhort all young women to train themselves to earn their own living as we exhort young men? Then, if Frederick Augustus Alfonso does come up stairs and knock at the door, they may go with him, and return or not as they choose. But don't, my dear Jane, work listlessly because he may come. If you do you will be as exquisitely foolish as Frederick himself, if he should learn his trade carelessly, because some old uncle might return from India and make him a millionaire upon the spot. The chance is greater in your case, I allow, but it is a certainty in neither; and you must not act upon a chance.

I have not answered your question, dear Jane, but I have made my first approach, as they say in siege operations; and I know you've had enough for to-day. Keep up a stout heart, and believe me your true friend,

AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

SUMMER BONNETS.

SOMETHING new in bonnets and round hats is always anticipated during the present week. The Chantilly races incite French milliners to daring deeds of invention, and their contemporaries on this side of the water find, since the turf has become a fashionable institution here, that their customers expect something fresh and original for the gala days at Fordham Park. One of our leading milliners defers her opening of round hats until June, which is quite early enough for the races and watering-places, and yet gives her the benefit of any late foreign novelties. Other milliners have added to their early importations many graceful and eccentric designs, varying from the tiny puffed fanchon, or the diadem and mantilla, to the broad-rimmed Marie Antoinette, and the sea-side "Mandarin."

The picturesque mantilla bonnet is the most attractive of the summer styles, and is selected for evening drives, for fêtes, and the watering-places. The mantilla veil draping the head and shoulders is the principal feature of the bonnet, and gives its name to the coiffure. It meets with such favor in Paris that it is prophesied that we shall soon banish the bonnet altogether, adopting the veil in its stead. The French Empress is partial to the fashions of her native Spain, and now that her youth is gone she finds the coquettish drapery of her countrywomen becoming and useful, as it softens and conceals the ravages of time. While this pretty caprice revives fading beauty it is equally capable of heightening youthful charms.

This Spanish fashion has made black lace a universal favorite for summer bonnets. It was once thought that black lace was only suitable for elderly ladies; but gossamer tulle and Chantilly in fanciful puffs and flowing drapery, ornamented with field flowers, with metallic leaves, and real butterflies and insects, are gay enough for the most youthful belle of the season.

An elegant bonnet from the Maison Laure, Paris, a house celebrated for its rich laces, is of the finest Chantilly. The shape is the smallest possible fanchon with a raised diadem, in the centre of which is a large jet ornament with an aigrette of the gay plumage of the colibri on each side. This is called a Marie Antoinette aigrette, as it stands quite erect. A tassel or full of the lace falls beneath the chignon on the shoulders, while the mantilla veil is brought forward and crossed on the breast, falling far below the waist. The price is $75.

Another is a diadem fanchon; that is, as its name declares, a diadem of lace quilled on a bandeau. It is scarcely two inches wide on the top, but is fitted so snugly to the head, and the diadem is so prominent, that it has quite the appearance of a bonnet, giving the wearer a stately air instead of the frivolous look one would naturally connect with this tiny coiffure. A band of cut steel that glitters like diamonds holds the quilling securely. A crimson rose with trailing vine and buds ornaments the left side. Wide black lace strings, fastened with a lace rosette and rose-buds.

Among the flowers used are field blossoms of every hue, arranged in the same cluster. These are prettily made of feathers, imitating nature admirably. Dark crimson roses, and bright Solferino shades are seen instead of the invariable scarlet rose so long worn. Diadems are made of dwarfed wheat, half ripe, or metallic leaves of a golden brown or yellowish green shade. Ivy and myrtle leaves of the deepest green, and trailing grasses hang loosely over the chignon.

A bridal bonnet of white embroidered tulle is formed of three puffs, separated by rouleaux of white satin. The coronet is a wreath of the white eglantine, or the wild rose. Drooping sprays of the same flower with its glossy green leaves and tendrils fall backward from the front. A deep mantilla of tulle edged with lace hangs over the shoulders almost to the waist, and is held together in front by a rosette of satin and eglantine buds.

A similar bonnet is of plain white blonde with a spray of clematis on the coronet, extending down the left side to mingle with the long crépé curl now worn over the shoulder. A Marie Antoinette aigrette, which stands upward, is fastened on the right with a pearl ornament.

A white chip bonnet, evidently French, is of an eccentric shape that can only be worn by a very stylish person. The crown is flat and square, with a pointed front turned up at the sides, and flaring out from the face. A black ostrich feather in the centre of the front extends over the top to the back. At the left is a large rosette of blue satin. A moss rose-bud and leaves inside the pointed front serve as face trimming. Narrow blue strings tie behind.

The prettiest straw bonnets are made of straw lace in guipure patterns over colored silk. Rows of the lace are sewn together, and finished with a straw fringe at the back. A tasteful one over green silk has a velvet coronet, surmounted by a row of pansies. Strings of green corded ribbon, with straw lace down the centre.

ROUND HATS.

Among round hats the Marie Antoinette is selected for the sea-side and watering-places. This has already been made familiar to many of our readers by Ristori's faithful copy of the costumes of that beautiful queen. It has a high flat crown, with broad rim gracefully curved. A very stylish one is of chip. A long blue ostrich feather fastened in front by a jet agrafe extends over the top of the hat, hanging down on the rim. Inside the rim is a quilling of blue ribbon. Another of black lace has a wreath of roses and moss clambering over it. A hat of rich Tuscan straw has the rim covered with black lace. A spray of sweet-brier clammers over the crown. Another of modest elegance is of brown Dunstable straw bound with satin, of the dull dead-leaf brown shade, not the reddish Bismarck. A rosette of quilled satin in front forms the agrafe for a long ostrich feather that curves over the crown to the rim.

Another sea-side and garden hat is appropriately called the "Mandarin." It is broad and flat like the Chinese umbrellas, and serves at once for bonnet and parasol. It approaches almost to a point in the centre. The only trimming is a cluster of lace, ribbon, and wheat ears directly on the top. A veil of spotted tulle is fixed permanently to the hat beneath the trimming on the top, and falls below the rim all round. A row of black lace trims the rim inside.

A jaunty hat, designed for the races, is called the "Nymph." A favorite model is of black crinoline. It is simply a high, round crown, encircled with parallel rows of black satin piping. A quilling of lace with a vine of jet leaves in the centre forms the only rim or border. At the side is a cluster of field daisies, wild violets, and corn-flowers. A mantilla veil of dotted blonde falls over the chignon, and is caught in front by a similar cluster of flowers.

Turbans are worn very high, and are broad enough to fit the head and reach slightly over the chignon, a more comfortable shape than the narrow-peaked hats of last season. The rim is curved outward, and turned up around the edge. A fall of lace, shaped like the mantilla veil, but narrower, is added to turbans, giving them very much the appearance of bonnets. They are surrounded by steel bands for trimming. Flowers and lace are sewn on the curved borders.

Traveling hats of piqué, of linen, and shirred cambric, made on rattans and cords, are in favor. Pretty models were illustrated in a former Number of the Bazar.

VARIETIES IN DRESS.

Foreign correspondents advise that the rumor of the probable abandonment of trains is not without foundation. Already many fashionable Parisiennes have appeared in what are called round-skirted costumes. These are neither very long nor very short, but are a return to the medium-length skirts worn before trains were adopted for full dress, and short dresses considered indispensable for the street.

The ball of the Countess de Pourtales, where all the ladies were requested to appear in short dresses, has given fresh impetus to the idea of introducing short skirts for dancing. Long trains are graceful when gracefully worn, but they are a burden in a crowded ball-room to both the wearer and her partner. Gentlemen advocate the Pourtales skirt, and prove their zeal in the cause by selecting partners whose drapery will not interfere with the pleasure of the dance.

We have already mentioned the suggestion of one of our most tasteful importers of French costumes, that short muslin dresses for evening may be made available for promenade and driving costumes by the addition of a fichu or polonaise. A pretty dress of this kind is of white organdy over pink poul de soie. The skirt has a flounce ten inches deep, headed by a double ruffle edged with narrow Valenciennes. On the gored front and side widths are simulated sashes, descending from the belt to the knee, made of Valenciennes insertion and lace. The low waist is formed of lengthwise puffs graduating smaller toward the belt, and separated by insertion. Wide neck-band of lace. Short puffed sleeves. In the ball-room the skirt is to be festooned on each side by a bouquet of roses. A paletot, with Marie Antoinette sleeves and short sash of wide pink ribbon, is added for the street.

A novelty in dress goods is Chambéry gauze over satin of a contrasting color, producing the beautiful chameleon effect now so much in vogue. A dark rich combination, suitable for a brunette, is black gauze over cherry satin; for a blonde, transparent white over sea-green, and blue over gold. Pearl gray and pink, lavender and butter-cup color, and green over rose, are displayed together, blending with pleasing effect. These goods come in dress patterns, of which there are no duplicates. The gauze is arranged over the satin and folded with it as they are to be cut together. The price is $80.

Chambéry gauze is the favorite material of the season for full dress. It has all the lustre and light gossamer appearance of grenadine, but is more substantial, and does not so soon become limp and stringy. White is especially desirable for evening dress, trimmed with satin bands of a bright color piped with white. Stripes of butter-cup color, of violet, wood color, or grass green alternating with white, are made with long skirts scalloped at the edge, and bound with satin of the same shade as the stripe. The scallops must be faced with white net to stiffen them and prevent curling up. The net facing is not hemmed at the upper edge, as it is held securely by the binding. A blue and white Chambéry gauze has all the widths of the skirt but the front one, cut in sharp scallops two inches deep and bound with blue satin. The scallops extend up the side seams, overlapping the front breadth. A Marie Antoinette flounce, widening to the knee in the centre, extends across the front width. Low waist and fichu. A solid white Chambéry has a box-pleated flounce, bound on both sides with lavender. Three bands of cross-cut satin—lavender piped with white—descend from the belt sweeping around toward the side. Similar bands put on in crescent shape form a tablier trimming in front. The low corsage has Grecian folds on the breast alternately of satin and Chambéry. Shallow bands for sleeves.

A pale shade of buff just now in favor is described by fashion writers under several different names, such as sulphur, corn color, salmon, and lastly coulour d'Isabelle, suggestive to those versed in Spanish history of soiled linen. An imported suit of Spanish linen of this peculiar shade, plainly made with two skirts and paletot, trimmed with black embroidered stars, is valued at $100. The rare color, and the Parisian make of the garment, are the items that make up the bill rather than the intrinsic value of the materials.

Foulard silks in this new tint are selected for afternoon dresses. Dark brown and gray foulards, with skirts of different shades of the same color, were made up for the Jerome races. Mantillas and pelerine capes loosely tied behind are worn over the polonaise. When there are two skirts the mantilla is the only wrapping. A suit of blue Japanese foulard has the lower skirt bordered with a box-pleated flounce. The upper skirt is scalloped around and edged with fringe. The back widths are puffed up en paniers. Plain high waist and coat-sleeves. A scarf mantle fits snugly over the shoulders, and is passed under the belt back and front.

An elegant carriage toilette is of poul de soie of the new buff tint. The untrimmed trained skirt has tapes attached half-way down the back seams, with corresponding ones at the waist, by which the skirt is bunched up to produce the panier effect. The over-dress is longer in front and back than at the sides. The scalloped edges are bound with capucine satin, beneath which is a fall of wide Chantilly lace. The jacket, half-adjusted to the figure, is trimmed with folds of brown satin put on lengthwise with a piping of capucine satin. Chantilly edging held slightly full is sewn each side of the folds.

A unique addition to dressy toilettes is a kind of apron which almost forms a third skirt. It is cut long and rounding in front, sloping upward at the sides to the back, where it is held by a rosette or bow with sash ends. The upper skirt is raised at the sides and back in large puffs, and trimmed like the apron with cross-cut bands of satin. The lower skirt is plain.

A black velvet waistband, resembling the peasant waists formerly worn, is beaded with jet. At the back and sides are cords and tassels for looping up the skirts of the dress.

The cardinal collar of linen, two inches wide all around, shaped to fit the slope of the neck, is selected for breakfast and street dress, instead of the standing collar. The (Oxford or sailor's collar, deeply pointed on the shoulder, is worn by young ladies and blondes. Such breadth of plain linen is found to be very trying to dark complexions. A band of velvet, either black or colored, worn above the collar, is a relief to the glazed surface. We again remind our readers that dresses are cut very much lower at the throat, and simply corded without the standing binding lately worn.

A negligée sacque for cool mornings is of white moutonné, faced on the under side with Solferino opera flannel. The edges are scalloped and worked in seed stitch with white floss.

Bathing suits of buff, blue, white, and scarlet serge are made with full blouses pleated into a square yoke. The sleeves are full and gathered into a band at the wrist. The trowsers are buttoned at the sides and held full at the ankle, like the Garibaldi pants worn by boys. The trimming is wide braid of a contrasting color. Self-colored flannels and the shepherd's plaid, small black and white check, make neat and inexpensive suits trimmed with black braid. Plain flannel suits may be bought as low as $4. The serge, fancifully trimmed with appliqué of merino in fanciful designs, varies from $10 to $25.

Thanks are due Mesdames PAGE; FLAMMÉ; FERRERO; DIEDEN; VIRFOLET; and BAILLARD; and Messrs. A. T. STEWART & Co.

PERSONAL.

SOME years ago, when MARIO and Mrs. MARIO were singing in this country, he was not a little annoyed by the nightly attendance at the opera of a thin, bony old lady, who draped herself in the most expensive and conspicuous of silks, and in the stage-box, which she always took (the party had money), sat and leveled her soft glances at the great tenor. She followed him throughout Europe and this country for the pleasure of indulging in that little bit of admiration. Something of the same sort has happened to Lord LYONS. When in Washington he was introduced to a very handsome lady, Mlle. T— G—, whose mother was a Spaniard and father a Frenchman, but a naturalized American citizen, residing near New Orleans. As it was at the young lady's request the first introduction took place, Lord LYONS was very polite toward her, almost to the verge of a flirtation. Time rolled on; his lordship came to Paris, and the young lady went to St. Petersburg. The rumored marriage of Lord LYONS with the widow of a noble brother diplomatist brought his admirer from St. Petersburg. She sends daily invitations to his lordship to join her dinner-parties, to come to her balls; she presents him with costly gifts that are immediately returned. Being rich, well-connected, and witty, she has the entree to every circle, and is sure to arrive soon as his lordship, about whose movements she is kept well-informed. The French ladies humor the lady's whims; but the matter is becoming so annoying that the first lady in France has promised to use her influence in the rescue of the hard-hearted Ambassador from his fair tormentor.

—Speaking of hats: DANIEL WEBSTER wore a hat the size of which was seven and five-eighths; THURLOW WEED wears the same size; ABRAHAM LINCOLN's was seven and one-sixteenth; DANIEL LORD's, six and seven-eighths; HORACE GREELEY's, seven and one-half; JAMES GORDON BENNETT's, seven and three-eighths. Mr. JAMES T. BRADY has a head as large as that of any public man in the country.

—Bishop TUTTLE, just translated from the diocese of Montana to that of Missouri, is the youngest American bishop, and the youngest ever consecrated to that office. He is thirty-one years old, and possesses uncommon energy and ability. He was elected Missionary Bishop of Montana in 1866, but, on account of age, was not eligible for consecration until last year.

—The language of compliment has seldom been carried to a higher point than by VICTOR HUGO, who, in reply to an extravagant puff addressed to him by a lady, replied: "You, Madame, are the daughter of a poet and the wife of a poet, daughter of a king and wife of a king; you are a queen yourself and more than a queen—a Muse. Your aurora smiles on the darkness of my night. Thanks, Madame; and I kiss your feet!"

—Mr. BURLINGAME is not a Yankee, although his political career was commenced in Massachusetts. He was born in Chenango County in this State, and the Chenangonians have just got awakened to a lively sense of the importance of that natalitious occurrence.

—The patricians of France are now and then quite as rough with their wives as the patricians of Ireland. The Duke de MOUCHY, who married the Princess ANNA MURAT, has been guilty of flogging his wife repeatedly. Once she forgave him; but when he repeated the offense she quit his "bed and board" forever. She is said to be very beautiful, and, by all odds, the best member of the Murat family.

—Another MURAT—Prince ACHILLE—is now in the papers as having just married a lady who claims to be a lineal descendant of MEDEA, the lady who indiscreetly compromised her husband with Captain JASON. The noble houses of England who are proud to trace their descent from some companion of the Conqueror, are, genealogically speaking, families of yesterday in comparison with many of the Continental nobility—such, for example, as the MASSIMI, of Rome, who can show a clear line of descent from FABRUS MAXIMUS. There is now in the English navy a lieutenant, GEORGE PALBOLOGUS by name, who, as the lineal heir of the PALBOLOGI, is a claimant of the throne of the ancient Greek Emperors of the East, and whose pedigree in antiquity and splendor surpasses that of any of the haughtiest houses of England.

—An article of interest recently appeared in the Paris Figaro in regard to the New York Press. The writer remarks:

"With the exception of Harper's Weekly the illustrated papers are not worthy of the name or even of being mentioned. Their coarse and somewhat licentious engravings meet with that success that an appearance of nakedness, however modest, would create at school."

—The eccentricities of Mr. BANCROFT furnish pleasant topics of chat for Berlin folk. The latest concerning him is, that he has become a great admirer of the daughter of MEYERBEER, the renowned composer. Mr. BANCROFT is always to be found at the residence of MEYERBEER's widow, who lives with her daughters and her son-in-law, the celebrated painter, RICHTER, in a very beautiful villa in the Thiergarten. One of her daughters is not yet married, passably young, passably good-looking, has read a good deal, is a good conversationalist, and just the sort of a woman learned men like to talk with. Mr. BANCROFT is her most constant attendant. The other day he was taking a walk with her and the other ladies in the Thiergarten, when a lady and two cavaliers, all mounted on splendid horses, passed them at the full gallop. "How magnificent that looks!" exclaimed Miss MEYERBEER; "how I envy that lady for being so good a horse-woman!" "Why do not you ride on horseback, Miss MEYERBEER?" asked Mr. BANCROFT. "Because I have nobody to ride with me, and a lady, you know, can not take rides without a cavalier." "I shall learn to ride," said BANCROFT, "and in four weeks you shall have a cavalier." BANCROFT kept his word. Despite his sixty years, he took riding lessons, and on the 1st of May he and CECILIA MEYERBEER were seen on horseback in the Thiergarten. A pretty good romance for Berlin, but inaccurate as to the horse; for Mr. BANCROFT has been known for many years as one of the most frequent and one of the best equestrians in Central Park.

—The custom of allowing the bride to enjoy a monopoly of the wedding presents was not adhered to at a recent fashionable wedding in St. Louis. The groom was substantially remembered in a special douceur, the donor of which was the bride's mother. In a silver urn or pitcher was a plain-looking bit of paper, which was found to be, by those who had the curiosity to examine it, a check in his favor for $25,000. What a model mamma-in-law!

He is a brother of the late Prince ALBERT, and the heir to the throne is the Duke of Edinburgh, the sailor prince. Queen VICTORIA has been requested, as guardian of her son's right, to allow the duchy to pass to King WILLIAM. It has only 159,431 inhabitants, and covers only 816 square miles.

—An incident highly creditable to the PRINCE OF WALES occurred at the late annual dinner of the Royal Academy, which is thus described in a letter from London to the Chicago Tribune:

"The Royal Academy dinner, given before the exhibition of paintings is opened to the world, is one of the most exclusive in England. Cabinet Ministers and a few dignitaries are invited by right of their position; but an Academician who wishes a person not of that class to be invited must subject the name to a ballot, wherein one black ball is fatal. Mr. BRIGHT is an admirer of paintings, and some one, without his knowledge, has, on two or three occasions, suggested that he be asked to become a guest. Up to this year, however, a black ball has excluded him. To the dinner just held he was invited unanimously. The PRINCE OF WALES, who was in the chair, seeing Mr. BRIGHT in the room, shook hands with him, and had a long talk with the Radical Chief. The Prince then expressed to the managers of the dinner a desire that Mr. BRIGHT should be called upon to speak, and suggested that he respond to the toast for the House of Commons. This, however, was impracticable, another member having already been solicited to perform the duty. It was proposed to initiate a toast to 'Trade and Commerce,' and Mr. BRIGHT was begged to speak upon it; but, whether he guessed that he was being asked to speak for mere curiosity-sake or not, or for some other reason, he declined, and was not, in point of fact, included among the orators of the night. Before the company separated the PRINCE OF WALES told Mr. BRIGHT he had felt nervous in having to propose so many sentiments. Mr. BRIGHT said there was no reason for the nervousness, as he had spoken very well. 'Oh,' said the Prince, 'it was not the company which made me nervous, but the task of having to speak before so great an orator as yourself.' While every thing is told which can depict the PRINCE OF WALES as careless, frivolous, and I know not what, a circumstance which shows his good sense and his independence of the commonest prejudices of the aristocratic class ought not to be omitted."

—FANNY ELLISER, who pirouetted in this country five-and-twenty years ago, is now 57 years old, having been born in Vienna in 1811. What stretch of the imagination can associate her former "sylph-like form" with the unsylph-like form commonly bestowed by cruel nature upon the sex in the second half century of their existence? She is said to have inherited a superfluity of vulgar flesh which gives her an appearance altogether mundane, and limbs very unlike those with which she pirouetted herself into the affections and the pockets of the admirers of the "human form divine." What a modest maiden was that who did a pas seul before King Herod, and when told that whatever she might ask would be granted, contented herself with asking for the caput of John the Baptist, which she got and carried away on a charger; but our modern danseuse took the young heads of a whole city, and was herself the "charger" of a high price for doing it—five hundred dollars a night.

End of Cap String or Cravat.

THE illustration gives this end in the full size. It consists of a tatted medallion and an edge of tatted lace, and is worked in fine tatted cotton with two threads. Work, first, the two rosettes which form the centre of the medallion, and afterward the insertion that incloses the rosettes. The larger rosette is worked as follows: Tie together the foundation thread and working thread, and work with the last alone a ring of 10 ds. (double stitches), 1 p. (picot), an eighth of an inch in length, 10 ds.; * at the end of this ring, which is to be held downward in working, work over the foundation thread 8 ds., 1 p., 8 ds., by which is formed one of the scallops which are seen on the pattern. Then turn the work again, and work close on the end of this a ring like the other, but in this case, instead of making a new picot, join to the picot of the former ring. From * repeat four times. After this work another scallop, and fasten both threads to the foundation thread of the first scallop, where it is joined to the first ring. This completes the first round of the rosette. Then work on this the second round: first, over the foundation thread, beginning where the threads are joined * 6 ds., 1 p., 5 ds.; fasten to the picot of the next scallop of the former round, and work 5 ds., 1 p., 6 ds.; join to the thread between two scallops and repeat five times from *. This completes the large rosette. The smaller rosette is worked in the same manner as the large one, the second round being omitted. The insertion border is worked in two rounds as follows: For making the outer round tie the foundation and working threads together, and work *, first, with only one thread, a ring of 8 ds., 1 p., an eighth of an inch in length, 8 ds.; then turn this ring downward, and work over the foundation thread 6 ds., 1 p., 6 ds., which forms one of the scallops of the insertion. Again turn the work, and work close to the scallop a ring like the first, but, instead of making a picot, join to the picot of the first ring. Having again turned the work, make a scallop like the first, and repeat from * fifteen times; but the scallops on the under part of the medallion must count a few more ds. than the others. Having completed the last scallop, fasten the working thread to the first ring, and cut it off. The second (inside) round is worked like the other, but the rings must all be worked without picots, and fastened to the rings of the first round instead, as shown in the illustration; and the scallops are smaller, counting only 5 ds., 1 p., 5 ds. Sew the finished edge to the rosettes, fastening both on pasteboard to prevent their being drawn out of shape, and in sewing twist the long threads in the manner shown in the pattern. The medallion is now joined to the end of the ribbon, the remaining outer edge having been previously edged with a round of double stitches, which is worked over a foundation thread and joined at regular distances to the outer edge of the scallops of the insertion round. The number of stitches between two picots varies, and is to be noticed in the pattern. For making the lace tie together the two working threads, and * work with only one thread a ring of 8 ds., 1 p., 8 ds.; now turn the work, and work close to the ring just finished, also with only one thread, a ring of 2 ds., nine times alternating 1 p., 2 ds., after which fasten this ring to the former one at the point where the stitches were joined in a ring, so that both rings stand opposite each other as shown in the pattern. Having again turned the work, work over the foundation thread 9 ds., which forms one of the scallops which join the rings, and repeat from *. The lace must be sewed on the ribbon and medallion

Bead Cover.

MATERIALS: Green glass beads of two shades, crystal beads, strong white thread.

This cover is so pretty that it is well worth the trouble of making. The figures which form the design are worked singly, and are then put on pasteboard, on which the design is drawn, and joined with a bead cord, as shown in the illustration. The different colors are distinguishable by the shading on the pattern. Begin with the central rosette figure, and for the 1st round, string on 16 beads, and join these in a ring by again running the thread through the first bead. 2d round.—String on three beads, * run the thread through the first bead of the first round, then again through the last of the three beads just strung on; string on two beads, and repeat from *. At the end of the round string on only one bead, and put the needle through the first bead of the round, then through the corresponding bead of the former round, then again through the first and second beads of this round. 3d round.—String

END OF CAP STRING OR CRAVAT.

String on four beads, * run the thread through the next upright bead of the former round, and repeat in the round. At the end of the round run the thread through the first bead of this round. 4th round.—Alternately string on five beads, passing over three beads of the last round, and run the thread through the next bead. Finally, put the thread through the first three beads of this round. 5th round.—In this round work simultaneously the bead stems which serve to hold the leaves of the rosette. * string on six beads, run the thread—passing over the last bead—back through the other five beads, and then through the middle and last two beads of the five beads of the last round; string on one bead, run the thread through the next three beads, and repeat from *. At the end of the last single bead which is strung on work, now, the first of the eight leaves of the rosette in four backward and forward rounds, as follows: 1st round.—String on fifteen beads, and, passing over the last three, run the thread back through the remaining twelve, and through the opposite bead of the 5th round of the rosette, and then again back through the first four of the thirteen beads. 2d round.—String on three beads, passing over two; run the thread through the next bead (from right to left), and again back through the last of the three beads; * string on two beads, run the thread through the next bead of the 1st round, and again back through the last of the two beads; repeat from * five times, then run the thread through the 14th, 13th, and 12th beads of the 1st round, and again back through the 13th. 3d round.—String on four beads, * run the thread through the next upright bead of the former round, string on one bead, repeat five times from *, string on one bead, and run the thread through the first two beads of the second round. 4th round.—String on two beads, run thread through the 3d, 2d, and 1st bead of the 1st round, and also through the bead lying opposite, then back again through the first bead of the 1st round; string on two beads, run the thread through the first two beads of this round, * string on three beads, run the thread through the next bead of the 3d round (from right to left), and through the last of the three beads just strung on (from left to right), string on two beads, run thread in the next bead of the 3d round, and (from left to right) through the last of the two beads just strung on, from * repeat four times, then string on three beads, run the thread through the 2d bead of the 4th round, and then through the upper bead of the opposite bead stem, string on three beads, run the thread back through the 13th bead of the 1st round, and through the 1st and 2d beads of the 3d round, then through all the beads of the 1st round of the leaf and through the opposite beads of the 5th round of the rosette, as far as the next bead which was strung on this round, from whence work the following leaf: For each of the palm figures which are joined to the central rosette, work, first, the outer border in four backward and forward rounds as follows: 1st round.—String on 100 beads, then, passing over the last six beads, run the thread through the 7th bead, counting from the end of the first round. 2d round.—* string on three beads, run the thread through the third following bead, and repeat from * twenty-nine times; string on five beads, passing over one, and run the thread through the last two beads. 3d round.—String on six beads, run the thread through the middle three of the last five beads of the former round; * string on three beads, run the thread through the middle bead of the next three beads, and repeat from * to the end of the round, where the thread must be run through the last and 7th bead of the first round, after which work back on the other side of the 1st round the 4th round.—String on three beads, run the thread through the second following bead of the first round, then run it again back through the last of the three beads, * string on three beads, run the thread through the third following bead, and repeat from * to the end of the round. Now work the palm stripes within the border in the manner shown. Having worked thus far, the remainder of the cover may easily be worked by referring to the illustration.

Crochet Edging.

This edging is used for trimming bed-covers, cradle-covers, antimacassars, etc. It is worked of crochet cotton of medium fineness, the thick part crosswise, in ribbed crochet stitch. Begin with a foundation of 22 stitches; passing over the last of these work backward in the remainder 1 sc. (single crochet) in each stitch. At the end of the second round begin the first figure of the design: for this crochet in the 16th stitch of the round 1 ch. (chain stitch), 3 dc. (double crochet), 1 ch.; crochet, also, four chain stitches at the end of this row, in order to gradually widen the lace, and, passing over the last stitch, work the third round; in every stitch 1 sc., leaving the stitches of the figure without working, by which they lie loosely on the foundation. The illustration plainly shows the figures and the widening and narrowing. The open round that joins every two teeth is worked as follows: 1 sc., 1 ch., 1 sdc. (short double crochet), 1 ch., 1 dc., 1 ch., 1 tc. (treble crochet), 1 ch., 3 cross stitches, each separated by a chain stitch. With every chain stitch of this round pass over a stitch of the last round. Then repeat from the first round. The upper edge of the lace is worked in five rounds, as shown in the illustration, and the under edge as follows: * 1 sc. in the first projecting corner of the foundation, 8 ch., 1 sc. in the 3d of these, 5 ch., 1 sc. again in the 3d of these; 1 sc. in the next corner of the foundation, 10 ch., 1 sc. in the 4th of these, 7 ch., 1 sc. in the same 4th of these, 7 ch., again 1 sc. in the 4th of the first ten chain; 2 ch., 1 sc. in the next corner of the foundation. All the figures are worked in the same manner, except that the number of stitches which form the stem of the leaf-like figures differs as shown in the illustration.

Dress with Double Skirt—looped up.

This dress is of gray foulard, trimmed with pleated ruffles of the same material. The short upper skirt is looped up in the manner shown by the illustration. Under this is arranged a piece of the material of the dress, which is finished by a wider pleated ruffle on the bottom, and is so arranged as to simulate a second skirt looped up.

Sashes.

The sashes here given are very tastefully arranged. The sash, Fig. 1, is of white satin ribbon, ten inches in width. The ends are each thirty inches long, and are finished with knotted fringe, while the top is arranged in two or three pleats. For the bow, cut of the satin ribbon and stiff lace lining

For pattern see Supplement, No. VI., Fig. 17.

The sash given by Fig. 3 is of lilac silk. The ends are lined with lilac silk, and trimmed, as shown in the illustration, with a quilling of the same material and bias satin folds. The four short loops which form the bow are also bound with lilac satin. The place where they are sewed on is covered by a loop of the silk. The silk is an inch and a half in width, and is fastened behind with hooks and eyes.

Crochet Edging.

See illustration, pag. 564.
This edging is worked in medium fine crochet cotton. The thick leaf-like part consists of eighteen rounds in ribbed crochet stitch as follows: 10 ch. (chain stitches) for the foundation; passing over the last of these, work backward 4 sc. (single crochet) in the next four stitches, 2 sc. separated by a ch. in the fifth stitch; 4 sc. in the last four stitches. At the end of every round crochet 1 ch., and in the middle ch. of every round crochet 2 sc. separated by a ch. In this manner work the next five rounds till there are ten stitches on each side of the middle ch., then work four rounds with the same number of stitches, which is done by passing over the first and last stitch of every round, and narrow two stitches each in the 11th, 13th, 15th, 17th, and 18th rounds, by passing over two stitches at the beginning and end of each round, and in the intervening rounds leaving the stitches the same, which is done by passing over only 1 stitch at the beginning and end of each round. Border the leaves with chain stitch scallops, of which each counts five stitches; and at the same time join the leaves by fastening together the middle stitches of the fourth and third scallop of each with 1 sl. (slip stitch), the second scallop with 1 dc. (double crochet), and the first with 1 tc. (treble crochet). The upper edge of the lace is formed by the following four rounds:

1st round—1 sc. in the first of the upper corners of a leaf, * 3 ch., 1 tc. in the middle stitch of the upper edge of a leaf, 3 ch., 1 sc. in the second corner of the same leaf, 9 ch., 1 sc. in the first corner of the next leaf; repeat from *.

2d round—Alternately 1 dc., 1 ch., passing over one stitch.

3d round—Cross double crochet stitches, separated by 1 ch. passing over one stitch.

4th round—Alternately 1 dc., 1 p. (picot, which consists of 3 ch., 1 sc. in the dc.), passing over one stitch.

Lastly, crochet on the outer border of the leaves two rounds as follows:

1st round—1 sc. in the middle stitch of the fifth scallop of the leaf (counting from the upper edge), * 5 ch., 2 sdc. (short double crochet) in the middle stitch of the next leaf, 5 ch.; in the middle stitches of the next two scallops each 2 dc. followed by 5 ch.; then in the middle stitches of the next three scallops 2 tc. followed by 5 ch.; then again in the middle stitch of the two following scallops 2 dc. followed by 5 ch.; then 2 sdc. in the middle stitch of the next scallop, 5 ch., 1 sc. in the middle stitch of the following scallop, 2 ch., 1 sc. in the middle stitch of the next free scallop of the next leaf; repeat from *.

2d round—1 sl. in the last ch. of the first scallop of the former round, * 2 sl. in the next two stitches, 5 ch. which form a picot, 3 sc. on the same scallop, 2 dc. separated by a picot between the first dc., 3 sc., 1 p., 3 sc. on the next chain stitch scallop, 2 sc. separated by a p. between the next 2 dc.; in each of the following four chain stitch scallops always 3 sc., 1 leaf, 3 sc.; each leaf consists of 6 ch., 1 sl. in the first of these repeated twice; 5 ch.; 1 sc. in the same ch. which was worked in the sc.; between every two dc. crochet always 2 sc. separated by a picot; now follow 3 sc., 1 p., 3 sc., in each of the two next chain stitch scallops, 3 sl., in the following 3 stitches, 1 sl. in the last ch. of the first free scallop of the next leaf. Repeat from *.

JOEL HUTT'S NEW HOUSE.

I AM a district-school teacher in West Virginia. The life is quiet and monotonous, if one is willing it should be so; but a little observation, aided by human sympathy, may give it interest and even romance. Some teachers might be able to write narratives of their own experiences; but it has not fallen to my lot to be a heroine, and having no story of my own I prize more highly those of my neighbors. I have many a nice budget stored away in head, heart, and portfolio.

Three years ago this spring I found myself without an engagement for the summer "quarter," and the first of April approaching. After many inquiries I heard of a school, which I was told was such hard work and poor pay nobody wanted it. Having no other choice I concluded to apply. It was five miles from home by the road, and three across the hills. The former way was so impassable with mud that I preferred walking, my sister Mary going with me. A warm rain had fallen the day before, and the sky was still cloudy, but betokening nothing worse than spring showers. Those that had already fallen had set the birds crazy with delight, filled the air with the smell of the soil, and made the ferns and mosses brighter out among the old dead leaves as they only do in March.

We had been directed to Joel Hutt, who lived "just beyond that hill where you kin see the clearin'." Woods and deep hollows lay between, and we were not sure that upon emerging we would find the "clearin'" whose unsightliness was plainly visible in the distance. Over logs and across rocky brooks, through underbrush, and up the hill-sides, where the yielding loam sent us back when we pressed most earnestly forward, until we came out in an open field about a quarter of a mile to the right of the stump and log covered hill. In the centre of the field before us stood a house and barn.

"How glad I am," said Mary, as she climbed the fence, "that we found the place so easily. I am quite tired enough to stop!"

"Don't be too well pleased with appearances. I don't believe that is the house."

"Oh, it must be! There is no other house in sight but that one away over on the next ridge, and it can't be so far off as that, I know."

"But that is beyond the hill we were directed to, while this is nearer than the hill itself."

"I wonder if it wouldn't be best to inquire, instead of talking the matter over here," said my active sister, as she started in the direction of the house. It was a two-story frame, straight and stiff in every outline—such a house as you may see any where and every where. This was all we observed as we passed through the field toward it. Half a dozen wild-looking cattle were trying to pick the young grass from among the dry timothy stubble. As we approached they raised their heads, snuffed the air, and ran off at full gallop.

"Not much used to company!" said Mary. "And only look at the house. I wonder where the people live?"

"This is the front, I suppose, and they stay in the back kitchen."

"But there is no road here, and neither gate nor foot-path."

"Little need of gate with only this fragment of rail-fence. But let us go round to the other side."

The other side was just the same. The same rectangle, containing the same number of windows, and a door painted red. All the windows were hung with blue paper blinds which closely fitted the frames. The thresholds were some feet from the ground, but there were no steps. No paths in the yard, which was only a small inclosure for the protection of some fruit trees that had been planted around; they might have had some ten years' growth. There had been some attempt at ornament, for a cedar and an arbor vitae grew at what seemed intended for the front of the house. The bricks of the chimney were not discolored by smoke, and the paint was weather-beaten, but not worn from the doors and frames. The fine big barn, standing a little way off, had been well used. Wagon-wheels had cut deep ruts around it, and a straw stack stood at one side.

We were thoroughly interested and puzzled. That a new house should have stood so long empty in a section where so many were anxious to buy or rent was unaccountable. We were very certain that neither Joel Hutt nor any one else had ever lived there.

"Well," I said, "shall we go on to the other house?"

"Across that deep hollow and up another hill? I don't believe that's the place."

"But where else can we go?"

"Come on, then. It would be hard to come so far and see nobody. And then I want to inquire if this house is haunted," said Mary, who was alternating between amusement and annoyance.

Across the hollow and up the hill we went. The house was an old log one, a story and a half high, and having one wing—a small frame kitchen, which seemed to be a late addition. There was a porch in front, up which a honeysuckle had climbed so long ago that its thick stems seemed to support the moss-grown roof as firmly as did the craggy old posts. In the yard stood one of those huge apple-trees whose spreading branches are good for nothing but shade and snug props to robins' nests. Behind the house were fruit trees which promised bright things for May and good things for harvest. As we approached a woman came out on the porch and blew a tin horn.

"We are in good time for dinner," said Mary; "this long walk has made me hungry enough to enjoy it."

Although we were opening the gate when the woman concluded this dinner-call, she only glanced toward us and hurried into the house.

"Cool that, now wasn't it? I'm afraid we'll have no invitation to help them eat that pice ham I smell."

Some minutes after we knocked a voice, in quaint and measured tones, bade us "come in." On entering we saw the same woman who had blown the horn sitting in the corner knitting. It was the position and occupation she thought best for a reception.

"Good-day," said the woman, still knitting.

"Good-day," I answered. "Does Joel Hutt live here?"

"Yes."

"Is he in?"

"No."

"Is he at home?"

"I reckon he'll be yere soon. I've blowed on him for dinner; but he's over in the fur field a-plowin', and if he ain't at the end of his furrow he won't stop till he's done."

"Do you know whether a teacher is engaged for the school?"

"No, we haven't got none yet. You want it?"

"I came to see about it."

"Won't you take cheers and wait till Joel comes?" And at last she rose and pushed two chairs out a little from their places by the wall.

"Did you come fur?"

"About three miles."

"Which way?"

Mary pointed toward the unoccupied house, and said, "That way."

"Whose girls are you?"

"Mrs. Rood's."

"Over by town? Oh yes, I've heard of her often. I thought mebbe you was old man Johnson's daughters, they're school marns. He lives over on Mill Creek. D'ye know him?"

"No, ma'am."

Just then we heard the horses coming down the road, their chain traces rattling to every measured tramp.

"Joel's comin' now," said Mrs. Hutt, and she hurried to the kitchen and began poking the fire and getting out dishes. Presently we heard Joel come in, and while he washed she explained who we were and what was our errand. Then she came to the door of the sitting-room and said, "You might as well take off your things and stay to dinner," and we immediately untied our hats in assent to what was intended to be a warm invitation. We followed her to the kitchen where the table was spread. Joel stood behind one of the chairs, and, as we entered, nodded to us and sat down. He was a fine-looking farmer of about thirty-five. As we ate I made known my errand to Joel, and found I could get the school "if the other directors was willin'." Then we talked of the weather and the crops until almost through the meal, when Mary asked:

"Who lives in that house over there?"

Joel, to whom the question was addressed, evidently desired to seem not to hear; and, finally, his mother answered, quite shortly in tone and letter, "Nobody."

"Where do you calkilate to board?" said Joel, before another question could be asked.

"I am not acquainted with any one in the district. How far from here is the school-house?"

"Something less than a mile."

"Do you ever board the teachers?"

"Sometimes I used to," said Mrs. Hutt; "but I'm not so smart as I was onst."

"Oh, well, it will be season to look for boarding when I'm sure of the school. When will you let me know?"

"About the last of the week, I reckon," said Joel, as he rose from the table.

Returning home we again passed the empty house.

"If it has a ghost story connected with it the Huttts don't seem inclined to tell it. And I believe they had some reason for not wanting to talk about it. Didn't you think they avoided it?"

"Yes; but if I live here this spring I will find it all out for you."

"I wouldn't board with those people if I were you. They are so queer, and with only those two old folks you will be so lonesome."

"Every body is queer; and you know I don't often have time to be lonely when I teach. Then I will come home for Saturdays and Sundays, and talk over the week with you and mother."

We reached home and were refreshing ourselves with rocking chairs and apples when the click of the gate-latch announced a visitor, Miss Sarah Jane Singell. Sarah Jane don't come often—don't go any where often, and, consequently, is more queer than most people. Her greeting consisted of two or three funny little nods, each accompanied by an unspellable sound that meant "how d'ye do?"

"Good-afternoon, Sarah Jane; take this arm-chair."

"Any one will do," said Sarah Jane, as she took the chair and tried to arrange her skirt in such a way that one little fold might be coaxed to touch the floor. To do this required a rather awkward position; but Sarah Jane maintained it throughout her call, and by much pulling and patting managed to have her drapery look tolerably well.

"Are your folks all well, Sarah Jane?"

"Yes m; you uns all well?"

As the conversation proceeded she said, "Are you a-goin' to teach this summer, Hanner?"

"Perhaps. I have been to apply for a school to-day."

"Where at?"

"Over in Hutt's district. Do you know any thing of the place?"

"Oh yes, lots. My cousin William lives there, and I've been at his house often."

"We were at Hutt's to-day. Do you know them?"

"Yes, I went there once with cousin William's wife to spend the afternoon, and then I've heard her tell a heap about them. There was four boys of them, but they're all married now but Joel. Hiram, he's livin' out West; John, I s'pose you've seen him. No? Why, he used to come to our house a-courtin' lots of times." Sarah Jane's faded face blushed at the recollection. "But he was given to drinkin'," she continued, in explanation of the fact that his wooing had been unsuccessful. "Sam—" she was going on to tell of the whole family; but being more interested in Joel than Sam I asked her if she knew any thing of the unoccupied house that had so excited our curiosity.

"Yes, that's on Hutt's land. Joel built it."

"Did any one ever live in it?"

"No; but Joel was to 'a lived in it."

"Why didn't he, then?"

"Well, them that told me said I wasn't to tell; but I reckon I might say as much as that he was to 'a married somebody, and was disappointed."

"Was it any one we know?"

"I guess I oughtn't to tell."

"Tell us if she married any one else."

She hesitated a minute, and then nodded in answer, as though she might divulge a secret in that way which her conscience would not let her speak. We were interested, and would have liked to question further; but Sarah Jane reproachfully and penitently told us we "oughtn't to ask her, seein' that she rel'y mustn't tell;" and after asking for a sleeve-pattern she took her departure, making me promise never to tell any one in Hutt's district that she ever told me any thing.

"Because you see it wouldn't do, for I promised them that told me that it shouldn't go any farther."

Two weeks after I was teaching the school and boarding with Mrs. Hutt. She "reckoned I wouldn't be much trouble. I looked as though I could wait on myself." She was very kind, and the five days of each week which I passed with her were not so tiresome as Mary had feared for me. As I saw more of Joel, I learned to respect him exceedingly. He was a good son, a considerate master, merciful to his beasts, and manly and straightforward in all his dealings. I wondered often if the girl who left him for another had found that other so true and worthy. Her name was Robena Allen. I discovered it accidentally. One morning, when Mrs. Hutt was busy preparing for the "hands" who were to come that day and help plant corn, she asked me if I would "mind makin' up the beds and doin' a little sweepin' for her." The sweeping had to be followed by dusting, and as I brushed the books on a home-made table in Joel's room, I thoughtlessly looked them over. A "North American Reader" and some other school-books with worn, yellow leaves, "The Lives of the Presidents," "History of South America," a book of Indian wars, and a Bible, on the blank leaf of which was written, in a large, irregular hand, "Presented to Robena Allen by her friend, Joel Hutt." Robena Allen was her name then. This was the girl for whom the house had been built, for Joel was not the man to make presents to every one. To him a book like this, with faded pinks and rose-leaves pressed within, expressed no transient feeling, but the hope and disappointment of a lifetime.

I knew her name; but as the time passed, I began to fear I would learn nothing more about "the New House," as the children of the neighborhood called the object of my curiosity. I would not inquire of my pupils, and I made no other acquaintance.

Two months of my term were past when one day a change came to our quiet life. When I came from school I saw Joel sitting in the "arm-door, stroking the head of his dog, his head so bent that I passed without being seen. In the house Mrs. Hutt sat in the best room, while in her place in the kitchen a neighbor woman was bustling about preparing supper. A letter had come from the West, telling that Hiram was dead.

The bit of paper gave the bright May-day a sad closing. "It's goin' to be a warm, growin' day," Mrs. Hutt had said to me as I started for school in the morning; and Joel had asked me to observe "what an uncommon lot of cherries he was goin' to have!"

To her, sighing for her first-born, and to him for a playmate brother, the sun's mild setting gave no promise of to-morrow's light and heat. The rays goldened the young leaves and lingered on the floor at the poor old woman's feet, but house and field were dark to her. And though Mrs. White and I tried to busy ourselves, and keep much bustling work going on as usual, the house would at times grow fearfully still; and at last nothing more could be thought of to do, and all was silent except the chirping of the cricket under the hearth, and the murmuring of Mrs. Hutt about "poor Hiram."

Joel broke the silence by saying, "Mother, we must talk about what we had best do."

"Not to-night, boy. Leave me to-night to think of what's done."

But it was talked of, and decided that Joel should go for the children. Hiram's death had orphaned three, of whom their step-mother intimated she would be willing to be relieved. They were in Iowa. Joel thought he could be back in three weeks; and after arranging for his absence he went, charging me to "take good care of mother."

I kept her from being lonesome by letting her entertain me. She spent the evenings by the kitchen stove, her feet on the hearth, and her elbows on her knees, and in that position she was most talkative, and would tell me stories for hours. She liked to dwell upon "old times," as she called every thing past, and I was beginning to weary of hearing about her husband and her relatives, near and far, when she came to the story I had so long expected.

It was a warm evening, and I had persuaded her to sit with me on the porch. Over the treetops across the hollow the New House showed white in the moonlight. I was thinking how Joel and Robena Allen might have been living there—how a honeysuckle like this might have climbed over the door, under which, on such evenings, a happy family might gather—how Mrs. Hutt might have lived through her old age without task or care. I turned to look at her. Weary old woman! Hands which have grown hard and brown with the work of threescore years should rest for the little time remaining. There should be little feet to run the errands, little hands to comb the gray hair from the wrinkled brow—there should be love and comfort in abundance for weary old age. But then to Joel's wife, as to many women, "grandmother" might have been only an unthanked servant; and perhaps she is happier in being her own mistress. When the children come she will have company and help. They may move into the new house then, and forget old cares in pleasant new ones.

I was thinking this way when the robin in the apple-tree above waked up, and twittered contentedly as it settled to rest again. "Good-night, little neighbor," I said. Its voice and mine roused Mrs. Hutt from her reverie. She looked at me, then at the new house, and in a half-frightened voice, said,

"You might often a-wondered about that house over there?"

"I have wondered why you did not occupy it, when it is so much better than this."

"Joel won't never allow that; nor he won't rent it out neither."

She was silent some minutes, and then said half to herself, "I reckon I might as well tell you. You seem most like one of the family, any how."

Then, sitting in her favorite position, her elbows on her knees, she told the story, beginning as though I already knew a part:

"The girl's name was Beny Allen. They lived in sight of yere, right over across them fields there. The house is gone now. It was such an old, tumble-down thing that as soon as they went away the man that bought the place (it was a little farm—only thirty acres) cleared it right off, and built round on t'other side of the hill. Well, when Joel and Beny was children they was always uncommon fond of each other, and many a time we used to joke them on it. When they grew old they never thought of goin' with other young folks—that is, of keeping particular company with them, you know—and it was a kind of understood thing from the first that they was to be married some day. And we was all well enough pleased about it, too. Beny was poor, to be sure, but we had a plenty; and then we never did think money nor land was the only thing. And I will say it for Beny that she was as smart and pretty a girl as there was any where round. She was a great hand at housework, too, and Joel used to say to me when he'd come in and find me real tired, 'Never mind, mother, you'll get to rest when Beny comes.'

"When he wasn't much more'n twenty he began to think of gettin' married; and all we could say, this house wasn't good enough to bring Beny into, but he must build a new one. You wouldn't think any body as still as Joel would be so set in their own way; but he is. When he's made up his mind he can't be turned no more'n any thing. Well, as soon as harvest was over he set to work at it, and it was settled that they was to 'a been married Christmas.

"He had just got well started when we begun to hear stories a-goin' the rounds that Alf Hawley was goin' to see Beny Allen oftener than a girl that was engaged to marry another young man ought to allow. Joel only laughed, poor boy, and said he wasn't afraid of fifty Alf Hawleys. Alf lived over on Mill Creek. His father was worth forty thousand, but I couldn't see that Alf was any better of it, as he wasn't a bit stiddy, but went to all the gatherings for ten miles round, and they say he often left them the worse for drinkin'. He made a great dash, and used to come to see Beny in a two-horse buggy, and take her off ridin' with him. And sometimes he took her on horseback; and he got her a hat with ribbons and feathers all a-flyin'. The first time she wore it they came right past here. I was a lookin' out of the window, and Joel was doin' somethin' in the yard. She got red as a beet when she saw him. I think she'd been talkin' and carryin' on so with Alf that she didn't notice which way she was a-ridin'; for she wasn't bold enough to do such a thing a purpose. But Alf Hawley was, and I know well enough he was just a-doin' it to show off to Joel. Joel looked mightily disturbed, and I believe that was the first time he was the least bit jealous. After that I saw he didn't act as he had done. He quit talkin' about Beny to me, and though he was over at the new house all the time when he was alone there would be whole hours when I'd never hear a hammer. Still he'd go over to Allen's on the reg'lar evenin's. Things went on this way about a month when one Saturday night, after he'd went over as usual, he came back in about an hour; and when I saw things wasn't right he just burst out a-cryin, and he sez, 'Mother, it's true. Beny is goin' to marry Alf Hawley.' After a while he said, 'Mother, you mustn't think hard of Beny. Her father's coaxin' her on to get Alf's money; and then, as far as she sees, he's a good deal better worth havin' than me.' And with that he went off to bed, and he never said another word about it, and I thought best not to say any thing either. But he went on and finished the house, and then shut it up, and there it's been to this day.

"He wanted me not to think hard of Beny; but who could 'a helped it, knowin' how fur things had went, and how much more deservin' Joel was than that Alf Hawley."

"And where is she now?" I asked when she had wiped her eyes with her apron, for even now she felt Joel's hurt keenly.

"They went West. His father wasn't willin' for it, and threatened every thing. So Alf coaxed Allen to move West, and pretended it was all broke off; but when they was well gone, he took all he could get, and cleared out after them, and we've never heard nothin' of them sence. I reckon it's wicked, but I can't help hopin' they're reapin' the reward of their bad treatment of Joel."

Four weeks passed, and yet there was no word from Joel. His mother was very anxious. There had been a railroad accident, she knew, and it was vain to tell her that if any such thing had occurred we would learn it through the newspapers. "It mightn't 'a been found out," she said. "At last, in the fifth week of his absence, and the last of my stay there, he came.

It was growing dark, and we sat in the porch, Mrs. Hutt, in one of her still moods, and I thinking of home, and wishing Joel would come, that I would have no reason to linger there after my school closed. A little wagon came down the lane.

"Who kin that be?" said Mrs. Hutt. "None of the neighbors has wagons like that."

It stopped at our gate. A man said "Here we are," and jumping down, began helping others out.

"It's Joel," said Mrs. Hutt; "but who kin that be? I wonder if Hiram's wife could 'a come with him."

They came up the walk, Joel and the woman beside him, the children following.

Mrs. Hutt shook hands with her son, and asked, "Is this Hiram's wife?"

"No, mother," replied Joel; "this is my wife."

She stared at him and at the poor woman, who was hiding her face and crying audibly.

"These children will tire more than help you, and I brought you a daughter to keer for you in your age."

Mrs. Hutt was still speechless with astonishment. The woman lifted her head and sobbed out, "Don't you know me, Mrs. Hutt?"

"No more'n the face of the dead. Who could I know way out in Iowa?"

"But I didn't always live in Iowa. Look at me, and think a while."

"You're not Beny Allen!"

"No, mother," said Joel, "she is Beny Hutt."

I left them then and took the children in to the kitchen fire, for riding from the station in the evening air had chilled them. I put the kettle on for the tea I knew Mrs. Hutt would soon begin to think of, and then went up to my room and left Joel to tell his mother how he found his old love among the prairies.

About two hours after Mrs. Hutt came in, and sitting down on the bed told me how it had come about.

"Who'd 'a thought it! I never dreamed of such a thing happenin' as Joel gettin' married, let alone marryin' Beny Allen after all, though I might 'a knowed he'd 'a staid a bachelor to doomsday before he'd 'a had any body else. Bless her heart, she's just like she used to be before that Alf Hawley turned her head. I always knowed she'd come to see it different some time, and she has, poor thing, sure enough." She sighed and paused a while, as though she had occasion to be sad.

"How did Joel find her?"

"Why, in the queerest way in the world. It seems just like it was ordered by Providence, and I reckon it might 'a been, though I'm sure if the rest had had such wicked feelin's about it as I have, such a blessin' wouldn't 'a ben sent for any body's deservin'. But I tell you how it was. When Joel got to Hiram's the children wasn't ready to come. You see their step-mother didn't do the best by them—some step-mothers don't—but I wouldn't say they're all alike. I kind o' thought Hiram's wife wasn't one of the good sort, but I never knowed it for sure till now that Joel tells me they hadn't decent clothes to come home in, though I'm sure they might 'a had, for Hiram had a plenty to get them with. Beny says she heard she was a real lazy woman, and liked better to run to her neighbors than to take keer of her own house and children. Well, as I was a sayin', they hadn't hardly decent clothes, and she was so busy with her own things she wouldn't take time to 'tend to them. So Joel had to look after them himself. She told him as he didn't know nothin' about such things he'd better take the children to some sewin' woman and let her get and make them a suit apiece. It isn't a good way of doin', but you see Joel didn't know, and so asked her where he'd go. She told him that on the next street there was a woman lived that done sewin'—she didn't know much about her—she'd only come lately, the woman had, but it was said she was a good hand at plain sewin'. She didn't know her name neither, but there was a sign up, and there wasn't no other sign, and he'd know it by that. So Joel he went off to find the place. He saw the sign, but he went in without stoppin' to read the name. A woman was sewin' in the corner. She riz up and said, 'Good-mornin';' and he was beginnin' to tell his errand when all at once they knew each other for Beny Allen and Joel Hutt. Well, they made it all up somehow—I reckon they don't keer to tell how—and he married her and brought her home with him. And that's how it comes she's here now."

"But where was her husband, and what had she been doing all the while?"

"Didn't I tell you of all that? It seems to me my head is all mixed up to-night. Why, come to find out, she didn't never marry Alf. Just after they went West her father and mother both died, and it seemed as if the trouble opened her eyes and set her to thinkin', so that she come to see things different, and she wouldn't have Alf at all. She had a hard time of it, though, taking keer of herself among strangers. But she must 'a done pretty well, for she was as comfortable fixed up as could be, only she was so lonely, poor thing. She says the Lord helped her and keered for her, and she says she isn't punished enough yet for treatin' Joel so. But Joel won't hear to any such talk. You'd think to see him that he'd been the one to blame and Beny 'd never done nothin' wrong. And she does seem real good. I'm sure I'm not the one that will ever throw it up to her that she most broke Joel's heart. It was more'n ten years ago, when she was a giddy girl, and what's the use of rakin' it up to fret about now. Yes, she's good; and I'm glad Joel's got her to keer fur him when I'm gone."

The Hutt's are still my friends, and I go there sometimes to see and enjoy their happy comfort. The house—the New House, of course—is surrounded by neat palings. A honey-suckle is making progress over the door, and the borders are bright with flowers from April to October. Beny has dismissed the blue blinds, and in many ways smoothed out the once reigning stiffness. Within the easy-chair, placed in the coziest corner and its cushion covered with bright patch-work of her own piecing, always stands empty unless Mrs. Hutt sits there. She rocks and knits, or goes about the house as freely as its mistress, but feels no burden. Beny and the children are ever ready to serve her, and each other, and Joel. They are a loving, happy family.

LONDON CORRESPONDENCE.

THIS we generally reckon the fullest week in London, for to-morrow is the great Derby race day, which I shall attempt to describe to you next week. I have just returned from Hyde Park; never have I seen it so full. Hyde Park is, you know, the great rendezvous of fashionable life in London. It is about 394 acres in extent, and stretches from Piccadilly westward to Kensington Gardens. Marvelous improvements have been effected in it of late years; it is quite a flower-garden now as well as a park. Just at present it is very lovely, with the trees in full leaf and the rhododendrons in full flower, to say nothing of geraniums and other bright-blossoming plants, and the pretty rock-work which has been recently erected, over which the water trickles in a manner peculiarly delicious these hot days.

Quite early in the morning a few courageous, active people ride in Rotten Row—a corruption, they say, of Route du Roi—one of the best rides there are in the world. The ground is specially prepared for the horses' feet, and is as soft as possible. This ride also rejoices in the name of the Lady's Mile, but, in good truth, running as it does from Apsley Gate far up to Kensington, it is a good deal over a mile in length. On both sides of this there is a broad graveled walk and a row of seats, for the use of each of which you have to pay the by no means large sum of one penny of our money. Until the present year the right-hand side was the side where every body went; but this is almost totally deserted now for the opposite one, which is far narrower and can boast of but little shade, so that it is in no way so desirable as the old favorite. From twelve to two the fashionable people ride in the Row, and from twelve to two their friends walk there to see them or see each other as the case may be.

I wish I could give you a little idea of the scene there this morning. Imagine the wide Row, with a line of trees growing down it, and giving the only atom of shade that was to be passed by the riders, the sun pouring down in one glaring white heat the whole time. We are very proud in England of our beautiful horses, and you never see them to greater perfection than from twelve to two in Rotten Row; but then besides the horses there are so many good, handsome specimens of Young England, and some of the prettiest English girls of the day.

Nothing is so perfectly neat as the dress the ladies adopt for riding. The skirts of the habits are worn shorter than they used to be; they are mostly made of very dark blue cloth; the bodies fitting without a crease or a wrinkle, and showing off the small waists and well-developed busts of our countrywomen to full perfection. They are made quite plain, with long coat-sleeves, and a small short basque at the back, with just a narrow row of braid round it. Of course there are varieties in these; some people wear gray habits, some velvet. Some have them very elaborately trimmed, but the general fashion is as I tell you. Nothing but the tall chimney-pot hats are to be seen, not quite so tall as they used to be, and rather broader in the brim, with jaunty little veils coming across the face, and finishing off with bows and ends of the same falling over the chignon at the back. The collars worn are the smallest linen ones, put inside the habit, and fastened either with a brooch or stud. No brightly-colored neck-ties or long ends are admissible; the only color to be seen in the costumes of the best of our equestriennes is a pretty little bouquet, a single yellow rose, or a sprig of jasmine, worn in the front of the habit.

Every body who is of any consequence is attended by a groom, and the crowd is very great, but nothing to the dense throng of pedestrians who thronged that left-hand side of the Row this morning. The chairs were three or four deep, and the pathway was completely blocked. It is the most fashionable lounge in London, patronized by the great people—"swells," as we call them in the slang of the day—as well as the would-be fashionables; but in all that vast throng there are scarcely more than twenty or thirty of the lower orders. Nowhere can you have so good an opportunity of seeing what is really being worn.

I am not enough of an adept at gentlemen's dress to be able to enter very minutely into details. We think we know, but then we islanders are so conceited, that nowhere in the world do men dress as well or look as well as they do in England. I know that there never seems a speck, or a pin out of place—that their dress is neatness itself. The hats are not quite so low in the crown as last year, but rather more turned up at the side; the trousers tighter; the coats the usual frock-coats, a jaunty little bouquet in the button-hole, and a black satin neck-tie, with a pearl pin, and you have what seems to me all the best dressed men wear. But it isn't the details of the dress that makes its perfection; it is the perfect fit of every thing, and the good taste which rules it all.

As to the ladies' dress, I assure you I feel the greatest difficulty in trying to describe it. Marie Antoinette fichus and loose jackets, confined by a band round the waist and a sash at the back, are all the rage; so are short dresses. Very few dresses are allowed to trail on the ground, and all kinds of devices are used to loop up the long ones. The best of all plans is to have loops and buttons put at each breadth, outside the dress, at a sufficient distance apart to prevent them touching the ground; but some of the belles arrange them so artistically that they remind one of the Watteau beauties. Loops of ribbon are worn at the back, from one hip to the other, and through this the fullness of the dress is caught, and with a little further looping at the side the effect is excellent. Paniers, that is, hoop petticoats, are, they say, all the rage in Paris, and the fashion is slowly creeping over to us, and shows itself just now in the excessive fullness and bunchiness of the dresses at the back. Plain blue and pink camlet petticoats, with short striped dresses of the same worn over them are very much in vogue; every thing is worn in suites, that is, petticoat, dress, jacket, or Marie Antoinette fichu alike, with a bonnet of exactly the same shade; contrasts seem quite abandoned by us all. The bonnets are smaller than ever—mere morsels of tulle and blonde—and every body is taking to make their own, or to let their maids make them; it must be very hard times for the milliners. Altogether you can scarcely get a prettier peep of London life than by a stroll in Rotten Row from twelve to two at this time of year. People sit together talking in groups, stopping a friend now and then as they pass, or they walk up and down themselves until they come across their friends, and stand chatting with them a while, or lean over the railings and chat with the riders.

All the last night's balls are discussed here, and half the pleasant picnics and parties to the races or the Crystal Palace are made up here. To-day no one could talk of anything but the Derby. Lady Elizabeth is the favorite horse, and people are inclined to hope she may win, because she belongs to Lord Hastings, a young nobleman who is one of the best patrons of the turf, and has lately lost so much money that he is depending almost entirely on winning the Derby to meet his great liabilities. He married Lady Florence Paget, one of the prettiest women of the day, a daughter of the Marquis of Anglesea. This match created the greatest excitement at the time, for the lady was engaged to Mr. Chaplin, a very wealthy Lincolnshire squire, and the night before her marriage he and Lord Hastings were both seen in her opera-box. It was quite a runaway affair. She went to Marshal & Snelgrove's, one of our great linen-draperies, in her father's brougham, passed through the shop, and got into a cab at the opposite door, and drove off straight to the church and was married to My Lord, only acquainting Mr. Chaplin of the fact when she was Lady Hastings. She certainly forgot the old adage:

"It is well to be off with the old love Before you are on with the new."

At half past two Hyde Park is empty; about four it is quite full again. There are plenty of riders then, but the Drive is the great attraction. This lies at the extreme edge of the Park, beyond Rotten Row, and is crammed as full as ever it can be with carriages, which can only go at a snail's pace. The Princess of Wales is often here, and people never seem tired of seeing her. She receives a perfect ovation daily. Along the drive, as along the ride, there is a gravel path, which is crowded the whole afternoon; ladies take possession of the seats, but there are more gentlemen than ladies—indeed until quite lately it was not considered the thing for ladies to walk here at all. People remain as late as eight o'clock; the great marvel is when they get their meals. We are supposed to breakfast from nine to ten, to lunch from one to two, and to dine from seven to eight; but when the London season is at its height we get into a sadly irregular state of things.

Last Sunday was the Queen's birthday, which was kept on Saturday. All the various members of the Ministry gave grand banquets on the occasion; the Guards were reviewed in St. James's Park by the Duke of Cambridge, in the presence of the Princess of Wales and her two little boys, the Prince and Princess Teck, and Prince Christian. All the various pensioners of royalty were feasted, and the royal tradespeople. The principal streets in London were illuminated. At the public buildings and government offices the Royal Standard was displayed, and the day was right royally kept, as it has been ever since her Majesty's accession. The Prince of Wales went over to Scotland, where her Majesty now is, to congratulate her on this her forty-ninth birthday.

Dickens is with us once again, very proud and happy at the glorious reception you have given him in America; he has realized by his readings there alone as much as from forty to fifty thousand pounds.

Miss Kate Reigolds, an American actress, is creating a good deal of sensation at our Princess's Theatre.

Spiritualism is, if report speaks truly, in greater force with you at the other side of the Atlantic than with us, so I must give you a little account of a trial which has created a vast sensation here, and which I know will be very interesting to you, as I think Mr. Home's name is more familiar with you even than with us.

The case was Lyon versus Home, Mrs. Lyon being a lady of some seventy-five years old, of obscure birth, the widow of a man who had left her about £100,000; Home being the well-known spiritualist who married a god-daughter of the Emperor of Russia, and was well received not only by that potentate, but by the Emperor and Empress of the French also; and indeed, if the truth be told, he has up to the present time been very favorably received in English society, possibly more from curiosity at the wonders of which he spoke than any thing else. Mrs. Lyon had been much attached to her first husband, and on his death-bed he seems to have imbued her with the idea that they should meet again in seven years. So firmly did his widow believe in this that she often spoke of her approaching death to her friends as the time drew near, until one of them persuaded her that this remeeting had nothing to do with death, but referred to a spiritual intercourse with the deceased, which could be effected by means of a medium. For this purpose she sought Mr. Home, and he seems to—fairly or unfairly—have made such good way in her esteem that only a week after she first saw him she wrote to offer him an income of about £700 a year. From that time the ascendancy increased; mother and son were the familiar terms between them, and she further gave him £6000, and a mortgage security of £30,000, he meanwhile adding her name of Lyon to his own. At last, however, she repented of her generosity, and not only wished to get her money back, but forgot all her old affection and threw her late favorite and adopted son into Whitecross Prison. Hence the trial, one of the most diverting and amusing on record, occupying a far longer time than trials mostly do. Mrs. Lyon showed herself quite equal to the occasion—a very shrewd, sensible, and at the same time narrow-minded and foolish woman, by no means to be browbeaten by counsel, giving most facetious and pertinent replies in her examination. Her argument seems to have been that she was actuated entirely by a delusive belief in spirits, fostered by Mr. Home, who not only declared himself to be in spiritual communication with her husband, but suggested also that it was the wish of the deceased that she should adopt him and befriend him in the way she had done. Mr. Home, on the contrary, declared, or at all events insinuated, that she was anxious to marry him, and by him be introduced to good society, and that it was only when she discovered that neither of these ends was to be attained that she turned against him.

After a fortnight's consideration the Vice-Chancellor, Sir G. M. Giffard, delivered his verdict, that the defendant had not proved his case; that the gifts were bestowed under undue influence, and that therefore they were fraudulent and void, and must be assigned back again to the plaintiff, each party paying their own costs. The learned Vice-Chancellor wound up by declaring that spiritualism "is a mischievous nonsense, well calculated on the one hand to delude the vain, the weak, the foolish, and the superstitious; and on the other, to assist the projects of the needy and of the adventurer." Whether this be so or not it is not possible to express an opinion.

TAPESTRY AND CARPETS.

THE use of carpets and woolen hangings is coeval with civilization. They were among the first furniture of man. The pastoral tribes of the elevated plains of Asia employed furs and fleeces to protect them from the chilly exhalations of the night, and from the burning soil of the desert. When the shuttle was invented a woven material was substituted, to which the loom gave its pattern and the dyer its varied colors.

In the time of Homer the fabrics of Babylon, Tyre, and Sidon were celebrated, and Egypt, as well as India, early learned to excel in the art of weaving woollens. The taste of the two countries bears characters of great resemblance, and many of the patterns of ancient Egypt differ little from those of modern India. The Greeks sent to Media for carpets to cover their seats, and it is in Persia this industry was first developed. Time has not modified the manufacture. The vertical loom still used by the weaver of Lahore and Cashmere is identical with that employed perhaps four thousand years ago, and the frame that produced the carpets celebrated by Homer and Virgil is the same used for those of Turkey and Algiers.

The people of Northern Europe were long without the use of carpets—a cold, coarse matting replaced the warm woolen material; yet it appears the Gauls introduced, with other Eastern productions, the carpets of Damascus, Alexandria, and Cairo, yet straw and rushes were to a late period still generally used to spread over the apartments.

Italy made tapestry at Bergamo; but the introduction of paper-hangings in the fifteenth century led to the decline of the manufacture. From the thirteenth century the productions of Flanders were renowned above those of all other countries. They were made at Oudenarde, Brussels, and, principally of all, at Arras (not then in France). So famous became this city that it gave its name to the production, tapestry being styled Arazzo in Italian, and “arras” in English; and after the battle of Nicopolis, in 1396, the ransom paid to Bajazet for the liberation of a son of the Count of Flanders consisted of a sum of money and a series of Arras tapestries representing the life of Alexander the Great. Here, too, were executed in later times the ten pieces sent by Francis I. to Pope Leo X., worked from the designs of Raffaele, the original cartoons for which are among our choicest Art-treasures. But the tapestries of Flanders have early learned the art, and in the time of the Romans the red fabrics of Arras had already attained a certain reputation. Who would have foretold that Gaul and Britain, then scarcely within the pale of civilization, should in after-ages be the seat of a flourishing industry which would rival the manufactures of the East?

As early as the tenth century there was a manufacture of tap-died away; the last piece was made at Brussels in 1781. France alone maintains the manufacture.

Until the sixteenth century all the tapestry made in France was due to private enterprise. It was Francis I. who first made it a state manufacture. He collected the best workmen Flanders and Italy could produce, and established them at Fontainebleau.

estry in the Abbey of St. Florent, at Saumur, where the monks wove hangings decorated with flowers and animals; and a few years later a Count of Poitiers offers Robert, King of France, for his assistance in an expedition, a sum of money and a hundred pieces of the tapestry for which Poitiers was then celebrated, the Italian prelates sending there for its productions.

Tradition also assigns the establishment of the fabric at Aubusson to refugees of the great army of Abd-er-Rahman, routed by Charles Martel between Loudun and Tours in 732. The retreat of the Emir of Spain was so rapid that many were left behind among the Gallo-Franks of Aquitaine. The weaving of carpets was the principal trade of these Saracens, who had invaded Europe by Spain, as they later entered by the Bosphorus.

Up to the eleventh century these woolen fabrics of Europe were made for the hangings of churches and palaces, though probably foot-carpets were also used in the royal habitations and to lay before the altar. The Crusades Primaticcio furnished the designs. Henry II. appointed Philibert Delorme director of the new manufacture, and set up another at Paris, in the Hôpital de la Trinité. The civil and religious wars of his sons were fatal to royal establishments as well as to private industry, but Henry IV. resumed the work of Francis I. He established a fabric of tapestry in the Faubourg St. Antoine, whence, after various transfers, the workmen were placed on the banks of the Bièvre, where Jean Gobelins the dyer had established himself in the fifteenth century, the waters of that river being famous for the dyeing of scarlet; but Jean Gobelins grew rich, his family became ennobled.

With Louis XIV. and Colbert all the royal manufactures rose to a new existence. Under the name of “Royal Manufacture for the Furniture of the Crown,” were united at the Gobelins goldsmiths, engravers, lapidaries, furniture and tapestry makers, dyers, etc.—all the workmen of various trades employed for the sovereign. Lebrun was appointed director, and the estabishment of the Gobelins became a school for all the industries connected with furniture. Louis wished to set his people the example of model manufactures—not to crush private industry, but to stimulate and give a right direction to its labors. The harmony that pervaded at that epoch in every branch of decoration shows the unity of spirit that inspired them all. The genius of Lebrun was universal. His heroic pieces were the subjects of the tapestries; even for the locks and bolts he furnished the models; from the ceiling to the floor all was designed under his eye. The first artists lent their assistance in carrying out his conceptions. Van der Meulen painted pieces with horses and battles, Monnoyer with flowers, and Boule executed the furniture designed by Lebrun.

The same activity reigned at the Savonnerie, a royal manufacture of carpets founded at Chailot, in an old soap manufactory, whence it derived its name. While the Gobelins covered the walls the Savonnerie decorated the floors. Those of the long gallery of the Louvre and the Salle d'Apollon, were among its products. The first was begun in the reign of Henry IV. It comprised ninety-two compartments, each ten yards long by five to six yards wide—doubtless the largest foot-carpet ever made. In 1825 the manufacture of the Savonnerie was united to that of the Gobelins.

Two years after the establishment of the Gobelins Colbert opened a manufacture of tapestry at Beauvais, which had Oudry and Boucher among its directors. It is now united to the Gobelins.

The Gobelin establishment is divided into three branches, one for dyeing, the other two for making tapestry and carpets. The dyeing is considered the first in the world; the waters of the Seine are substituted for those of the Bièvre, now degenerated into a dirty stream. The colors are most lasting; each combination of color has twenty different shades, the gradations being so insensible as only to be distinguished by a practiced eye. They are all classed by M. Chevreul in his chromatic scale, which gives to each shade—in all 14,420—its special number, by which it may be described. His chromatic circle is, at the Gobelins, formed of skeins of silk.

The Gobelin tapestry is made on the upright frame (haute lisse); the artist is placed behind, his back to his model.

In the carpet manufacture the upright frame is also used, but the workman sits in front of his work. The threads of wool which form the velvet pile are secured to the cotton or hemp warp by a double knot. This gives them the greatest solidity. Friction and wear only add to their durability, as they have the effect of drawing closer the knots which fasten the wool to the warp. The wool is carefully cut and shorn until the pile reaches an inch in thickness. The Savonnerie carpets are perhaps the largest made, generally white, with arabesque borders, of surpassing excellence, from the fine quality of the wool, the delicacy of the dyes, the richness and harmony of the colors, and the precision and skillfulness of their workmanship.

Similar in workmanship to the tapestry of the Gobelins and the carpets of the Savonnerie are the fabrics of Aubusson, in the department of the Creuze, part of the ancient province of La Marche. We have already alluded to their supposed origin from a colony of Saracens in the eighth century. Until 1740 the manufacturer made only the Gobelin tapestry, fine when used for the hangings of walls, and coarser when destined for the smooth carpet or tapis raz. Since then the long woolen high-piled carpets of the Savonnerie have been imitated. The productions of Aubusson are highly artistic; the finest wools of the best dyes are employed. Established for so many centuries, the special traditions of the art, and the aptitude for execution, like those of glass-making, become hereditary in families. No other place can produce such a staff of workmen as Aubusson, and even there it takes fifteen years to qualify for the work the apprentice who has been accustomed almost from infancy to handle his father's frame. Tapestry is produced here at a much cheaper rate than in the Imperial fabric. While a work of tapestry will cost at the Gobelins from $600 to $800 the square metre, at Aubusson it rarely exceeds $80. The great expense is in the fabrication; the material only enters for twenty per cent. in the value. In a portière costing $200 $160 goes to the workman.

JAPANESE STYLE OF DRESS- ING THE HAIR.

LIKE all Eastern women, our sisters in Japan take great pains with their hair, disposing it in large loops and bows, drawn off the face, and gathered in a chignon behind. The color is a glossy black, and it is smoothed with a Uvario Japonica, a creeping plant, in water; a mucilaginous liquid is produced resembling a decoction of quince seed, and this serves to prevent the hair becoming rough and disordered, which is of special importance, as no covering to the head is worn out of doors in fine weather. Individual taste is not suffered to determine the style of dressing the hair, except in the matter of ornament, it being always arranged in the same fashion. The glossy black of the hair contrasts with the bright-colored pins and flowers which are placed in it; the brilliant scarlet pomegranate, the bright-tinted azalea, the delicate white Cape jasmine, and the primrose-hued larmal are all used to adorn the jetty tresses of the Japanese ladies. The pins are mostly made of white glass filled with colored water, generally of a golden sherry tint; they stick out from the head, and remind one somewhat of a cheveux de frise. Some years since combs and ornaments made of glass, filled with various chemical preparations, such as sulphate of quinine, etc., through which the electric spark was flashed, were exhibited in some of our scientific institutions. The idea of filling glass ornaments for the hair with colored preparations was novel to Europeans; but in the Far East these fragile ornaments have been in use for a long time. Of course accidents will happen, and a lady may easily lose a large portion of her head-gear by a fall. That the coiffure may not be disturbed during sleep, the head is placed on a small pillow of flexible bamboo.

PARIS CORRESPONDENCE.

THE Derby at Chantilly has been the great event of Paris this week. The taste of the people for racing, in all countries, is becoming more and more developed. On Sunday we were literally trampled under foot on the magnificent green-sward of the palace of the Condé; and the immense galleries were not sufficient to contain the host of ladies that had flocked hither to behold this hippic contest.

A resplendent sun, which many found too resplendent, illumined the triumph of Suzerain, the magnificent horse of M. Schickler. All heartily applauded the success of a man who enjoys universal esteem in the sporting world, and who has never been implicated in the petty tricks which are too often resorted to on the race-course, a field of intrigues in which every man attempts more or less to outwit his opponent. Isabelle, the flower girl of the jockey club, must therefore change her costume, which for the last year has been maroon and black, the colors of M. Delamarre, who won the last Derby with Patricien; and the celebrated bouquet-seller will wear for the next year a white and cherry costume, the colors of the jockeys of M. Schickler.

The Empress did not attend the races; she rarely goes any where else than to the Bois de Boulogne; nevertheless, a great number of court ladies, with the élite of foreign society, appeared there in fresh and new toilettes. The dresses of muslin, trimmed with white guipure, or even with English embroidery, were especially admired. That of the Marchioness de Galiffet was one of the most beautiful of this style of short costumes, with peniers, broad sash of raw silk, and small round hat trimmed with sweet-brier and wild roses of different colors.

The Countess de Pourtalès, who is in mourning, wore a dress of black poult de soie with a somewhat large Marie Antoinette mantlelet of white, and a gray straw hat with a pouf of black velvet, and a very large black feather curled on one side.

Two beautiful young American girls, sisters, who have been the rage for the past year in the official world, the Misses Beckwith, were in sky-blue taffeta festooned with white silk, Tyrolean corsage and pleated sash with broad ends trimmed across the bottom with white fringe; very small toquets of white Belgian straw, with clusters of blue corn-poppies and white feathers. The beautiful Madame Delamarre, in a dress of white taffeta embroidered with lilies with broad green leaves, appeared a little too much dressed for the races.

The Princess de Metternich wore a white skirt with a deep flounce (short costume) and a Watteau paletot of black silk, caught up all around with ruches and open in front, disclosing a vest of white taffeta, which formed the whole front of the corsage.

Many ladies, renowned for their elegance, wore the Russian paletot of black silk, pleated in the back, and without sleeves, the sleeves being of the color of the silk skirt, and generally blue or green. The Empress wore one of these costumes a few days since. It was of pearl-gray and black, and very stylish.

Costly parasols are now in fashion, and large sums are lavished on these small articles. Parasol handles are made which cost a thousand francs or more; they are real gems of coral and gold, and set with turquoises, amethysts, etc. Shell is also very much in vogue and exceedingly dear—the simplest handles costing from forty to fifty francs. The covers are richly embroidered with leaves and flowers, covered with costly black and white lace. It is quite the fashion for gentlemen to carry brown linen umbrellas lined with green silk, and many of them are seen in the streets of Paris.

An unhappy event saddened the Derby; an imprudent spectator, Louis Tribarren, a native of Venezuela, aged thirty-three, insisted on crossing the track in spite of the warnings of the sergeants de ville, and was run over by Ajax, one of the horses, and left senseless on the ground. His wounds are very serious, and fears are entertained for his life. The jockey was thrown from the horse and was unable to continue the race.

Yesterday the Emperor and Empress made one of those country excursions which they take but rarely. They went with a very small party of their intimate friends to dine on the grass at Villeneuve L'Etang, a small dwelling situated in the neighborhood of Versailles. Only twelve ladies were present, among whom were the Princess de Metternich, the Duchess de Mouchy, Madame de la Poëze, and some others belonging to the imperial household. The toilettes were fresh and generally quite simple; the Empress wore a blue-striped dress with paletot and overskirt of white muslin flounced and festooned and lined with blue silk, with a trailing sprig of blush roses on one side and a large blue feather. These little Louis XIV. hats, with flowers on one side and feathers on the other, are the favorites of the season; now that the Empress has adopted them, nothing else will be seen in the elegant world. They will not, however, become common, since large feathers are costly, and are increasing in price with the increased demand.

The next day a select ball was given, at which the Empress seemed in charming spirits. Besides a considerable number of official personages a few stars of the world of art and the drama were present; M. Anber, still young in mind and talent in spite of his fourscore years, and who has finished a new opera, Rêve d'amour, while his last success, Le premier jour de Bonheur, is still in the flush of triumph—the very titles of his last works show that his inspiration is still in the spring-time of youth and running over with melody; M. Claude Bernard, the newly-elected member of the French Academy, a learned physiologist, who was elected at the same time with M. Autran, the Marseillaise poet, the author of La fille d'Eschyle; M. Carpeaux, the sculptor; M. Lachaux, the celebrated advocate, and some other celebrities. The Marquis de Caux, not having yet returned from his bridal tour with the diva Patti, now his wife, was unable to lead the cotillion, which was conducted by a young secretary of the English Embassy who filled the place very well.

Madame Victor Hugo has been in Paris for a few weeks; she has been brought hither by her ill health. She is accompanied by her eldest son M. Charles Hugo and his wife. M. Charles Hugo is engaged in writing a work on exile. His younger brother remains at Brussels engaged on a history of the forty fauteuils of the French Academy, a work which will fill up a void in our literary history.

ELIANE DE MARSY.

POPPING.

THAT brightness of brightness—a warm, glowing fire! It lured me, and charmed me, though really forlorn As, inwardly nursing a holy desire, I sat in my chamber one night—popping corn.

'Twas pleasant to watch it. Each hard, shiny kernel Stirred, trembled, then burst into feathery white. How I longed thus to feather the torture supernal, The strange, shining trouble so vexing that night!

All popped. On the platter. Right proudly I scanned it— The lightest and whitest that ever was seen— When softly as moonlight—I can't understand it— She stole to my elbow—my own Geraldine!

Now blithely, and brave as the corn in its hopping, I drew her still nearer; and quickly I said, "Do you know, Geraldine, I am thinking of popping?" She laughed and she frowned, but she blushed rosy red.

"My queen and my life! I must certainly pop This hard little, troublesome kernel of doubt— This sharp grain of shyness that never will stop From pricking my heart till I flip it out.

"We have known one another so long and so well," This torturing kernel is strange, I confess. One would think I could have not a story to tell— Or none that you might not full easily guess.

"But that only makes it the harder, I think; Your look of bewilderment, honest surprise, Whenever I try, makes my poor courage sink Abashed in the light of your innocent eyes.

"Yet—knowing what lights them—Oh generous heart! Aglow with its goodness, its beautiful past— Thy warmth to my kernel. Thou wilt? See it start! It has popped! Ah, my darling, you know me at last!"

Yes, popped was my secret—so lightly and whitely! I awoke with a start. Geraldine was not there— But only the popped corn, that whitely and lightly Had lain in my hand as I dozed in my chair.

MUDDLERS.

THE domestic muddle is perhaps "the greatest plague in life." A house and home that is thoroughly muddled—that is, not under the influential control of some presiding spirit of purity and order—is no house at all, in the sense of home. Order, which "is heaven's first law," is home's first law also, and one might as well expect to feel at home in Billingsgate Market as in a dwelling whence order is banished. Where the mistress of a household is a muddler, woe to that household. There, you may be sure, the golden maxim, "A place for every thing and every thing in its place," is altogether ignored. Instead of that, there is no place for any thing, and whatsoever thing happens to be wanted at any time will have to be looked for in the last place where it was used, if any body can remember where that was. The result is not only loss of time but loss of temper, loss of comfort, loss of rest and ease, and loss of money too; and, worse than all, is the moral deterioration of the atmosphere, and the setting up of a chronic condition of irritation and annoyance in place of the genial kindness, forbearance, and mutual self-abnegation which, wherever they prevail, make a man's home a blessing prized far above all that lies beyond it.

THE WHITE CAMELLIA.

I.—THE PHOTOGRAPH.

THERE were no pleasanter rooms in London than those of my friend, Edward Maynard, Esq., artist and Bohemian, or, as his friends called him, "Teddy." There was no occasion to repeat his surname, for London contained but one "Teddy" for us, Teddy Maynard.

When I say Bohemian, I do not mean that Teddy's existence was spent in the haunting of disreputable taverns, and the consumption of alcoholic mixtures, the characteristics of many of the Bohemians of the present day; but that his tastes were of a delicately unconventional kind, and that while no cavalier looked more irreproachable at the "Zoo" on Sundays, he had gone through adventures in France and Spain which served to show he had deserted his vocation in being an artist, and should have "gone in for" knight-errantry.

To return, however, to Teddy's rooms, in which I was sitting on one pleasant afternoon, just when the spring was about to surrender herself to the kiss of summer. They were decorated after a design of his own. Dark maroon-colored panels, edged with gold, with hangings and furniture to correspond. Over the mantle-piece was a curious old-fashioned glass, set in an oak frame. Cabinets and book-cases of the same wood stood in various parts of the room, and the walls were adorned with some good pictures in oil and water colors, the production chiefly of Teddy's artist friends, who had given him those "nice little bits," which delight painters and puzzle the public. It was not far off Regent Street, a quiet row of houses within sight and hearing of that gay thoroughfare; and the distant echoes of voices and footsteps, mingled with the roll of carriages, brought one's thoughts back to London, when the beauty of the afternoon had carried them away into dreamy visions of how the country was looking in the spring-time.

Teddy was out. He was always out when you called, and I was waiting for him, in obedience to a note left for me with his Cerberus. Having to wait, it was natural that I should light a cigar, and then looking about for that mischief which Dr. Watts declares the enemy of mankind will always find for idle hands to do, I seized upon one of the photographic albums which ornamented the table, and commenced an investigation as to whether Teddy had picked up any new cartes-de-visite.

And how was I rewarded? How can I put upon paper the impression that a photograph, the last in the album, made upon me? I was at first quite startled. I was only looking at the pictures carelessly, but something in the face of this one made me start up and go to the window with the book, to get a better light upon it. The photograph was a wonderfully good one. The sun, glad to limn so fair a face, had done his work lovingly and well. It was the most beautiful, the most expressive face that I had ever seen. Dark hair, as far as I could tell, a face classical in its perfection, lit up with eyes that seemed almost to have the power of speech as they looked at you. An exquisite mouth, small and not too full, while the curve of the chin, and the way in which the head was posed on the bosom, "like a bell-flower on its bed," might have inspired Mr. Browning with that simile.

It was not only love at first-sight, but love with a photograph. I had not thought my susceptibilities easily roused, but here I was in a fever of love about a small picture on a piece of pasteboard. Who was this girl? That was the question. I hastily took the photograph out of the book, and looked to see who the photographer was. There was no name at the back of it. Plain card-board—that was all. The usual photographer's imprint, and number of the negative, absent. Where had Teddy got it? Was it a carte of one of his friends? or had he picked it up somewhere? Was she married? or engaged? In short, who and what was this mysterious girl, who had changed me from a sober and rational being into a strangely frantic and excited creature?

When would Teddy come in? I paced the room impatiently, holding the photograph before me. I opened the window, and looked up and down the street many times, and at last, after what seemed hours, I heard his footsteps on the stairs, and he lounged into the room.

"Well, old man, how are you?" he said. "Glad you got my note and waited."

"Teddy," I said, without returning his greeting, and showing him the photograph, "tell me whose likeness this is?"

"Oh!" said Teddy, prolonging that exclamation in the most aggravating way possible, and coolly lighting a pipe, "how excited we are about it?"

"I know I am excited," I said, for I had worked myself up into a perfectly ridiculous condition. "But do answer my question. Who is this girl? I must know."

"Let me see," said he, pretending not to recognize it. "Oh, yes! that—that—a photograph of my aunt, the Empress of China! Nice old girl, isn't she?"

"Teddy," I said, impatiently, "please be serious. I'm awfully spoony upon this picture. Pray tell me where you got it, and all about it."

"I tell you my aunt—," he began; and then, seeing how annoyed I looked, he said, "Well, my dear boy, the fact is, I don't know who it is any more than you do. I thought it was a tidy face, and bought it of some photographic chap in the suburbs somewhere, for a shilling."

I was bitterly disappointed, and sat down in a disconsolate way, still keeping hold of the photograph. I had almost rather he had told me the unknown beauty was married, or out of my reach in some other way. It was the suspense, the absence of any knowledge whatever about her, that was so hard to bear.

"Why, Frank, old boy," said Teddy, "you look all knocked of a heap. You don't mean to say that you are really spoons on that carte. Why, she may be the mother of any number of promising children. She may be a blessed barmaid! She—"

"Teddy, please don't. I'm hard hit. I know I'm an ass, but I can't help it. I will find out about this girl, if possible. Can't you remember where you bought the photograph?"

"No; upon my honor I can't. Somewhere near Westbourne Grove, I fancy. I was dining in Bayswater, I know; but I can't be sure."

"I may have it, I suppose?"

"Certainly. But if you'll take my advice, Frank, you'll put it into the fire."

"Thank you. I sha'n't do that." And I placed the carte carefully in my pocket-book. "Now, good-by. Look you up again to-morrow."

"All right. But where are you off to in such a hurry?"

"Well," I said, slowly, "I think I shall take a walk in the neighborhood of Westbourne Grove."

"You old ass," was the complimentary rejoinder, and then I went away.

II.—WESTBOURNE GROVE.

WESTBOURNE GROVE, as most Londoners know, is not to be understood in a sylvan or rural sense, for but few trees grace the pleasant Bayswater thoroughfare which goes by that name. It is a sort of miniature Regent Street, many of the shops being offshoots from parent establishments there; and it is the favorite lounge of the female part of the Bayswater population. Bayswater, as every body knows, is given up almost entirely to stock-brokers, retired Indian officers, and Jews: it is a sort of metropolitan Asia Minor; and about four o'clock on a fine afternoon all that is fairest of the female, and most Israelitish of the male sex promenades Westbourne Grove.

Such is Westbourne Grove; and for this promenade I started when I left Teddy Maynard's rooms with the precious photograph in my possession.

When I got into Regent Street I hailed a Hansom, and was soon speeding westward toward the Grove. As soon as I was safely ensconced in the vehicle I took out the portrait. It looked lovelier than before, the face still fairer than when I had first seen it; and by the time I got to the Marble Arch I was more in love with it than ever. It was madness, I knew, but men had been mad before my time for love of a woman's face; and wiser men than I was had engaged in the mad tournament in olden times to win a smile from a lady that they could never dare to love. I had imported the Old World madness of chivalry into the nineteenth century; and it was nobody's business but my own if I chose to go on what every one of my friends would call a wild-goose chase after a carte-de-visite.

In the mean time I was speeding toward Westbourne Grove, wrapped in the contemplation of my beloved photograph, and with no very definite idea of what course I was going to pursue when I reached my destination.

Teddy had given me no clew whatever to the photographer; there would be a dozen in the Grove, and I was not even sure that his purchase had not been made in some street in the vicinity; so that to take the picture round to every photographer in the neighborhood seemed likely to be a very hopeless business, which would lead to no satisfactory result. It was probable, I thought, that the portrait had been privately taken, and that possibly a few copies had remained in the photographer's hands. There was some chance, then, that finding the picture had sold, he might, if he possessed another, have exposed it also for sale. I accordingly dismissed my cab at the end of the Queen's Road, and commenced an investigation of the photographers in the Grove.

It was weary work, for, as I might have expected, I could find no counterpart of my portrait. I even went into several places and made inquiries as to whether it had been taken there; but my question was met with a supercilious negative, one magnificently-attired artist informing me that their work was "infinitely superior to any thing like that." It seemed like sacrilege to be thus exposing my picture to vulgar gaze, and I determined to abandon the search, at all events for some days. I thought that in the mean while I would try and extract from Teddy more exactly the whereabouts of the place at which he had bought it. I would make him come with me to Bayswater, and go over the ground which he had traversed on the day when he discovered the photograph. If that plan failed, I should have no alternative but to try every photographer in the district; and I determined that even if the search lasted for months I would persevere with it, and not rest until I had at least discovered who the original of my cherished portrait was, where she lived, and what was her position in life. It was a mad resolve; but I am a man of very obstinate nature, and I determined to accomplish my purpose.

On application to Teddy next day he received me with a great deal of unfeeling chaff; and I found that it was quite hopeless to attempt to get any more precise directions from him. He had gone in a cab to Bayswater, he said, and had stopped to get some cigars. He had seen the photograph near the tobacconist's, had bought it, and then driven on, and had "not the vaguest notion"—so he said—as to what street it was in. Somewhere near Westbourne Grove, that was all he could tell me; and he concluded his information, as he had done our previous conversation on the subject, with the gratuitous statement that I was a great donkey to go running after a photograph. Thus far Teddy: of no use at all to me.

And in truth, after many inquiries in various quarters, I began in some measure to doubt the wisdom of my proceedings myself. Not a very surprising thing, perhaps, when my situation was calmly reviewed. Here I was, rushing all over town after photographers, only to meet with perpetual disappointment; and even if I was so far successful as to find out who my portrait was, I might be as far off knowing her and winning her as ever. I looked at the fair face, and the wonderful eyes that met mine so steadily in the picture, and I was driven nearly mad by the thought that they might even then be smiling upon some one else; that some one with a good right to such happiness was even then caressing that sweet face. She might be another man's wife, and all I could do when I found her out would be to accept my fate, and leave the place where she lived, to hide my hopeless love, as the old song says, "forever and a day!"

At last, after visiting scores of photographers, I began to think my search hopeless, and to despair of ever finding my visionary lady-love. I did not swerve, however, in my allegiance to her charms. I still held my carte-de-visite to be the portrait of the fairest, sweetest woman upon earth. I would continue to hold that belief, no matter whether I ever found her or not. The said portrait in time, after much affectionate saluting of an osculatory nature, began to get somewhat faded, and to lose some of its original brilliancy. I determined, therefore, to have it copied by a first-rate artist, and I thought that at the same time I would have it enlarged. I was doubtful about having it colored, for I hardly knew the exact tints to order. So I took the carte to one of the greatest photographers in town—a man, by-the-way, to whom I had before applied to see if he knew any thing of it—and I gave orders for an enlarged copy to be made of it in the very best possible style.

The attendant to whom I gave the order, after looking at the portrait for a few minutes, said, "An enlarged copy of this, Sir? You can have it directly. Didn't you order one the other day, Sir?"

"No!" I said, in the utmost astonishment. "But I order it now."

"Well, Sir, I think we have one on hand. Will you walk this way?"

In another instant I had followed him into an adjoining room, and there, on an easel, stood a large portrait of my darling!

Enlarged evidently from a copy of the same carte as I possessed, but it was colored; and now that I could see the exact shade of the hair and complexion, it looked more beautiful than ever.

"I have been looking for this every where," I said, eagerly, to the attendant. "Pray tell me who it is?"

"Who it is!" the man repeated, looking at me suspiciously. "Why, it's an enlarged copy of the portrait you have in your hand to be sure."

He thought, of course, that I must know the original; and I saw the necessity of being cautious, or he might refuse to give me the information I wanted.

"Ah, yes," I said; "but I was to order this enlargement for a friend of the lady's, and I was not told the name. Can't you tell me?"

The man still seemed suspicious, but took up an order-book and said,

"Well, Sir, I'd better take your order, and we shall see the name here, I dare say."

I gave my order for an enlargement like the one before me, and begged the man not to mention it to the persons who had ordered the first one, as it was intended as a surprise to some relatives. I enforced my request by a liberal douceur, and the man, who seemed quite mollified, turned over to some previous entries, and said, showing me the book,

"There you are, Sir. Miss Vane, 28 Worcester Square, Hyde Park. W."

My heart beat, and I felt my face flushing, as I read the address. I had found her at last—and she was still Miss Vane—unless, indeed, "Miss Vane" was only some relation.

"I suppose this is the lady herself?" I said, carelessly.

"Yes, Sir, I think so," the man said, "for I waited on her."

"Thanks," I returned; and, after mentally noting the address, I rushed off to Maynard's rooms.

III.—IN THE PARK.

TEDDY was seated in his easiest arm-chair, tranquilly engaged in the consumption of sherry and seltzer, and smoking an enormously long wooden pipe. He looked up as I entered, and said, "Ah! the photographic maniac; and how are we and the picture to-day?"

"To-day," I said, in a tone of triumph, "we have found out the address."

"Indeed," he said, calmly; "then sit down and have a pipe; there's plenty of seltzer in that cupboard, so mix and be happy."

"Insensate creature! you don't even ask who she is!"

"Not I. I have heard so much about her for the past month or so that you'll excuse me for saying it, but I think I would rather not know her address. If you want to rave about her as usual I'll shut my eyes and listen. Don't go on longer than you can help."

"Wretch!" I said, laughing, "she is a Miss Vane—lives in Worcester Square, Hyde Park."

"Is she? Old maid, I suppose?"

"Well, if you think her photograph is that of an old maid you are welcome to your opinion. All I can say is that I don't agree with you."

"And what are you going to do now? You don't know any Vane, and I don't know any Vane. I don't see how you're any nearer to your object, which I presume is an introduction. Be satisfied with the address. Give it up—and hand me the tobacco-jar."

"I shall do neither. I must know Miss Vane; and you are so insufferably lazy that it will do you all the good in the world to get the baccy for yourself."

"How do you propose to begin this charming plan?"

"By going off immediately to reconnoitre the house. I may catch a glimpse of her."

"Poor fellow!" said Teddy, mockingly, touching his forehead significantly. "How far gone we are, to be sure!"

Teddy Maynard was never known to be in love with any body himself, and he was quite incapable of comprehending it in other people. Regardless of his chaff, I set off to Worcester Square to have a look at number twenty-eight.

I found, as I expected, a fine decorous-looking mansion, with nothing to distinguish it from the other houses in the square. I did not imagine, of course, that there would be any thing distinctive about it; but it seemed to me, in my excited frame of mind, that the careless way in which people passed it was highly reprehensible. They did not know what a pearl of price that dull casket contained. There was nothing to be gained, however, by watching the house just when the inhabitants would be going to dinner, and Miss

Vane was hardly likely to appear at one of the windows for my benefit, like a princess in a story book; so I left the square and betook myself to a solitary dinner at the club, where I held a council of war with myself.

The result of that council was that I determined my first move must be to see the lady, to make sure that she was Miss Vane, the original of my photograph, and whether she was likely to stay in town during the whole of the season. In accordance with this resolve I went down to Worcester Square the next day, and had an interview with the affable policeman on duty in the neighborhood. He knew Worcester Square, he said, well—had been in service near it before he entered the force. Yes. A Mr. Vane, Colonel Vane, lived at number twenty-eight. Any family? Yes—Miss Vane, as handsome a young lady as ever stepped. Did they drive or walk out much? Generally drove—about two or three in the afternoon. Was always glad to answer a gent's questions, when he was a gent; and as he spoke my informant's hand closed affectionately over the half-sovereign which I slipped into it.

This was so far satisfactory. I did not go back to incredulous Teddy to pass the morning, but strolled tranquilly into the Park, and there consumed innumerable cigars, thinking over my good fortune in having a chance of seeing Miss Vane. I began to wonder, in a foolish and fantastic way, whether she would notice me. It was exceedingly improbable that she should do so, but I had been thinking of her so continuously for so many months that I almost believed my mind could, as some people say, have influenced hers. Our thoughts should have been en rapport, some knowledge of my strange and earnest love might, I fancied, have made itself felt in her heart. If the mind, concentrated on one object, has power and volition beyond the body, as has been asserted—and cases bearing out the statement are not uncommon—I know that I must have exercised some mysterious influence over her thought and feeling, although she would never know from whence it sprang.

Such were some of my thoughts as I paced up and down the broad walks of the Park, watching the workmen putting up the very unornamental railings, and longing for the hour to come when I might have a chance of again seeing my divinity.

I was just leaving the Park when I saw an open carriage coming toward the gates at a quick pace. I stepped aside to let it pass—and the face that had haunted me sleeping and waking for so many months flashed across me again. Our eyes met for a minute, and then the carriage bore her out of sight, and left me standing near the gates with my face flushed and my heart beating as if I had been undergoing some violent exercise.

Colonel Vane and his daughter had come for their drive earlier than usual, or I might have seen her get into the carriage. Now, however, they would probably be in the drive, and I could go and watch them pass and repass. I accordingly went and stationed myself at a convenient part of the railings, and waited for the carriage. At last, far down the line, I could see it approach. My darling had on the airiest, sweetest little summer bonnet in the world, and her beautiful brown hair shone underneath it, as it formed a coronal for the fair face and lustrous eyes that held me in thrall.

Her father, a handsome, soldierly-looking old man with a gray mustache, sat beside her, and she seemed to be listening attentively to some story he was telling her, for she looked straight in front of her, and I never caught her eye again during the whole time that I watched her in the drive.

And yet it was happiness enough just to be within a few yards of her, to be able to see her at all, and until they drove away from the Park my bliss was complete. Then I went away also, feeling very disconsolate my vision had vanished. When was I to see it again, and how was I to get any nearer to an intimacy with her? Any one might look at her in the Park. How was I to gain a dearer privilege?

IV.—AT THE OPERA.

I DETERMINED to go to Maynard again, and, luckily, on my way home I met him at a literary and artistic club of which we were both members.

He was smoking as usual, and his first remark was, "Well, old man, how goes it?"

"I've just come from seeing her—"

"Oh! it's her again, is it? I thought you'd quite forgotten that affair," he said, laughing.

"Then you're doomed to disappointment, my boy. I've just come from seeing her out driving in the Park—have seen her several times, and it was glorious!"

"Ah! it was glorious, was it? And what are you going to do next?"

"That's just what I want to know—I don't know what to do next. Can you advise me?"

"Throw yourself before the wheels of her chariot, and when the hoofs of her haughty steeds are trampling out your heart's best blood, tell her how you love her." And Teddy, as he spoke, waved his cigar dramatically, and then leaned back in his arm-chair as if the effort had been too much for him.

"Don't chaff me, please, but tell me what I'm to do."

Teddy, who is a capital fellow at heart, looked serious for a moment, and then said:

"I have it. Write to her!"

"Write to her?"

"Yes."

"But I don't know her, and she'll never forgive such a piece of impertinence."

"Never mind. Risk it. He either fears his fate too much—or you know the rest—that's my advice. If you won't take it, why the deuce did you ask me for it?"

"I think I will," I said, musingly. "That's right," said Teddy, encouragingly. "Write and say who you are; I wouldn't give your real name, but let her know you're a gentleman, and that if she takes you she'll stand a chance of being Lady Harcourt some day. Say you don't want to press matters till you can get a formal introduction to her, and"—here he stopped a moment—"ask her, if she's not very angry with you, to be at the Opera on some night in one week, when you'll go every night it's open, and wear a white camellia in your button-hole. There's your plan all cut and dried, and you're the most ungrateful fellow in the world if you don't carry it out."

I was rather staggered at the boldness of this proposal, and went home, after having thanked Teddy, promising to think it over. It was indeed a mad scheme, not wilder though than my wild search, after I had seen her photograph. And remember, I was madly in love with Miss Vane; so madly, indeed, that I could not be content to wait until, by some happy accident, I met her in society and got introduced to her. She might be engaged to some one else in the interval, if even she were not engaged already; she might even get married; and I was resolved at least to let her know how strange and mad a passion she had inspired. A girl with such eyes, I thought, must be romantic, and surely all the romance of her nature would come to my aid when she knew for how long I had worshiped her photograph.

For two more days I watched her in the Park, and then I determined to act upon Teddy's advice. Not without some misgivings, however, as to the romantic nature of the proposal having any weight with her; for on one occasion she was riding, and was attended not only by her father, but by a younger cavalier with whom she seemed to be on very intimate terms, and I fancied that she was chaffing him unmercifully about something.

Our family were famous in old days for acting without hesitation when once a course of action was decided upon, and I was no exception to the general rule. A letter, precisely in accordance with the sagacious Teddy's instructions, was written and dispatched the next day. I did not give my own name, fearing Miss Vane's indignation. Being anonymous, the letter could do no harm if it fell into the hands of any one who knew me. Of course she would see me if she went to the Opera; but I thought that, if she kept the appointment, she would hardly be so base as to betray me. There were four opera nights at Covent Garden during the next week, and on one of these four occasions I implored her to appear. I should be there with the white camellia, and I should—so I said in the letter—construct her attendance as a sign that she was not fatally angry with me, and that I might seek an introduction to her in some more conventional and legitimate manner.

It was with a beating heart that I took my seat in a stall at the Opera on the first of the appointed nights. I was absurdly early, in my eagerness to be upon the scene, and few persons but myself were in the theatre. These I scanned carefully through my opera-glass, and as the stalls and boxes began to fill I devoted the whole of my time to a steady scrutiny of their occupants. People near me in the stalls must have wondered what made me so regardless of the music, and so much on the alert when any new-comer appeared in the house. I was voted a great barbarian, no doubt, with no soul for music, and my neighbors must have speculated what had brought me to the Opera, since I had evidently not come there to listen to the singing.

But my search was hopeless. I looked in vain round the "glittering horse-shoe" that spread before me like a rainbow. I saw many fair faces, many bright eyes bent earnestly upon the stage; golden-haired and dark-haired beauties sat in snug boxes, enthroned like queens, while attentive gentlemen, in irreproachable evening-dress, bent over them. But nowhere in the great theatre could I see the one face that was engraven on my heart: on the first night, at all events, she had not thought fit to come; and as my mind dwelt on my disappointment, I was very angry with myself for ever having taken Teddy's advice, and having written my mad letter. I went home in a very disconsolate mood, although I was rather consoled by the enlarged photograph which had been taken for me, and which was installed in a place of honor in my rooms.

The next day I had no heart even to go to the Park; and again, punctual to the time of opening, I went to the Opera. Again I was disappointed. Miss Vane was evidently incensed at my impertinence in writing to her, and never made her appearance. I returned home the second night mad with love and disappointment. I went into Maynard's rooms and upbraided him for his advice, and altogether, as he said, I qualified myself for Colney Hatch by easy stages. I tried to console myself with my portrait; and I saw Miss Vane for an instant in the Park on the third day, but she only drove round once; and I took my seat at the Opera, so prepared for a third disappointment that when she never appeared I settled down into calm despair. There was one more night, however—one more chance for me and my white camellia; and I still dared to hope that I should see her.

On this fourth evening I was obliged to go out to dinner. My host was an old friend of our family, who had been for many years in Canada, and had now come home to settle in his native country. He had no family; had taken a handsome house in town, and was very desirous of showing every possible kindness to me. I was obliged, therefore, to accept his invitation, but hoped that the Laurences would let me get away in time to go to the Opera.

I was pleasantly surprised; therefore, when on reaching their home, and going up into the drawing room, Mrs. Laurence said to me, "My husband will have to make his apologies to you, Mr. Harcourt, for he is obliged to go off on some most important business immediately after dinner. Now, as I can not expect to be able to amuse you all the evening, I have got a box at the Opera, Covent Garden. Will you take me?"

"I shall be delighted. But I hope you don't think I should not be equally pleased to be here."

"Well, the fact is," she said, "I am not wholly unselfish. I very seldom get to the Opera, as my husband does not care for music, and am glad when I can catch any one who will go with me. We shall not be alone, by-the-by, as I have a young lady coming to the box who will only need an escort to her carriage, for she is a very independent person, and goes about a good deal by herself."

"Indeed," I said.

"Yes; she is a charming girl, however, and I hope you will like her."

Then Mr. Laurence came in, and shortly afterward dinner was announced.

Such an arrangement was an extremely fortunate one for me, I thought, and I only hoped that Mrs. Laurence and her charming young lady might devote themselves entirely to the music, and leave me at liberty to scrutinize the house.

One thing I had to remember, and that was my camellia. I had left the one I intended to wear at my chambers. However, I persuaded good-natured Mrs. Laurence to drive round by my rooms, under pretense of getting my own opera-glass, which I said was specially adapted to my sight. Then I got my flower, put it carefully into my button-hole, and covered it over with my light over-coat.

When we drew up under the portico at Covent Garden and were entering the lobby Mrs. Laurence said to me:

"Why, I declare, there are the Colonel and Edith going up yonder before us. I suppose he's just brought her, for I know he had to go to the same meeting as Mr. Laurence."

"The Colonel and Edith!" "The Colonel!" gave me a thrill, thinking of her father, and I wondered with a vague curiosity who they were.

We were getting near our box, led by an obsequious attendant, when I said to Mrs. Laurence:

"You talked of the Colonel just now. May I ask who he is?"

"Colonel Vane; an old friend of my husband's. He was quartered at Quebec a long time. Edith is his only child, and they live in Worcester Square."

I sometimes wonder now that I didn't faint at this intelligence. I am sure unsuspecting Mrs. Laurence must have felt the arm on which she was leaning tremble, and I fancied even the box-keeper must have been able to hear my heart beating. Edith Vane! This, then, was the name of my idol; and I thought never did name sound so musical. In a few seconds I should be in her company. I remembered my letter and the camellia. Had she come, I wondered, on this last night? But just as we reached the box-door I tore the flower from my button-hole, and put it into the ticket-pocket of my coat. I was about to be properly introduced to her, and I thought I would dissociate myself from my foolish letter.

We got to the box; the usual introductions followed, and then Colonel Vane departed, and left me with the ladies. They had a great deal to say to each other, and for some time I occupied myself with sitting in the back of the box, just content to look at Edith. If I had thought her beautiful in her photograph, and when out driving, think how I worshiped her loveliness when I saw her in full dress. I was glad that I had some time given me to recover myself, and to collect my thoughts, for I was so stunned by this unexpected good fortune that I should have acquitted myself badly had I been required to make myself agreeable as soon as we were seated at the theatre. I was glad Edith had so much to say to Mrs. Laurence, and I was amusing myself by comparing her real face, as I saw it before me, with my photograph, when Mrs. Laurence turned to me and said, laughingly:

"Mr. Harcourt, you have perhaps sharper eyes than Edith or myself. Can you see any gentleman in the theatre with a white camellia in his button-hole?"

A pleasant occupation for me truly! How thankful I was I had taken the odious flower out.

"Yes," said Miss Vane, merrily, "do you see any swain in the stalls who looks particularly love-stricken?"

"May I ask the reason of this investigation?" I said, as lightly as I could, although I felt very nervous. "Is this an appointment?"

Miss Vane glanced quickly at me for a moment as if some suspicion had entered her head, and then said, smiling,

"Well, I suppose it is. The fact is, Mr. Harcourt, I have an unknown admirer, who implored me to be at the Opera on one night out of four. I did not intend to come, but papa wished me to do so to-night: so, if the enterprising individual is in the house he will be gratified."

"The faithless creature is not here, apparently," I said, scrutinizing the house through my opera-glass: "at least I don't see any white camellia, if that was the sign."

"I'm afraid he's not," said Miss Vane. "How very ungallant of him, is it not, Mr. Harcourt?"

"Poor young man!" said good-natured Mrs. Laurence, who was of rather a sentimental character. "He may have seen you, and be really in love with you, Edith; and you said you thought, from his letter, that he was a gentleman."

"Well, he has not kept tryst," I said, leaning forward to get a good view of the house, and wondering whether any wretch would be present with a conspicuous white camellia, who would be singled out as the hero of the romance.

When I next turned to speak to Miss Vane, I noticed a new and curious expression on her face, as if something was occupying her thoughts that she was trying to conceal: something amusing, apparently, for her eyes were laughing, although her face looked quiet and demure. She answered some question I put to her about the music, and then said,

"Do you often go to the Opera, Mr. Harcourt?"

"Oh yes," I said, carelessly. "I've been three times before this week." And then, remembering my letter, I turned away to hide my confusion.

The hours went swiftly by: far too fast, I thought, for I was in the seventh heaven of delight, and Mrs. Laurence seemed very pleased that Miss Vane and I got on so well together. I heard little of the opera that evening. "Diva" Patti was entrancing all hearts upon the stage, but my Diva was beside me in the box, and I had no ears for the music.

But the happy evening ended at last. We escorted Edith to her carriage, and then I drove home with Mrs. Laurence, both of us singing a chorus in her praise. One thing deserves to be noted about that evening at the Opera. When I got home, strange to say, I could not find my camellia any where, and imagined that it must have been jerked out of my pocket. However, I had, luckily, not needed it, and I went to bed happy, and dreamed of Edith Vane.

V.—THE EPILOGUE.

MRS. LAURENCE, who, like all middle-aged ladies, was very fond of match-making, had evidently made up her mind to foster my love affair as much as possible; for I was continually being invited to her house and always met Edith Vane. I came to know the Colonel also, and in time was invited to Worcester Square, where Edith played the hostess like a little queen. Need I say that I came daily to love her more and more? And I had the happiness of believing that she was not indifferent to my devotion. Riding by her side in the Park, I used sometimes to look back upon the old days when I worshiped her at a distance, and hardly dared to hope that I should ever be so blessed as to be daily in her society.

One afternoon I had gone to Worcester Square, and as Edith was too tired with a ball the previous night to go out riding, I staid chatting with her in the pleasant drawing-room. And that summer afternoon I put my fate to the touch; and a strange answer I received to my pleading, when I told Edith Vane how I loved her, and asked her to be my wife. She did not reply at once, but at last she said:

"Please do not think unkindly of me, but I have a confession to make."

"I can not think unkindly of you, Miss Vane—Edith! You know it would be impossible."

"Do you remember," she said, "that night at the Opera, when a gentleman was to meet me with a white camellia in his button-hole?"

"Perfectly. How can I ever forget it? It was the first time I met you!"

"Well," she said, slowly, "although perhaps you did not see him, I saw the gentleman with the camellia that night."

"Did you?" I said, feeling terribly annoyed. Some fellow had been there with the flower; camellias were common enough. How was it I hadn't seen him?

"Yes," she went on, "and I have seen him since—very often!" And as she spoke she hung her head down, as if to hide her blushes.

How I cursed Teddy and his hateful advice! Some one had heard of the letter and had taken advantage of my plan to steal my darling's heart.

"And—and—" I said, trembling, "I know I have no right to ask—you love him?"

A burning blush came over her face and neck as she looked into my eyes and said,

"I do!"

I clasped my hands over my face, and groaned. Here was a pleasant end to all my plotting! And yet she had given me many reasons for believing that she had some love for me. It was very bitter to hear her confess her love for another man, and to know that it had been brought about by my agency.

I was startled by a laugh. Edith Vane was sitting near me, positively laughing at my misery.

"I hardly thought I should have been insulted," I said, indignantly.

But still Edith did nothing but laugh.

"How have I insulted you?" she said.

"How have you insulted me? Why, by laughing at my disappointment when you have confessed your love for another man!"

"But I have not done that!"

"I can not stop to guess riddles, Miss Vane," I said, abruptly. "What do you mean?"

"Why, I mean that I love"—and here she half turned her head away—"the gentleman who had a camellia that night at the Opera, and he says I insult him by saying so. Oh, Frank!"

And then, looking divinely beautiful, she held out to me—my white camellia! And in another moment she was hiding her rosy face on my shoulder.

So I won my darling. The original of the cherished photograph was mine. The appointment with the wearer of the white camellia was kept for life.

THE HOUSEHOLD ANGEL.

By FITZ HUGH LUDLOW.

CHAPTER VI.

HOLDING the hand of the little guardian who had saved him from death, Cuthbert dared at length to return to the house. Without her he could never have fortified himself to enter again the presence either of his wife or Derrick. The latter met him at the door with a good-humored smile. Cuthbert would have passed him with no other recognition than crimsoned cheeks and a tremulous "Good-morning;" but Derrick caught him by the shoulders, looked him full in the face, and burst into a roar.

"Why, bless my soul, man! What's the matter with you?" cried he. "You're the worst-looking case of katzenjammer I ever saw in my life! Can't you speak to a fellow? You don't mean to say that you've got that face on just because you were a little too jolly last night?"

"Dalmager, I was a brute—a vile brute-beast last night!" replied Cuthbert, still scarcely able for shame to lift his head and look his friend in the face.

"Oh, stuff and nonsense!" said Derrick; "do you suppose you're the only man who ever tipped his elbow once too often overnight and felt his hair pull in the morning? Why, you morbid Yankee, there are heaps of eminent citizens—that stand high in the church, at the polls, in their professions, and in the domestic circle (I quote from memory out of the Owlville Clarion, week before election), that make it a point to go to bed every night of their lives as you did last night. They'd think their constitutions had got out of order if they skipped one night in the three sixty-five. Come, come! You can't import your Puritanism into this latitude. It's as out of place here as over-coats in June—which I understand you Massachusetts fellows wear all the year round like your morals. 'Twon't do, old fellow—so take that stretcher out of your lank chops, and look as if you had a friend in the world."

"Come, papa," said Lily, who, without understanding his view of the matter, had been jarred by the Doctor's levity upon a subject as deeply if not as despairingly at heart with her as with her father. "Come and see dear mamma, she'll be frightened for both of us, I'm afraid; we've been away a long, long time."

Cuthbert, glad to escape from the friend whose well-meant palliation of his conduct, as he believed it, still hurt his sore conscience like the bitterest irony, went up stairs to the wife whom most of all he dreaded to meet, clinging for protection to the hand of his blessed little mediator, Derrick calling after him to hurry down with Mrs. K. as quick as possible, since breakfast had been kept waiting for him to get over his blues till the potatoes had caught them, and the chops were as stiff as a Yankee deacon's. "Take a hair of the same dog before you eat, old fellow!" he added. "It will make a new man of you; be advised by an old Kentuckian."

During the long conversation of the past evening Derrick's powerful influence with Mrs. Kearney had wrought an unconscious change in her views upon the subject of such lapses as Cuthbert's, to a considerable extent relaxing the severity with which her stern New England training had all her life taught her to regard them, and making her feel that they were less crimes than offenses against good taste. But even had he not counseled leniency as a politic measure in dealing with husbands, Cuthbert's poor sorrow-worn face must have pleaded for him as he came into the room with Lily; and when he knelt beside the bed from which she had not yet risen, broken-heartedly murmuring, "Oh, wife! wife! for God's sake, forgive me, my darling wife!" he was astonished by her turning toward him without even the feminine man-chastisement of tears—even smiling faintly as she patted his cheek in the indulgent, superior fashion with which we restore a child to our good graces, and saying, "There! there! let's try to forget all about it, Cuthbert my dear." He bent over her and kissed her passionately with an unintelligible ache in his heart—as if he would rather have had her feel more deeply the depth of his own self-torture, had that been possible, without her knowing equal torture of her own. He missed the moral strength which a sense of intense solicitude in her would have conferred on him—and though he could not have put it into the vaguest outline of speech, recognized under that air of superior pardon an irreparable loss of wifely respect. All that was included in his fall he could not begin to measure fully, but it involved an empty niche where his standing had once been almost that of godship—a disillusionment of two beautiful eyes which once had never been able to look at him without being blinded by excess of light, and the kisses which he lavished on her meant his heart's passionate snatching after that royalty and worship which he instinctively felt slipping away from him forever. To be her Cuthbert—the Cuthbert of a year ago! He would have died for it! Ah! and only death buys back such things. The disenchanted wife, the lover who has found his mistress common clay, live on and on—love too, while they live, in very noble fashion, but not the old fashion—the magic, rosy fashion of love's young morning. Love forgives, and forgives, and forgives, but is not illusioned again—or again illusioned only when the grave renews apotheosis for the beloved who one day, perhaps without knowing where, or when, or how, slipped down from his Olympus. Cuthbert and his wife had been like young lovers, walking over the roughest by-ways of the world without emerging, so far as regarded each other, from their honey-moon's enamored dream. And now—she might—she did forgive him; but that had happened which forgiveness does not repair. Merciful—oh merciful! that we only dimly suspect, never fully know, and only feel now and then in an evanescent flash this helpless, hopeless change. Else we should have suicides much oftener—realizing in its entirety what is meant by Young Love finding no place for repentance though he seek it carefully with tears.

"Let us try and forget it." So saying she kissed him back, and Cuthbert began living his life on the new plan.

After his wonderful deliverance at the pool, and his discovery that no such ruinous consequences had ensued upon his error as his morbid fancy first pictured to itself, with the love of his little angel redoubled, if possible, by her instinctive sense of her father's need, Cuthbert went about his work in a spirit of grateful humility which sometimes seemed almost like happiness. This feeling continued until mid-winter, then, with the memory of his shame, slowly faded away. Derrick, with a confidence which thrilled him with admiring thankfulness to the finger-tips when he contrasted it with the utter distrust which he had expected after his lapse, committed his business almost entirely to Cuthbert's charge, devoting himself zealously to the duties of the profession in which his name, as a bold and successful expert, was becoming distinguished all over the State. Indeed, the Doctor now staid most of his time at Garnet Run, and patients requiring capital operations came to him many hundreds of miles. He built an office and surgical-room on the grounds near the upper gate, and passed a fortnight at a time without going to Owlville. Meanwhile Cuthbert, with a comfortable carriage at his disposal, a fine team, and a negro boy to drive for him, was visiting distant parts of their own and adjoining counties, making collections and managing sales and purchases, which frequently kept him away from home for several days running. Once or twice his wife accompanied him—and those occasions, bearing a faint resemblance to the excursions they had planned for the time "when they should be rich," during those early honey-moon days when they sat clasping hands and building air-castles by their open fire, were marked with a red letter in Cuthbert's memory. Less delightful than these (for he still loved his wife with the adoration of a true husband and the passionate admiration of a homely, scholarly man for a beautiful woman—loved her better than any one on earth), but less delightful than these only, were the more frequent expeditions in which he had Lily's companionship.

When he had them with him no journey seemed commonplace. To point out every spot which had an historical interest; answer every question about trees and birds and beasts, which from Lily's sweet tongue more especially flowed in a perpetual stream; to let the people where he went see his beautiful companions, and to note the sincere homage even of their rustic stares; to overhear the enthusiastic compliments paid them even when, as often happened, these were pointed by expressions of wonder at the contrast between their charms and the remarkably "ornery" face and figure of their husband and father—were a perpetual exhilaration to Cuthbert's loving nature, and kept him in a happy twitter better than any stimulus that could have been administered by the mouth.

But as the weather grew colder Mrs. Kearney grew more attached to the comforts of the fireside. Accustomed only to New England winters, with their five months' blockade in front of roaring logs and inside stuffed windows, with a temperament exquisitely responding to quiet and luxury, she shuddered at the thought of venturing out for a thirty miles' ride, even in the blander climate of Kentucky; and the anxiety of both of Lily's parents kept them from exposing her to weather which her mother dreaded to encounter herself. The little girl needed all her dutifulness to reconcile her to separation from her father. Slight and fair as she was, Heaven had bestowed on her a constitution without a flaw in it anywhere. She had no weakness of lungs, no delicacy of digestion, no more hereditary bad tendency of morbid sensitiveness in any direction than the first baby that was laid on the lap of the world's mother. She would have been perfectly happy if she could have staid at home and made snowmen with her papa—perfectly happy in a higher kind if he would only have made her his invariable companion in all his journeys, with a box under the seat for books, lunch, and the curiosities, such as last year's birds'-nests, queer pebbles, moss, grotesque twigs, and leaves, which she always collected for her play-house when she went out with him, about which he had exhaustless things to tell her, and which she treasured most sacredly under title of her "Museum." If she had not been as brave a little angel as she was good and loving, she would have bid her father good-by with tears in her eyes every time that he drove away from the portico without her; but all that he ever had of her farewell was tender smiles and what she called "a bushel of kisses," though by the time the sound of his carriage-wheels had died away she was out of sight in the haymow, crying as if her heart would break.

For months after Cuthbert's mortifying disaster he pursued a course of rigid abstinence from stimulants of all sorts. A severe cold caught during one of his long rides led to a renewal of the Doctor's prescription—this time, in the form of a glass of hot spiced rum, administered just before going to bed. He consented to take it with fear and trembling, but it did him so much good that he was not slow to accept Derrick's view of the case, and acknowledge that the only evil of liquor lay in its abuse. He finally returned to the conclusion that, after all, a constitution like his would be benefited by the temperate use of spirits daily—that nothing was a better safeguard against changes of temperature and sudden exposure at a distance from home—a better invigorator, tonic, or means of getting up a reaction when wet through, than a glass of good oily old Bourbon. Presently the little box under the seat in addition to the lunch, and as a substitute for the various nicknackery which had filled it when Lily accompanied him, numbered among its invariable contents a quart bottle selected from the choicest corner of Derrick's cellar.

When such a bottle gets into the medicine chest it is astonishing how rapidly one's nosology amplifies. Cuthbert would have been horrified by the suggestion that it belonged in any other category than that of strictly medical stores; but he soon found so large a variety of ill feelings for which it was a specific, that before he was aware he was having as frequent recourse to it as during the past summer. As the severity of the weather more and more precluded the possibility of taking Lily with him, the dyspeptic melancholy for which Derrick had originally prescribed it became more and more habitual. Yearning for home and love, in a great empty carriage, with no companion but a black driver in front, and Care, the black footman of the poet, behind him—on lonely roads—in lonely inns—still worse, in places where every soul kept festival but his own, and he, out of mere business policy, must take his share in the mirth or be set down as a kill-joy—what wonder that the old temptation ruined his moral defenses, and before any visible excess could sound the alarm-bell to his conscience, possessed a firmer foothold in his citadel than before? Several times during the course of the winter, when many miles from home, he supped with hospitable entertainers after the day's business, and awoke the next morning without any distinct recollection of how he got to bed; but none of his companions, when they met at breakfast with slight headaches, were any better able to inform him; and as he had exposed himself to no daylight scrutiny of unsympathetic eyes, and seemed to be thought better of rather than worse, he treated his experience as a pardonable social conformity, and felt no sting of remorse.

At home he adhered most scrupulously to his resolutions of temperance. The most fastidious person could not have accused him of disgracing his family by any word or deed. Yet the fact that he had resumed the use of liquor was unmistakable. His eye had a moist sparkle which, but for its being plainly induced, would have gone far to redeem him from the charge of home-lessness. It was always an incongruously beautiful feature in his face; his college mates had likened him to Adonis looking out through slits in the mask of a Faun; and now its preternatural brilliancy frightened Lily for half an hour, till she prayed her fears away, after he had stooped over her little crib with candle in hand to kiss her good-night. His tongue, once tied by such a painful self-consciousness, ran now sometimes into positive eloquence as he sat before the blazing oak-logs talking with his wife, Derrick, and any neighbor who might chance in after the little golden head was nestling among its pillows. His cheek had changed its studently pallor for a carmine which never left it save in the early morning; then its ashen hue would have startled his wife had she risen with him, but it was her habit to sleep late, and he scarcely looked at himself in the glass till he had taken his before-breakfast bitters. Any expert must have seen in him one of those cases which have lately received from medical science a distinct name for their condition—a case of "chronic alcoholism." Our best society in every city, in all professions and callings, contain many such. Devout, benevolent, good husbands, fathers, and business men; adequate to every responsibility, faithful to every duty; nobody ever saw them intoxicated; they are a world-wide remove from the brawling drunkard or the fast man and voluptuary. The thought of a spree would horrify them; their convivial indulgences never exceed half a bottle of Medoc or a glass of Amontillado; many of them would be indignant at the charge of drinking for pleasure; what they take is simply as a tonic, and they think that they take very little of that. But they come to some critical time—some climacteric, like thirty years or forty-five, and out goes their life like a sharp-snuffed candle! Or they retire, apparently in the robustest vigor, and are found dead in their beds the next morning; there are livid spots under their skin—"hemorrhagia purpura;" there is a clot in their heart; paralysis has come like a thief in the night—"Paraplegia," "the strong man armed that keepeth his goods in peace." Or perhaps they are attacked by some comparatively trifling disease, from which every body says such a giant constitution must rise and shake itself free, like an ox from a fly, with one wrinkle—a mild pneumonia, a slight pleurisy or gastritis, from which the feeble baby next door recovers in a week; and down they go as if shot through the heart, the disease revealing that every timber has the dry-rot, and the shapely vessel has been sailing along a smooth water, God only knows how long, held together merely by the outer skin of plank. Or they may tumble to pieces of a sudden into that diest rubbish-heap of soul and body, that most abject ruin, of the general paralytic; or some change in worldly circumstances takes away that pride of conventional position which alone stood them in stead of a conscience, and the decorous man, the synonym of respectability, who carries the plate up the aisle to-day, may tomorrow be begging his whilom fellow-vestryman for pennies enough to pass the night in oblivion and the gutter.

I did not set out intending to make such a long digression. I meant only to illustrate "chronic alcoholism" as a form of drinking which is the most insidious of all, because it never disgraces itself. Sometimes it involves three pints of whisky a day—more than the drunkard would need to make his home a hell, his name a hissing, his retinue a crowd of jeering "Arabs," his dormitory the watch-house, and his death a foregone conclusion. Chronic alcoholism keeps a bottle on the top shelf of the closet—takes small drinks constantly—knows the exact line beyond which liquor shows, and that other line, considerably short of this, where it is pleasantly, sub-jectively sensible; then takes religious care never to reach the former mark, and never to fall below the latter one—never to betray itself, yet never to be free from the influence of stimulus during any hour of its waking life.

Alas for himself! Alas for his beautiful young wife! Alas for his little household angel, and the memory of that morning at the Pool! Into the category of such cases had come Cuthbert Kearney.

Derrick Dalmager saw all this with the eyes of a penetrating physician. But among his neighbors—the people with whom he had been reared—the great majority of such as did not get drunk openly belonged to the same class as Cuthbert; and whether calloused by the universality of the fact, or from whatever reason, he minded his own business, and gave his friend no warning. The only notice that he ever took of his "regular habit" was an expression of countenance—a smile so good-natured that more suspicious men than Cuthbert might have taken umbrage at it as a sneer, more especially as it often seemed half-addressed to Mrs. Kearney—like an amused taking of that lady into his confidence, as if he were saying, "He's on his high horse to-night, isn't he?" when the schoolmaster's speech was more than usually unlocked, and his metaphor or antithesis soared in the fire-light, as they discoursed together, into an Oriental fervor beyond the common. There were occasions, indeed, when the intense pathos or lofty morality of Cuthbert's utterance, inspired through its physical organ was by such an ignoble Helicon as flows in Bourbon County, would have stirred any appreciative audience to much profounder depths than the most brilliant flashes of Derrick's cynical wit and wisdom. Derrick was too acute a judge of intellectual capability not to discern this, though at first it took his pride by surprise to find this poor weak nature his possible rival in any thing. And Cuthbert's latent power became even yet more unmistakable when his own wife's eyes filled with tears of admiration, and her cheeks paid homage to the beauty of his speech by flushing like a girl's as she sat sighing with her eyes riveted on him. So intent were both speaker and hearer that they did not notice the expression which came into Derrick's face. The fitfully dancing fire-light would have forbidden any man who knew that Derrick was Cuthbert's friend to pronounce on that expression unreservedly; but a stranger seeing it might have been pardoned for supposing him Cuthbert's bitterest enemy; and when the schoolmaster paused, half startled at his own boldness, Derrick cried out, with enthusiasm:

"Bravo, Kearney! I'm glad you and I are not a pair of gay young bachelors—rival suitors for Mrs. Kearney's hand! I'm afraid if you talked in that way you'd make your wife fall in love with you."

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

HOW many pretty spring suits were spoiled on a certain day last week we would not venture to estimate! Spring suits, did we say? We meant summer ones; but, in truth, we are constantly forgetting that it is really summer. To be sure, before this paragraph is in print, the "heated term" may burst upon us; but at present it rains every alternate day in a very April-like manner; the strawberries are sour, and though it is the fashion in June to talk of "going into the country," there really is no occasion to leave the city, so far as the weather is concerned. But a change will come, so that doubtless we shall be forced to recommend Long Branch, Saratoga, Newport, Lake Mahopac, the White Mountains, or some other quiet (!) country place, wherein to get a breath of fresh air. So let us be content with the present.

But about the above-mentioned ruined walking suits—the dry-goods merchants reaped a harvest thereby. The day referred to was a—well, really, it is quite impossible to say exactly what kind of a day it was. In the early morning it was densely foggy; then it rained in a dull, heavy way; then it brightened up, and business-men started down town, hopefully leaving their umbrellas behind them; then thick, black storm-clouds gathered in the west and overspread the sky, and at mid-day it poured in impetuous torrents, mingled rain and hail, with thunder and lightning. Afterward the elements seemed relieved, a trifle of blue sky appeared, the sun gleamed out, and, though the clouds bore a treacherous aspect, multitudes were deceived, and were lured out into the streets. Suddenly the storm burst forth, and torrents fell. At this crisis, seated comfortably in a car, which we were resolved not to leave in a hurry—though, by remarkable foresight, armed with umbrella and water-proof—we were the innocent spectator of many a comedy, as well as tragedy. Improvident damsels, unprotected by even a minute parasol, were deluged by the floods, and rushed dripping into the cars, with a most forlorn aspect. Pretty little lace bonnets, bright flowers and ribbons, silk paletots and skirts, shared a miserable fate with plainer materials. Happy they who wore only a plain black suit. However, the ladies were exceedingly sensible, and bore their misfortunes with the greatest good-humor. In an hour the sun was shining, and finally disappeared in the west, amidst glorious golden clouds. The next day was faultless, and every body was out, including, of course, all those who were obliged to purchase a new suit of clothes! We understand, on good authority, that there has scarcely been such a "run" on Stewart's establishment during the season as occurred on that bright day.

West Point has been the centre of interest for many from the commencement of June, and will continue to be so to a considerable extent through the season. The June examinations are very important to the cadet, for then the estimates of his progress for the year are made up, and it is decided whether or not he is prepared to remain the balance of his term. The newly-appointed "Plebes" are now undergoing their drilling by the cadets, in squads of four or five. Although, of course, exceedingly awkward as compared with the thoroughly-drilled cadets, they are said to be unusually intelligent and manly, and to exhibit the right qualities for soldiers. West Point has been crowded with visitors; and independent of the cadets, who receive their full share of attention, it is a delightful place in which to while away the summer hours.

The Revolution states that there is a Nautical School in Madison Street in this city, conducted by two ladies, who, during the late war, prepared for the navy two thousand mates and captains of the merchant service, whose knowledge of navigation was inexact, and who took two or three months' instruction at the nautical school, by way of preparation for the strict examination required by the Naval Board. This school has been in operation about sixteen years, and young seamen, who have wished to qualify themselves as mates and captains, have attended, when their respective vessels have happened to be in port. The school was originally founded by Captain William Thoms, author of the "Practical Navigator" and "Thoms's Tables." He was assisted by his wife and daughter. After his death his son-in-law took charge of the school; but for some years past the two ladies, who have studied navigation both theoretically and practically, have conducted it.

The Evening Mail, in a very sensible paragraph against ladies accepting expensive presents from gentlemen who are merely ordinary acquaintances, speaks of a lady who received a very beautiful set of jewelry, by express, from a "friend," not many weeks ago. She returned it to the express company, saying that as a receipt must have been given for so valuable a parcel, the company must know the name of the sender. She requested that it be returned accordingly. Receiving expensive gifts is open to many objections, and often places a lady in a very embarrassing position. Flowers may, in general, be accepted freely—they are a pleasant tribute to offer to a lady friend, and will not be likely to annoy her. But if she does not want them they will speedily take care of themselves, without giving her the trouble to return them by express or otherwise.

The trade in West India fruits has been unusually brisk this season. Bananas have been abundant, and they will be more or less in the market for a couple of months longer. They are brought mostly from Baracoa, and the "season" commences about the first of April. They are packed in bins, and sold at wholesale by the bin. It is said that bananas should never be ripened in the sun, as is a very common practice, but always in the shade and by simple atmospheric processes. The sunshine burns or injures the quality of the fruit, besides rendering it liable to rot during the process of ripening. Cocoa-nuts are brought in vessels with bananas, being packed under the bins. They are shipped either with the husks on or off, at pleasure. When husked they bring about fifteen dollars per thousand more than when not husked.

The crop of pine-apples is said to be unusually fine this year. This fruit is sold at the wharf by the hundred, in assorted or in unsorted lots. The city retail trade is mostly supplied at Washington Market, where the principal part of the manipulation of the fruit is done.

Borax is used in many large washing establishments as a washing-powder, instead of soda. It does not in the slightest degree injure the texture of the linen. Its effect is to soften the hardest water, and therefore is a pleasant and useful addition to water for bathing. It is also recommended as excellent for cleansing the hair and the teeth.

The skin of the crocodile is being put to a novel use, according to report. In Paris ladies' boots are made of it, and its merits are said to be extreme flexibility and readiness to take the most admirable polish. The fashion will not be likely to be extensively adopted here.

A "new thing" in ear-rings is also announced from Paris in the shape of a pair of enormous, hairy, spotted spiders, with a fly caught in their feelers. How lovely!

A gentleman traveling in Rome writes: "We hear every language spoken; and I do not now know whether what I talk is Italian or French."

I am inclined to think it is a combination, with a little English thrown in at the hard places; also, now and then, a remarkably expressive gesture. I am not sure but that if Americans travel as much on the Continent in years to come as now, we may not soon have the basis laid for that universal language which some philosophers have sought to contrive. There are two recipes for ready-made Italian, which are very popular among travelers, and seem largely to supersede the laborious study of grammars and conversation books. One is for the speaker to take the French word for what he wants, and add an 'o' or an 'e' to it according as euphony seems to require. The other method is to take the Latin word and put it in the ablative absolute. People who have any thing to sell or to let are quite able to understand these forms of Italian."

In Venezuela, according to a recent statement, when a young man asks for the hand of a young girl, the father gives the supplicant a very hard stone to pierce. It usually takes about three years to pierce the stone, and then father grants the young man's request, and hands over his daughter.

An inventive genius of Paddington, England, proposes to introduce, under the name of "Steam Bird," a "flying steam-engine," fitted with wings, flapped by the action of steam. He will use liquid fuel, and carry very little water, condensing the steam by a very light condenser, made like the tail of a bird, to sustain the bird and steady its flight. The arms of the wings are connected with the piston-rod of the engine, so that the apparatus is raised by the strokes of the wings alone, without light-gas, heated air, or other contrivance to give it buoyancy. To this engine he attaches seats for one or more passengers.

The Russian Senate, with the sanction of the Emperor, has just published a decree prohibiting the importation, manufacture, or sale of paper-hangings, stuffs, dresses, sweetmeats, toys, etc., colored or dyed with poisonous substances.

Not long ago the inhabitants of Toulouse were surprised by observing the ground covered with a yellow dust. This phenomenon, which is sometimes called a shower of sulphur, is produced by a current of air passing over extensive pine forests or masses of flowers and carrying with it the pollen produced, which is afterward brought down by rain. Sometimes the color of the deposit is red, arising from minute particles brought by the wind from the desert or volcanic ashes, and then it takes the name of a shower of blood.

The consumption of gingerbread in Paris is estimated at 2,000,000 pounds annually, and the quantity of pastry is almost fabulous. Recently a "fair," given by vendors of gingerbread and miscellaneous cakes, was held at the "Place du Trône" and on the adjacent boulevards. The scene would have conveyed an animated idea to the stranger of the manners and amusements of the lower classes of the country. On all sides were long lines of booths filled with various sorts of gingerbread and pastry, well known to the youthful portion of the population, and sold at the minimum price of one sou a piece.

False hair has been so universally worn—at least in Paris—that when a woman has luxuriant tresses of her own she gets no credit for them. A story is told of a beautiful English lady, who was invited to Compeigne, and whose abundant hair becoming the subject of discussion at an imperial supper party, no one would believe it real till she loosened it before the company, when it fell almost to her feet.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

G.—The fact that your material is two yards wide will not interfere with goring the skirt. You can lay two breadths of your gored pattern on one width of the goods. Gore only the front breadths and two side breadths. Make the gored skirt proper to reach only to the knee, then add a wide flounce with the robe pattern as a border for trimming. Make a narrow hem at the top of the flounce, and form a narrow ruffled heading by gathering on a cord.

BRUNETTE.—The Metternich green is claimed by both brunettes and blondes. The princess for whom it is named, and who brought it into fashion, has brown eyes, a rosy complexion, and light chestnut hair. If the wearer has a clear complexion it is immaterial whether she be dark or fair. This color, however, should only be worn in conjunction with white or black, as it does not mingle well with a contrasting color. The same clear complexion is requisite in order to make lavender and mauve becoming. Amber and the pale buff, now so fashionable, is especially suited to brunettes. Mexico blue is a clear shade similar to the Marie Louise blue.

Mrs. A. H. E. CALLENDER.—We can not hear of any such machine as you mention.

X. Y. Z.—The right arm ought to be given to the lady when taking her to dinner or in the ball-room. The left is, however, considered the proper arm to give in the street, so that the right may be left free for defense.

LOUISE.—A trained skirt two yards and a half wide around the bottom. The flounce may be either ten inches or half a yard, according to your own fancy. The skirt must be sloped from the flounce upward or it will be too full at the waist. Leave the two back widths of the silk skirt full. Make but few pleats at the back. There must be some fullness, but should not be a great deal.

AUGUSTA.—It is decidedly improper to keep up your acquaintance with Mr. P. (whom you met accidentally at a party), without a regular introduction of the gentleman to your parents.

CLARA W.—We do not know exactly what capes you allude to. Wrappings of the same material as the walking dress are invariably worn here. It is positively a rare thing to see the mantle and dress of different material. Fancy capes, polonaises, and fichus of various styles, are frequently illustrated in Harper's Bazar—from which we hope you will be able to make a selection.

A COUNTRY READER.—Crimoline straw is a name given lately to the old-fashioned Neapolitan straw.

HELEN.—Large ponce parasols, white and pale buff, are considered appropriate with street suits of any color. Care should be taken that the bright color of the lining is of a shade becoming to the complexion. Rose color is suitable for brunettes; blue and green for blondes.

E. H. WILSON.—We regret that we can give you no other pattern than the illustration of the article to which you refer, which, moreover, is accompanied by a verbal description. Thanks for your kind appreciation of our efforts.

J. BROWN.—Any kind of canes can be used for the newspaper stand, whether white or colored, as they are afterward varnished. They should be as stiff as possible, and can be obtained at any "notion" store.

The stand is intended to hold papers as a bag. K.—The proper value of a wedding gift, or of any other, consists in the sentiment and not in the cost. We can not imagine that your friend would be likely to prize any thing more than your miniature. The ceremonious mode of presentation is to send the gift to the bride's house just before the marriage.

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly-invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by News-dealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

IF A HUMBUB,

What a wonder
That the doers
Are open wide—
Ever since the First of August
Thousands have Pain Paint applied.
Those who lie,
Or call it humbug,
Are the doctors,
Not acquaint—
For they always Have been jealous
When their patients
Use Pain Paint.
Pile up facts
As high as mountains,
Flash the truth
Before their eyes;
But the cry
Is always humbug;
Men of science
Full of lies.

Pain Paint has been tested free of cost over six months every day (except Sundays), at No. 170 Chatham Square, New York, for the removal and cure of all manner of pain and disease. The office is constantly crowded with patients, rain or shine, and yet fools are found who are silly enough to lie and call it humbug. Yet every person who buys Pain Paint, or tries it free of cost, knows that all who call it humbug tell a falsehood. All such lies, like chickens, come home to roost. Their own reputation is "besmeared" by their well-known opposition to Wolcott's Pain Paint.

THE GREAT NEW ENGLAND REMEDY.

DR. J. W. POLAND'S

WHITE PINE COMPOUND

Is now offered to the afflicted throughout the country, after having been proved by the test of twelve years in the New England States, where its merits have become as well known as the tree from which, in part, it derives its virtues.

CURES

Sore Throat, Colds, Coughs, Diphtheria, Bronchitis, Spitting of Blood, and Pulmonary Affections generally. It is a remarkable Remedy for Kidney Complaints.

This medicine is free from any thing deleterious, pleasant to the taste, safe, yet sure and effective in its action.

Boston, January 20, 1866.

POLAND'S WHITE PINE COMPOUND.—After having given it a thorough trial, we can confidently recommend Poland's White Pine Compound as a very valuable article for the cure of colds, coughs, and pulmonary complaints generally. In several cases we have known it to give prompt relief when all other remedies which had been tried had failed. It is an article which, in a climate so promotive of sudden and severe colds as is that of New England, ought to be in every family; and we are sure that those who once obtain it and give it a fair trial will not thereafter be willing to be without it.

A VALUABLE MEDICINE.—Dr. Poland's White Pine Compound, advertised in our columns, is a successful attempt to combine and apply the medicinal virtues of the White Pine bark. It has been thoroughly tested by people in this city and vicinity, and the proprietor has testimonials to its value from persons well known to our citizens. We recommend its trial in all those cases of disease to which it is adapted. It is for sale by all our druggists.—Independent.

The White Pine Compound is now sold in every part of the United States and British Provinces.

The BAZAR, as an intelligent critic upon all feminine

FACETIÆ.

A GENTLEMAN traveling in Southern Pennsylvania reports a good story which he heard about a worthy mechanic who aspired to legislative honors. In his printed appeal to the voters he said, with more significance than he intended, "that if they declined to elect him he should remain at home a cooper and an honest man!"

WISDOM IN SMALL LOTS.

Be keeful that you allus git your muma before you give a reecet; and allus git a reecet before you give your muma.

Ef you air onla a quarter of a second in late you won't git thar in time.

We've got lots of men with toweren intellex and brillient genies and all that, but then, you see, we need just a few men of good common-sense like.

There may be some sweet sadness in chewing the bitter end of adversity; but the most uv 'em in this section would rather have terbacker, you know.

Ef wise men never made mistakes this wood be a hard world for fools—of whom a great many are which.

It's no use to be miserable to-da because you're afraid you can't be happy to-morrow.

It required all kinds uv men to make up the world, and so, you see, thar had to be some egotistlike durn fools for hotel clerks.

It don't take as much sense to pick a lock or forge a check as it do to not do it.

When it rains pudden you hold up your dish; but don't spend your time watchen for a shower.

It don't take a smart man to be a fool.

You can't do business without sense, any more than u ken start a kooper shop on top of a bung-hole.

A man that don't know enny thing will tell it the first time he gets a chance.

Ef I enjoy enny thing more than the prosperity of a good mau it iz the punishment of a scoundrel.

A San Francisco Chinaman blew out the gas-light in his bedchamber, and was rescued nearly suffocated. His first words on recovering were, "Me no stealce gas!"

THINGS WE SHOULD MUCH LIKE TO SEE.

A fruit tree that keeps away pilferers by its own bark. Gas that would go out at night and come in again in the morning. A sauce-pan that will boil over with rage when the cook is insulted. A clock that is so conceited as not to run down its own works. The coat of a poor man's stomach (to see if it is out at the elbows).

"Genius will work its way through," as the poet said, when he saw a hole in the elbow of his coat.

The following "warning" is posted on a man's grounds a few miles back of Hoboken: "Take notice, that whosoever is found trespassing on these grounds will be shot and prosecuted."

The other evening one gentleman pointed out a dandified-looking individual to his friend as a sculptor. "What!" said his friend, "such a looking chap as that a sculptor? Surely, you must be mistaken." "He may not be the kind of one you mean," said the informant, "but I know that he 'chiseled' a tailor out of a suit of clothes last week."

"THE VOICES OF THE NIGHT"—Those blessed babies.

"Mr. Jones," said Mrs. J., with an air of triumph, "don't you think marriage is a means of grace?" "Well, yes," growled Jones, "I suppose any thing is a means of grace that breaks down pride and leads to repentance."

A New London physician was recently asked one starlight evening if he knew Ursula Minor, and replied, with but brief hesitation: "Oh yes! there is a family of Minors in Hartford, and I guess it's one of them."

HOW TO CURE A "GIRL OF THE PERIOD"—Put a full stop to her.

LAST NEW THING IN SKIRTS.

AUNT (slightly shocked). "Why, Child, all your clothes are Falling Off!" LAURA. "Oh, dear, no, Aunt; it's the Fashion!"

ALARMING!

GEORGE (late Comic Bachelor). "What do you think the Man wanted, my Dear? (A visitor had called during breakfast.) He came to Take my Life!"

AFFECTIONATE WIFE (rushing at him). "George!"

Married life often begins with rosewood and mahogany and ends with pine.

AN OBJECT OF INTEREST—Seven-Thirties.

A Caledonia paper, in an obituary of a young lady who died lately, closed by saying: "She had an amiable temper, and was uncommonly fond of ice-cream and other delicacies."

A SUIT THAT RARELY FITS WELL—A law-suit.

A steward wrote to a bookseller in London for some books to fit up his master's library in the following terms: "In the first place I want six feet of theology, the same quantity of metaphysics, and near a yard of old civil law in folio."

FAVORITE AIMS OF MAMMAS WITH MARRIAGEABLE DAUGHTERS—Millionairs.

"Mother," said a lad, "is it wrong to break eggshells?"

"Certainly not, my dear," replied the mother; "but what do you ask such a silly question for?"

"Because I have just dropped the basket with all the eggs in it," replied he.

A little girl, on hearing her mother say that she intended to go to a ball, and have her dress trimmed with bugles, innocently inquired if the bugles would blow up while she danced. "Oh no," said the mother, "your father will do that when he discovers I have bought them."

THE SPIRIT AND THE FLESH.—The following story was told by Dr. William Arnot, at a soirée in Sir H. W. Moncrieff's church in Edinburgh the other evening: "Dr. Macleod and Dr. Watson were in the West Highlands together on a tour, ere leaving for India. While crossing a loch in a boat, in company with a number of passengers, a storm came on. One of the passengers was heard to say, 'The two ministers should begin to pray, or we'll a' be drowned.' 'Na, na,' said the boatman, 'the little ane can pray if he likes, but the big ane maun tak' an oar.'"

"An Unloved Wife," who ought to know of that of which she speaks, because she has so much experience, says that the reason that ladies look so much to money, in the matter of marriage, is, that nowadays they so seldom find any thing else in a man worth having.

A French country curé has found a new argument to show the existence of Providence. He lately said to his parishioners, who are largely engaged in raising early vegetables: "Perhaps you have sometimes asked yourselves why God did not give to asparagus two succulent ends instead of one. And yet, if it had been so, the eater would have had nothing to take hold of in lifting it to his mouth!"

A MODEL BOOT-BLACK—The sun that shines for all.

THE RACES.

How do the horses come round at The Corner?

When eyes are all straining

To see which is gaining,

And far-distant humming

Grows louder and clearer—Grows stronger and nearer.

"They're off!" "They are coming!"

"Who leads?" "Black and red!" "No! Green by a head!"

"The Earl!" "No, the Lady!" "Typhoons looks shady!"

"Orion! Orion—To live or to die on!"

"Twenty pounds to a crown—On the little Blue Gown!"

"I'll venture my whole in. That colt by Tom Bowline!"

"Paul Jones!" "Rosicrucian!"

"Green Sleeve!" "Restitution!"

"Le Sarrazin!" "Pace!"

"It's Mercury's race!"

Then on they come lashing, and slashing, and dashing,

Their colors all flashing like lightning—gleams gashing

The darkness, where, clashing, the thunder is crashing!

With whipping and thrashing,

With crowding and smashing,

With pressing and stirring,

With lifting and spurring,

With pulling and striving,

With pushing and driving,

With kicking and sporting,

With neighing and snorting,

With frieking and whisking,

With racing and chasing,

With straining and gaining,

With longing and thronging,

With plunging and lunging,

With fretting and sweating,

With bustling and hustling, and justling,

With surging, and urging, and scourging,

With rushing, and brushing, and crushing,

With scattering, and pattering, and clattering,

With hurrying, and scurrying, and flurrying, and worrying,

With sliding, and gliding, and riding, and striding,

With crying, and flying, and shying, and plying,

With tying, and vying, and trying, and hieing!

Till rapidly spinning,

The ranks quickly thinning,

The crowd is beginning

To see which is winning:

Some faces grow brighter—and some grow forlorn:

And that's how the horses come round at The Corner!

PHILOSOPHY OF FAINTING.

THERE is fainting and fainting, the real and the counterfeit. Many dames either affect the one or are affected by the other. The apparent symptoms of both are similar; but in the genuine the patient suffers herself, while in the false she causes others to suffer. This latter form of the malady is familiar to most tender husbands of the henpecked order, whose wives are liable to a severe attack on the least indication of a tightening of the purse-strings, between which and the female constitution there seems to be a strong sympathy. The smallest constriction of the former is accompanied by a corresponding derangement of the latter, and a closed purse and a restrained expenditure are followed immediately by a stricture of the chest, a diminished circulation of the blood, and other symptoms of a well-got-up fainting-fit.

A remarkable case, successfully treated, may be found recorded in the Tatler. A fine lady was married to a gentleman who had connubial tenderness to a weakness. She determined to profit by it, and therefore took upon herself to govern her husband by falling into fainting-fits whenever she was refused any thing or contradicted. She made her first trial at dinner. While eating the fish she made signs that she had swallowed a bone. The man grew pale as ashes, and ran to her assistance, calling for water. "No, my dear," said she, recovering; "it is down, don't be frightened." This was sufficient proof of her husband's softness, and she now went confidently to work. On the next day she complained that her neighbor's chariot was more stylish than her own. Her husband answered: "Madam, you know my income; you know I have lost two coach-horses this spring—" Down she fell. "Hartshorn! Betsy! Susan! Alice! throw water in her face." With much care she was at last brought to herself, and a new carriage immediately bought by her husband to prevent relapses of the fainting-fits. These, however, continued to occur until her husband had the good fortune to escape further suffering by death.

The widow married again, and tried the fainting-fits upon her second husband. He, however, proved to be of sterner stuff than his predecessor. One day it happened that a discourse arose about furniture. He was glad of the occasion, and stoutly declared that he would never lay out more of his money for any fashionable gewgaws. His wife immediately fainted. He chafes her face, bends her forward, and beats the palms of her hands. Her convulsions increase, and down she tumbles on the floor, where she lies quite dead, in spite of what the whole family, from the nursery to the kitchen, could do for her relief.

While every servant was thus helping or lamenting their mistress, the husband, fixing his cheek to hers, secretly whispered to her, "My dear, this will never do; what is within my power and fortune you may always command; but none of your artifices. You are quite in other hands now than those of your former husband." This almost put her in the condition she pretended, and the fainting-fits came thicker. The kind man redoubles his care, helps the servants to throw water in her face by full quarts, and when the sinking was at the worst, said, "Well, my dear, I must take my leave of you till you are more sincere with me. Farewell forever." With that he ordered the maids to keep plying the hartshorn, and went away. He had hardly got to the head of the stairs when his wife came after him, and pulling him aside, thanked him for her cure.

The genuine fainting-fit is a more serious affair, and would not be readily assumed by any woman, not even for a cashmere shawl or a new chariot and pair.

Fainting, or syncope, as the doctors technically term it, has for its immediate cause a sudden diminution of the action of the heart. Hence the familiar symptoms of a death-like paleness and coldness of the whole surface of the body, ringing of the ears, sickness of the stomach, confusion of thought, loss of voluntary power, and finally complete prostration and insensibility. The exciting causes of fainting are, as is well known, very numerous. Excessive pain, a sudden loss of blood, or any discharge from the body which may produce instantaneous weakness, great fatigue, intense heat, prolonged excitement, and almost any depressing emotion of the mind, as fear, disappointment, grief, and the rest, will bring on a fainting-fit. The manner of action of these various exciting causes may be different, but they all finally result in producing the same depressing effect upon the heart.

All persons are by no means equally liable to faint. While there are many who pass their whole lives without any personal experience, there are others with whom it is almost a daily occurrence. Original constitution may have something to do with this difference, and there is no doubt that a very delicate nervous sensibility predisposes to fits of fainting. Thus it is that women are more liable than men, not only to the false but the genuine. Making all due allowance for natural predisposition, there can be no doubt that most of the feminine fainting is to be attributed to artificial causes. The excessive sensibility to impressions, or nervousness, as it is commonly called, so favorable to a fit of syncope, is due, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, to a disobedience of the laws of health. It is not surprising that our dames of waxen structure thus subside in a daily faint; but it is remarkable that, unsubstantial as they are, they should survive to undergo a repetition of the vanishing process.

So familiar, unfortunately, is the ordinary fainting-fit that most "well-regulated families" are provided with all the means and appliances for its proper treatment. There is, however, one remedy, the most essential of all, which generally escapes the vulgar experience. The smelling-salts, the hartshorn, the dash of water, the sal volatile, and the glass of wine are all very well in their place; but these are far less important than the simple process of letting the patient take the position she naturally assumes, of lying upon her back, with her head somewhat lower than her chest. The fit has for its cause a weakness of the heart, and the gravest symptoms arise from the fact that the brain is in consequence deprived of its necessary supply of blood. To aid the diminished force of the circulation, it is necessary to give it the benefit of gravitation, which is done by letting the head fall below the chest, so that the current, flowing from the heart in the latter, may be running down hill in its course to the brain in the former.

Many deaths have been produced from a neglect of this simple precaution of placing those who have fainted in a lying position. Most people seem to think that they must always do the reverse of what Nature indicates; and when a person naturally falls in a fit, these busy-bodies set to work at once in raising him to his legs and keeping him there. Let him lie is a precept that can not be too often repeated. The practice, so common when a woman is attacked in church with fainting, of walking her out between two able-bodied male supporters, of unbounded benevolence and equal ignorance, down a long aisle, is exceedingly dangerous. If carried out at all, the patient should be borne away horizontally, with her head inclined backward.

In the excessive debility of convalescence after a severe attack of illness, death is often produced by allowing the patient to rise suddenly in his bed, or to attempt to get out of it. The heart, partaking of the weakness of the rest of the body, has only strength enough to drive the blood to the brain when it has the aid, in a lying posture, of gravitation. Deprived of this suddenly by the upright posture of the body, it fails to send its blood to the head, and an endless fainting-fit, or death, is the fatal result.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

SATURDAY, JULY 11, 1868.

We are happy to announce that we shall shortly begin in HARPER'S BAZAR the publication of "THE SACRISTAN'S HOUSEHOLD," a new Love Story, richly Illustrated, by the Author of "Mabel's Progress," "Aunt Margaret's Troubles," etc., which can not fail to interest and delight the reader.

SUMMER FRUITS.

THE chemists tell us that the main purpose of eating is to keep the body warm. They say that the consumption of food necessary for this amounts to four times as much as for all other objects of the human economy combined. Since the animal heat must be kept up to the same point at all seasons, it is obvious that more of the diet essential to its production is required in winter than in summer, for the cold of the former is constantly tending to reduce the temperature of the body, while the effect of the latter is the reverse.

The heat-producing articles of food are termed carboniferous, because they contain carbon, or charcoal, in large proportions. They form much the greatest part of human diet. The fat of meats, the sugar, the starch, and oil of vegetables, which are the main constituents of all we eat, belong to them. These are, and should be, eaten in all seasons, for the human furnace must be kept constantly supplied with fuel, and its heat never be allowed to fall below 98°, a temperature essential for the due operation of the vital processes. Requiring, however, a much larger quantity of carboniferous or fatty food in winter, we take it in a concentrated form, and thus feed largely upon pork, butter, and other oleaginous articles. In summer, wanting less to keep up the same degree of heat, we take our carbon in a more diluted shape, as we find it in vegetables and fruit, which we consume largely.

The chief advantage of vegetable food may be that it furnishes us with a convenient means of graduating the supply of carbon to the diminished demand of the human body for it in warm seasons and climates. It has, however, other qualities which make it indispensable as an article of diet. Those long deprived of vegetable food suffer from scurvy, which was the most fatal and common of diseases, until Captain Cook, the great navigator, discovered the cause and applied the remedy in the form of lemon-juice. Medical chemists attribute this action of vegetables and fruits to the acids which they all contain. These acids are not supposed to supply the body with any substance essential to its support, but to act by expelling from it what is injurious. They are considered to be rather medicine than food. There are certain substances called alkalies which are deposited in the human system, and which, if allowed to remain, will disorder its functions. These the acids of vegetables and fruit are supposed to take up and carry away with them in their easy exit from the body.

The remedial effects of the grape are so highly esteemed in those countries where it is produced, that it is customary for persons afflicted with various disorders to resort to the vineyards during the time of the vintage for the purpose of physicking themselves with this fruit. For two or three weeks the patient submits to what is called a cours de raisin, a course of grapes, gorging himself with them, and in the mean time eating nothing else. The grape-cure has a high reputation in the countries where it is used; but it is probable that, like all popular remedies, it gets more credit than it deserves.

Fruits, however, of all kinds, when eaten moderately, are of unquestionable benefit to the health, and should be made a part of the daily food not only during the seasons of their ripeness but in all other, which is possible with the mode of preservation now practiced. Those preserved fruits are the best which retain the most of their original character.

There is an old Spanish proverb which says: "Fruit is gold in the morning, silver at noon, and lead at night." In all tropical countries, where the fruits form so large a portion of the daily food, it is customary to eat them during the early part of the day. This practice would seem to confirm the teaching of the proverb. There is little doubt that the common habit of gorging ourselves with fruit at dessert, when we are already replete with a superabundant dinner, is a bad one. This but adds a crowning ill to the evils of satiety.

PROPER EXERCISE.

SUCH is the intimate relation between the body and mind that it is impossible to do any good to either unless the actions of both are kept in harmony. This truth is well demonstrated by the utter uselessness of all physical exercise for health's sake, unless accompanied by a wholesome mental activity. Let any one, while depressed in mind, test his muscular power, and he will soon find how little able and disposed he is to use it. On the other hand, if he exerts his physical strength when under the animating influence of pleasurable emotions, he is scarcely conscious of the effort. If physical exercise is persisted in with the indisposition and incapacity for it that come from mental depression, the result is an excessive prostration which is of course injurious to the health of the body. On the contrary, the exertion of the muscular force, stimulated and supported by a cheerful mind, can be continued almost indefinitely, with the good effect of giving increased vigor to the whole human system.

All plans of exercise should be based upon a regard to the harmonious action of mind and body. The solitary "constitutional" walk, as it is called, taken for health's sake, is of no benefit, for it can be seldom varied, and does not supply diversion to the mind, which continues to fret itself and weary the body. Horseback exercise is much superior, for the reason that in the management of the beast there is necessarily a constant call upon the attention which keeps the mental faculties occupied, and thus relieves them of all depressing and exhausting influences.

Those sports requiring physical effort and the open air are excellent for health, as they occupy the mind pleasantly at the same time that they exercise the body. It is surprising how much work can be got out of the muscles when stimulated to action by agreeable emotion. A child will run, and climb, and tumble, and shout, and indulge in boisterous effort of all kinds the whole day, apparently without any fatigue, while engaged in play with his fellows; but let him take the shortest and most composed walk with an elder, and he will hardly step a dozen paces before he begins to lag back in weariness.

The great point to be considered in any plans of exercise for health's sake, is the intimate alliance between body and mind, and the necessity of providing simultaneously for the occupation of both. It matters little how the muscles are put into action; but that form of physical exercise is the best which is accompanied by the most agreeable mental emotions. Pleasant company will give a refreshing and wholesome effect to a long walk, which if taken alone would only weary and weaken.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

A Letter to a Bride.

MY DEAR LAURA,—I received your delightful letter from Melon's charming house up the river, and I have been thinking a great deal of your kind confidence. Indeed when, after reading it, I walked out into Madison Square, and betook myself to pleasing meditation, I must have beamed in the most extraordinary manner, for when I came upon Mr. Peter Paul Pry, he exclaimed, in amazement:

"Bless my soul, Bachelor, what has happened to you? You are not going to be married, eh?"

And we both burst into such a merry laugh that I saw all the nursery-maids near us looking at us in alarm and rapidly hastening away, evidently under the conviction that we were two elderly lunatics of an inoffensive turn.

"No," said I. "No, my dear Pry, not exactly married; but what would you say if the lovely Laura whom I saw married last week had written to me in the very midst of her blissful honey-moon to remind me that I had forgotten to send her the letter of advice I promised? Wouldn't that make you beam?"

"Possibly it might make me; but I don't believe it would amuse the lovely Laura's husband," replied Peter Paul Pry.

"Nonsense," answered I. "Louis and I are as old friends as Laura and I; and I have given him a good many hints also."

"Very well," continued Peter Paul, soberly; "all I know is, that if I were just married and buried in bliss at Melon's place in perfect June weather, and Mrs. P. should write letters to ancient single gentlemen, asking their advice about married life, I should think a good deal of honey had dropped out of my moon."

Pry seemed to be in such sober earnest that I could only laugh again, and after a moment he joined. The idea of his being just married struck him as it did me, and our uproarious fun caused still further consternation among the nursery-maids.

Then, my dear Laura, I told him that I was, as it were, a parent to you, and that your long habit—having no parent of your own—of consulting me upon every occasion, had caused you to write the letter now. And whether any body else understand or not, you and I do; and that is quite enough. It is delightful to think of you among those June roses, walking and driving in the pretty roads, and looking out upon the soft distances of the placid summer river. I imagine you and Louis sitting upon that secluded little seat under the Pines, which commands so exquisite a view, and watching the shining white sails as they move gradually away, away, until they seem to glimmer and fade in the warm haze, and vaguely fancying, as you look, that you are beholding the image of your own lives as they glide calmly off and away, and disappear under the soft veil of the future.

Now, my Princess, I should say if I were with you, this seems to you your happy island, and so it is. Let me be your Mentor; for even on the happy island—even basking in the tender radiance of somebody's eyes—Mentor is a useful friend. Yet he would not speak, he would have no right to speak, if he did not feel his heart beat with your joy. Why is it, I wonder, that there is a sort of half-pitying tone in the warm congratulations with which the older married people greet the newly-married? I observed it, my good Laura, last week at your own joyous nuptials. When Mr. and Mrs. Zoroaster stepped up and shook hands and wished you joy, and old Zoroaster said, with a brisk air of originality, "Happy the bride the sun shines on!" and then passed on to inspect the bridal gifts, he had a kind of "poor young people" air about him which was quite touching. And do you know what that solemn old beau, Prig, said to Mrs. Zoroaster? "Madame," he said, with the profoundest gravity, "Madame, I am very glad that the bride shows. It is always so much pleasanter when the bride shows." I suppose he was afraid you might hurry home from church and run off upon your tour, as some brides do, without being seen.

I am very glad, dear Laura, that you did not follow that odious custom. Don't let us have any needless affectations. If you make an event of the wedding, don't be afraid of the details. If you wish to be married in church and mean to take a steamer or a boat immediately afterward, do it; but wear a neat traveling-habit. If you want to wear the evening-dress of a bride, do it; but leave time enough to see your friends at home afterward. Don't scurry back to the house as my sister Smith did, and I always laughed at her for it, and change your dress and escape surreptitiously into a carriage and drive off, without letting any body see you. Why should you? Are you ashamed of being married, or of being seen because you are married? If you must have absolute privacy, very well. Go to a Justice of the Peace and be happy.

Here I am, as usual, spattering about. But I must add one thing more. Haven't we had enough of the exhibition of bridal presents? For an old bachelor it is perhaps rather a delicate subject; for, as he can never expect to receive any, he may be supposed anxious to put a stop to the giving. I protest that I have no such feeling. To all my dear friends upon the eve of matrimony I have for many years given a silver tea-strainer. It is a modest offering, but it is given with as much sincere good feeling as if it were a silver dinner service. "A dinner of herbs and content therewith," I leave the stalled ox to Tilbury, and I am rejoiced that he is able to distribute so many specimens of that animal. But why make the wedding-feast a cattle-show? Pardon me! I mean, why put the tea-strainers and the oxen upon exhibition? Indeed, my dear Laura, when I stood in your uncle's house, and saw the crowd pressing into the room where the presents were, and remarked Mrs. Zoroaster and old Miss Behemoth going about with their eye-glasses, studying the pretty things that kind friends had sent, I knew their emotions as if I had been taken into their most secret confidence. They were "pricing" my tea-strainer and Tilbury's ox. They were saying that it was rather mean for Mr. Bachelor to give such a paltry gift to a dear friend, and wondering if Tilbury could have paid five hundred dollars for his offering. And they had such a greedy look in their eyes!

Of course you see what a senseless rivalry it leads to. Family ambition is aroused. Feeling of every kind is enlisted. If Julia has a splendid array of gifts, Jemima is notified if hers are less splendid; and Jemima's mother and sisters, and possibly that wise man, her father, and that equal sage, her brother Reginald, harbor the most uncomfortable emotions. Then there are a great many of our nervous friends, like the Belisariuses, who think that they ought to give gifts because others do, and it is a serious tax upon the slender Belisarius purse. Besides, what is in its nature so truly private as a wedding gift? It is a token of affection—and its real worth and beauty can not be seen by Mrs. Zoroaster's greedy eye-glasses, however solid and shining the mere external substance which they behold. I am probably a very antiquated and impracticable old curmudgeon, but I can not help thinking that there is something a little vulgar in this exhibition. And when it comes—as it has come now, and as is constantly done—to mentioning upon a card the presents which have been delayed I make a stand, and I insist that a much more convenient method would be to write out a list of all the gifts, have it printed upon bridal white satin, and distributed to each of the guests.

Besides, my dear Laura, if it be tolerable that the bridal gifts should be exhibited, why not the trousseau? Why do we not pass in review the apparel of the bride, and study her skirts, her dresses, her linen? They are all part of her outfit. They are often very costly and very beautiful. No, I affirm that for my part I am satisfied if, in the felicitous language of Prig, the bride shows. I do not wish to see how ostentatious Tilbury has been, nor what wretched taste the Stanhopes have, nor to contemplate the pair of salt-spoons with which Peter Paul Pry flanks my silver tea-strainer. Those are impertinent to the occasion. Here is the sweet bride—say, for instance, a certain Laura who shall be nameless—she is all silk or muslin, or lace and orange flowers. It is her wedding-day, and she permits me to be one of the witnesses of her taking Louis before Heaven to be her husband. That interest must be sole and supreme. When you ask me to see her tea-caddies and her soup-spoons I decline your polite invitation, and have the honor to inform you that when this happy ceremony closes, if there is yet daylight, I will accompany you to Tiffany's, and see as much silver-ware as you choose.

If you had the moment to spare, dear Laura, I should like to say a word about the ceremony itself, and it is this: If you are to be married by a clergyman, let him follow the Episcopal form. Don't leave it to his inspiration and his extemporaneous performances. I remember once going to a wedding—it was a June day long and long ago, and just as bright and beautiful as the fairest day of this June in which I am writing to you—and the clergyman, good soul, but not easily inspired, and oh! not gifted in prayer, when the brilliant bridal party arrived before him began an essay upon marriage! He told us that men and women were created to live together—that Christ had wrought his first miracle at a wedding—that it was a very serious relation—and he went on through a continuous series of dreary platitudes until he seemed suddenly to remember himself, and married them as it were in a parenthesis. Then he made a prayer harmonious with the essay, and all was over. Now marriage is a ceremony, and why not be sure, since you propose to go through a form, that it is a stately and solemn, not a stupid form? Of course the natural emotions and the associations at a wedding make it serious enough; but why should the ceremony be commonplace and flat?

I asked myself this question a dozen times upon that old June day, and I asked all my neighbors, but neither I nor my neighbors could answer it. And, dear Laura, you will observe, also, that I have not begun to reply to your question which I took my pen in hand to answer. But I will do so next week. My mind began to maunder as I began to talk of marriage and weddings, and I have given you advice which you can not take. For why tell a wayfarer how to leap the stream when he is already over? But perhaps you will show my letter to Juliet, your younger sister; and who knows? by the time her Romeo appears, she may have come to the conclusion that there was some sense in what Laura's old bachelor hinted, and have resolved that her wedding shall not be marred by an exhibition of tea-strainers and stalled oxen.

Next week, then—and good-by,

Your still beaming

OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

WRAPPINGS.

NOTWITHSTANDING the prevalent fashion of complete costumes for street dress there have been several new styles of mantles introduced this season. Outside garments for short suits are usually made with sleeves, as the polonaise and Watteau, or in fichus with sashes. Only a few scarf mantillas are made of the same material as the dress; but black wrappings, sold separately to be worn over any dress, are either scarf burnous or of circular shape. Glossy faille and poul de soie are the material for heavy mantles; a cashmere with crape finish is an intermediate article; and grenadine and net are the next grade below lace.

A handsome imported model, to be worn with a church or visiting dress, may be made of any of the materials alluded to. It consists of two large capes. The upper cape is pointed at the sides and taken up in four pleats in the middle of the back. Over this is a long, narrow pointed hood, ornamented with grolots of cord and passementerie, and finished with a tassel. Wide fringe with passementerie heading is the trimming. The specimen shown us was of gros grain, marked $175. A scarf mantilla at $125 is a long piece of silk curved out to fit low about the shoulders, with rounded fronts crossed over. The back is pleated up and adorned with a hood. Wide guipure lace of rarely fine quality in a leaf-pattern surrounds the garment.

A stylish and peculiar mantle is called the Maintenon. The front and back shoulder-pieces and sashes are of silk. The fall over the arms resembling sleeves, and the side bodies, are of guipure lace.

The most useful garment of the season is a polonaise or redingote of black silk, as it serves for an over-dress to skirts of all the different colors. It is cut closer to the figure than those made in the winter, and is confined at the waist by a belt and short sash of four large loops, and wide fringed ends. The neck should be en revers, rolling almost to the belt. The front of the skirt should be fastened at the side-seam in order that the full width may be rounded, and left without a row of buttons down the centre, thus giving the appearance of an upper-skirt. White bodies of tucked muslin, with turned-down collars and cuffs, are worn with the colored skirt.

Fringe and lace are the most fashionable trimmings. Guipure lace is again very much used, and is imported in new designs of medieval patterns, and in leaves without flowers. A succession of small, narrow satin folds, ruches, quillings, or passementerie form the heading for fringe and lace. Buttons are large and flat. Tassels with square heads, long pendent cones, and flat grolots are used to ornament sleeves and revers.

LACE GARMENTS.

It is in lace wrappings that the greatest variety of shape is seen. We must first tell our readers that these fanciful styles of mantles are not made in real lace. Chantilly, point, and fine thread mantles retain the standard shawl shape, with occasionally a circular garment. The burnouses, polonaises, and fanchonettes are considered only transitory fashions, and are made of the woven lama, or the new Princesse lace, which closely imitates thread, has fine meshes, and is very soft, without that harsh wiriness peculiar to woven lace. The figures are shaded, woven thick and thin, producing a pretty effect when worn over colored silk.

Large lace points are not graceful with short dresses, nor are they now considered stylish with trained skirts when hanging plain from the shoulders. Ladies who possess valuable mantles are making them available by arranging a burnous fold in the back, or by looping them in several folds at the neck, with a thread bow and barbe for ornament, or a rosette of lace or ribbon. The folds look careless and unstudied, but are arranged by the modiste with great care to prevent the lace from being injured. A most stylish garment was made in this way from an old-fashioned mantilla scarf that had been out of use for several seasons, preserved merely on account of the beautiful material. It is of guipure net, low on the shoulders, bordered with two ruffles of lace. The modiste, an artiste in her way, folded four deep pleats on each side and in the back, securing them with shell bows of black faille. Two graceful curves are thus formed in the back. The long fronts are crossed on the bosom and fastened in the back over the tournure by a bow and short sash. When permanently fixed in this manner the mantilla is readily adjusted, and is in good style.

The most expensive lace mantle for sale in New York is a Chantilly burnous from the French Exposition, offered at $2000. It is of gossamer fineness, with remarkably small and distinct meshes overwrought with figures of rare size in such fine material. A white point, valued at $1200, is a combination of round point and point appliqué. The border is a medieval pattern in round point. The fragile frost-like centre of appliqué is in a floral design. A large circular of the same combination is valued at $900. Thread points from $900 down to $100 are displayed. The only fancy mantle in thread lace shown us is a long peplum scarf. It is high at the throat and deeply pointed on the sides and caught up in the centre of the back with a barbe. Price $200.

A fanchonette of Princesse Dentelles is a novel garment shaped like a fichu with bretelles. Instead of crossed ends it has square basques front and back, gathered in at the waist under a lace belt. This is suitable only for very young ladies. In black lace the price is $30, in white $37. Another shape is a half-adjusted basque with slashed skirt and coat-sleeves. The lama polonaise, described before, is shown with both closed and flowing sleeves. A graceful round mantilla has two circular capes, the upper one about half the size of the lower.

Ladies who can not afford to buy thread lace, and who object to lama, are advised that pale-tots and mantillas of guipure net are made by the modistes in good style at a very small expense compared with the prices asked for imported mantles. The quaint, curious designs of guipure are particularly suitable for the present picturesque style of dress. Some pretty garments are formed of guipure insertion in lengthwise or diagonal rows, carefully sewn together. These jackets have an advantage over those that are imported in being fitted to the figure for which they are designed. Bands of colored velvet are passed through the meshes of the lace to enliven the toilette when worn with a white dress. For full-dress receptions a mantle of white guipure is shown, ornamented with clusters of appliqué embroidery and butterfly bows of ribbons the color of the silk with which it is to be worn.

CARRIAGE WRAPS.

The Bedouin style is repeated in all kinds of material for carriage and evening wraps. Soft chiné crêpe, goat's hair, and woolen grenadine scarfs, with the Arab fold in the back, are displayed in solid white, blue, or scarlet, and in stripes of color alternating with white. A very handsome one is of a rich fabric as glossy as satin, laminated with gilt that is warranted not to tarnish. A bouillon fringe is on the border. The tassels are of gilt and white camel's-hair. Another, very gorgeous, is of black and gold. For a young lady is a scarf of blue and silver, with blue crimped fringe border and tassels.

A goat's-hair burnous is flecked with tiny streaks of several different colors. Grenadine is in solid inch-wide stripes, lavender and white, or blue. A woolen Bedouin at $14, woven to imitate basket cloth, is a useful garment for afternoon drives in the country.

The large round burnous of fine cashmere, lined with soft Marseilles silk, is the favorite shape of the sortie-du-bal. One lately imported as part of a bridal outfit is of white cashmere, lined with pink silk. It is bordered with white chenille fringe, each thread of which is finished by a flat pendant. Underneath this is a pink fringe, crimped to resemble crêpe. Medallion trimmings of chenille, satin, and chain stitch. The hood is faced with satin and edged with fringe.

The Russian Baschlik, illustrated during the winter in the Bazar, is in favor at the watering-places. It is a hood meant to be worn on the head, and not merely for ornament. A cape, with long tasseled ends, covers the shoulders and crosses in front, affording the protection so necessary with low evening dresses after leaving a heated ball-room. The pattern is of simple construction, and can be easily made from the designs furnished in our previous Numbers. It is an inexpensive and picturesque wrapping.

SEA-SIDE AND YACHTING JACKETS.

Sea-side and yachting jackets of white serge are made short, close-fitting, with nearly tight sleeves, and are buttoned with shell-shaped buttons of a color to match the silk with which they are trimmed. These jackets display a good figure to advantage, and are sought after during the boating season. The trimming is a fold of blue or scarlet gros grain, with fluted shells of the same pendant as a border. A blue serge jacket, bordered with white, is made with pointed revers, disclosing a habit shirt.

The Moorish jacket is piquante and gay. It is made of black crape cloth, with sleeves, rounded in front to show a lace bodice. The back has pointed basques. The front and basques are braided with gilt, in arabesque patterns. Ball fringe of black and gilt on the edge.

TRAVELING WRAPS.

The plaid Galway or Colleen Bawn circular of Scotch plaid is desirable for an extra covering in the veling. It has an upper cape, looped up in the back, with two rosettes. A burnous of gray cloth, with bright plaid border, is reversible, being plaid on the under side, with a gray border. Water-proof blouses, with sleeves and cape, are confined by a belt, and reach to the edge of the dress. Gray linen overalls, similarly made, are preferred to the circular dusters.

PERSONAL.

WHEN Miss CUSHMAN comes home this summer it will be for good, and she will make her home in the pretty town of Lenox, Massachusetts, where Mrs. F. A. KEMBLE has a little place. —Mr. Mandarin BURLINGAME is a Michigander by birth and the son of an inn-keeper. Demosthenes in his youth is said to have harangued the waves of the sea, to acquire the ability to speak to a tempestuous popular assembly; but Mandarin BURLINGAME, not residing near the sea in his youth, harangued the forest trees of Michigan, near his father's inn. They listened to his remarks with majestic composure, and occasionally, when the wind blew, wagged their tops.

—Mrs. JANE PARK, a native of North Carolina, but long a resident of Cleveland, Ohio, entered on her 104th year last week. She is hale and hearty, with much aptitude for eating and repose.

—A nice anecdote of Mlle. NILSSON is current in Paris: A concert was planned for the benefit of the destitute of that city by a committee of ladies. The success naturally depended on securing the services of a first-rate artiste. One was applied to who named her price $1000. "But how much will remain for our poor?" despairingly inquired the fair president. A petition was laid before Mlle. NILSSON, whose reply was, "I was born of poor parents, I well remember their gratitude when in sickness or trouble they received help. I am only too grateful if Providence allows me in turn to be the means of others, as poor as we were, being relieved." Mlle. NILSSON never sang more exquisitely, and the pecuniary result was in every respect gratifying.

—A distinguished authoress writes: "I think that the Bazar is about the most useful thing that ever was done to teach idle young women how to employ themselves and destroy the despotism of milliners and mantua-makers. They told me in Washington that they sold fifty copies every week in Willard's Hotel alone."

—The "wages" of the PRINCE OF WALES, all told, amount to about £500,000 per annum, and there is talk of giving him another £50,000 per annum to enable him to keep up an establishment in Ireland. His last proposition is to establish a new club where the American game of ten-pins is to be made a feature. To this club no one will be admitted except on invitation. The number will be 350; entrance, 100 guineas; yearly subscriptions, 30 guineas. As the Prince is said to owe a great variety of creditors more pounds than he yearly receives, and as he can only have bought this club-house in the sense of promising to pay for it, there is every reason why Parliament should come promptly to the rescue of his distressed finances. What is the use of being a prince if you can't have your debts paid by the public?

—They talk quite plainly about the sad ways into which the EMPEROR OF RUSSIA has fallen. He drinks too much—quite too much; goes to bed nearly every night in what the Yankees call "a state of Hail Columbia," and has been on the very point of "del. tremis." His wife feels shocked about it, the more so as she is a confirmed invalid. And then the CROWN PRINCE neglects his beautiful wife, DAGMAR, and keeps away from home altogether too much. The royalty of Russia may, therefore, be said to have rather a poor time of it.

—The Queen of Prussia and the Queen of England are said to cordially dislike each other. The King finds more favor in VICTORIA'S eyes, probably because he is a fast friend of his daughter-in-law, "VICKY;" though "VICKY" in 1866 came near breaking with the King, because she was then opposed to the war, and wanted his Majesty to dismiss BISMARCK. She took no pains at that time to conceal the disgust with which the wily Premier inspired her. But she has since owned up that she was mistaken in him, and she is now the best friend he has at the Prussian Court. Her husband, though a very good fellow in his way, is rather weak, and is generally led by his wife. Strange to say, this young couple, who during the first year of their wedded life almost felt an aversion to each other, are now so tenderly attached to each other that the courtiers turn up their noses at their display of "plebeian and burgher-like" love. When WILLIAM I. dies "VICKY" will be King of Prussia, and she will try hard to become Emperor of Germany. She is a great deal more ambitious than her mother, and exceedingly popular, owing to the great energy with which she proceeds in all charitable undertakings. The old Queen-dowager ELIZABETH, the evil genius of Prussia, hates her with intense bitterness, and has tried for years to undermine her influence with the King, but "VICKY" has thus far always triumphed; and, as the bad old Queen-dowager has of late been paralyzed, and can no longer leave her sick-bed, her pernicious influence can no longer do a great deal of harm.

—Little Miss STARRS made quite a hit at her presentation to LOUIS NAPOLEON, who asked her first name. "Helen," she replied. "I could wish, Mademoiselle, that I were Paris," gallantly returned the Emperor. "Impossible, Sire, since you are France!" said she, with ready wit.

—Mrs. MANTON MARBLE, who died on the 17th ult., was a lady of rare mental endowments and accomplishments, and abounded in all those domestic virtues and charms that made her the delight of her home, as well as of the brilliant social circle in which she moved.

—Mr. COLFAX is already paying the penalty for early popularity. A Western paper declares that there are so many boys in Indiana named for him that all the grave-stone cutters keep on hand stones cut, "Sacred to the Memory of SCHUYLER COLFAX —," the last name to be inserted after the funeral.

—A pleasant little picture of the Princess of Wales, drawn by a young American lady in London and sent for publication to the Philadelphia Saturday Evening Post:

"Here comes the Princess of Wales! We all sat up very straight, trying not to look curious, and pleased, and conscious, and feeling that we failed miserably in the attempt. One young person donned her eye-glasses, and wished that circumstance and high-breeding would have allowed the use of opera-glasses instead. Meanwhile a stylish landau rolled toward us, drawn by two handsome prancing bays. The coachman and footmen were dressed in plain dark livery—the whole equipage and its appointments being as simple, unpretending, and perfect as one could well imagine. Two ladies were seated in the carriage, one of whom turned her calm, quiet gaze full upon us—it was the Princess. She has an oval face, pale and pathetic—with a quantity of hair, of that neutral tint called light brown, drawn carelessly away from the smooth, frank brow. Her blue eyes are large, sad, and questioning; her nose slightly aquiline, and her mouth is very sweet and sensitive. Not beautiful, and hardly to be called even pretty, except, perhaps, under a flattering gas-light, with the brilliant adjuncts of a splendid toilette, she yet has a tender, womanly, flower-like face that would, in any rank of life, cause a good man involuntarily to accord her his protection, and a good woman to give her her love. She was dressed quite simply, wearing a blue velvet paletot, with a bit of swan's-down at her throat, a black lace hat, with blue velvet flowers and strings, and dark gloves."

—A gentleman of Boston, regarded by the people of that town with great veneration for the good he does in the way of manufacturing waggeries, has exhaled the following: If Timothy Titcomb should visit Amsterdam during his absence in Europe would there be any absurdity in saying the Dutch have taken Holland?

—They ripen rapidly in China. The EMPEROR of that country having reached the mature age of fourteen has been furnished with a wife. There were one hundred and fourteen "girls of the period" who competed for the honor. His mother made the selection, but the Emperor has the veto power.

—A son of Mr. RAYMOND, of the Times, is now a student at Yale, and one of the editors of the Yale Literary Gazette. He commenced to write when a very young boy, not more than eight years of age. While living in Saratoga he issued a weekly sheet called the Fireside Paper, which was printed at the Times office, and circulated among his friends and acquaintances. His little sister wrote poems for it. He bids fair to equal his father as a writer.

—The young PRINCE OF PRUSSIA has tact as well as gallantry. At the royal wedding ball at Turin a clumsy dancer tore one of the flounces of the Princess's dress. Amidst some surprise the Prince drew from his pocket a porte-monnaie, which might have cost thirty cents, containing knife, needles, etc. Pulling out a small pair of scissors, he placed his knee on the ground, and cut off the morsel which was hanging. At the moment the young Princess extended her hand for the bit of lace, the guests were not a little surprised to see the Prince rise, lay the precious relic on his heart, fold it up methodically, and put it in the breast pocket of his coat. There's gallantry for you!

—If the Bazar were called upon to name one of the most popular, in every sense, of American poets, it would probably name Mr. JOHN G. SAXE, who, if he had been successful in his frequent contests for the governorship of Vermont, would have cut poetry, gone into politics, and deprived the people who speak the American language of some of the pleasantest and best poetry of the time. The new volume published by TICKNOR & FIELDS contains a number of his best pieces, contributed to the Ledger, now presented in permanent and beautiful form, and sure to add to Mr. SAXE's reputation. It was remarked with great point by that beautiful poet and celebrated wit, the late GEORGE D. PRENTICE, that "it is a great mistake to fancy SAXE is merely a witty poet: he is the most poetical of wits. His sense of the beautiful is large and delicate." It is creditable to the taste of the country that good poetry, like Mr. S.'s, is in such demand as to call for fresh and exquisitely printed editions.

—The late ex-President BUCHANAN possessed a fund of anecdote that made him an admirable host. At the table he was eminently at home, and was the most accomplished diner-out Pennsylvania ever had, not excepting the witty, genial MORTON M'MICHAEL. His fondness for animal food, of which he ate enormously, was the cause of his ultimate decease, inducing gout, which prevented him from taking exercise. In late years he contributed no money to the Democratic party, although often requested to do so. He was not communicative as to his bachelorhood, but said once or twice, at long intervals, that no man ought to grow old without having himself surrounded with the pleasures of a family. "Every thing else accomplished," he said, "and no children, is little accomplished." He was fond of his niece HARRIET LANE (now the wife of Mr. JOHNSON, a banker of Baltimore), gave her a handsome outfit when she married, $25,000 in money, and by his will has left to her one-fourth of his estate, valued at about $300,000. This he has so settled upon her that should any misfortune occur to her husband her fortune would be left intact. At the time Colonel FORNEY purchased a residence in Washington (soon after he was made Clerk of the House of Representatives), it was deemed advisable to convey it in trust to Mr. BUCHANAN. After their quarrel Colonel F. made several efforts to induce him to resign the trusteeship, but the old gentleman steadily refused, and persisted in retaining his control to the last. He was successful beyond most men in his political career, having held the offices of Representative and Senator in Congress, Minister to Russia and England, Secretary of State, and President.

—The publication of the Memoirs of Germany's distinguished philosopher and diplomatist—BUNSEN—has brought to light an incident not generally known, that BUNSEN was the temporary tutor and traveling companion of Mr. WILLIAM B. ASTOR, and that it was a journey to Italy to meet Mr. ASTOR, in 1816, who was obliged to return unexpectedly to America (and in vain tried to induce BUNSEN to accompany him), that gave its complexion to his succeeding career. In Italy he became acquainted with his future wife, an English lady of fortune, Miss WADDINGTON (sister to Lady Llanover), who has now become his biographer; and there too, from his acquaintance with NIEBUHR, he was engaged in the diplomatic service of Prussia, in which so large a portion of his life was spent. Most characteristic of the noble ambition of the scholar conscious of his own power, is a plan of intellectual labor drawn up by him in his 24th year, when a poor unaided student, with his way to make in the world. In this he marks out clearly his grand object, the progressive development of the grand central idea of Humanity in its varied stages, to be attained by an extension of the ordinary domains of philology, history, and philosophy. To this he was always faithful amidst the distractions of political life; to this end all his studies tended, and (happier than Humboldt, who never freed himself from the vortex of a court) to this his last years were peacefully and profitably given, as the noble books by which he is known to English readers (a fragment merely of his life-work)—Egypt's Place in the World's History; Christianity and Mankind (including Hippolytus and his Age and Philosophy of Universal History), and God in History—most thoroughly prove.

Boy's Java Canvas Suspenders.

THESE suspenders are not only pretty, but very easily made. They are of Java canvas, lined with muslin and embroidered with red split worsted and black silk twist; the edge is finished with loose button-hole stitch and crocheted scallops of red split worsted. An illustration gives a section of the full size. Cut the strips, allowing for a seam on the edge, which must be turned down and worked over with cotton, work the pattern and line, and at the same time finish the short straps with the scallops, and sew them between the double material of the long strips, which must now also be worked and finished with the scallops. Work this edge in one round as follows: 1 sc. (single-crochet) in a button-hole stitch, * 1 p. (picot) — a picot is composed of 3 ch. (chain stitches) and 1 sc. in the first of the three — then, passing over a button-hole stitch, 1 sc. in the following; repeat from *. The short straps are cut of white suspender elastic, and buttonhole stitched round the edge with red split worsted. The button-holes must also be worked in red worsted. Another illustration shows a section of suspenders of fine ribbed piqué. Embroider as shown in the pattern, or from any suitable tapestry design. For each square work three perpendicular stitches over three ribs of the piqué. For the crochet scallops on the outer edge crochet in every second button-hole stitch 2 sc. separated by 3 ch.

Table-Cover of Netting and Strips of Linen.

THIS cover is very neat, and is made of cheap materials. The foundation consists of squares netted of knitting cotton, and through which are drawn four-double linen strips, as shown in Fig. 1. The squares are joined with pleated strips of linen. Old linen or muslin may be used. A fringe of twisted strips of linen borders the cover. First prepare the netted squares, which are begun on one corner and worked over a mesh three-fourths of an inch in circumference. Then prepare the strips of linen, for which cut straight bands an inch in width, and turn the edges over so as to meet in the middle; after which double them so that they are reduced to the width of a quarter of an inch. With these strips are made the figures of the design in the squares. Figs. 2 and 3 show the manner of arranging the flowers and berries, and Fig. 4 the leaves. First, draw the strips through, as shown by Fig. 2, then run the upper part alone, so that the strips shall lie smoothly on the wrong side. The + on Fig. 2 shows where the strip is brought through for the commencement of the second layer. As the work for the leaves is only double, while that of the flowers and berries is fourfold, the latter are more prominent, which heightens the effect of the work. The stems and tendrils are formed of similar strips of stuff, which are twisted together into a cord and then sewed on from the under side. The linen strips must be moist during the twisting. Having completed the squares, overcast them on the braided linen strips as shown by Fig. 1. For making the fringe arrange similar strips of the requisite length, join one end of each strip on a pin-cushion, and twist the other end till it is evenly twisted, after which double it in the middle, by which means it becomes doubly twisted together; then sew it to a narrow linen band. When the fringe is finished sew the band, with the fringe, on the under side of the edge of the cover, thus covering the ends where the fringe is sewed.

Crochet Fringe for Covers, etc. This fringe is worked with medium fine crochet cotton as follows: Crochet * 5 ch. (chain stitches), 1 dc. (double crochet) in the second of the 5 ch.; from * repeat nine times, then 6 ch., 1 dc. in the third of the 6 ch., after which, returning on the row, 1 sl. (slip stitch) in the stitch taken up by the dc. before the last, + 1 sl. in the next ch. between 2 dc., 3 ch., 1 sl. in the ch. taken up by the next dc. Repeat from +. At the end of the row work 1 sl. in the last free ch. This finishes a strand of the fringe. Then 3 ch., and repeat from * till the fringe is of the length desired. The upper border of the fringe is composed of three rounds of single crochet. The first of these rounds must be worked in the 3 ch. between every two strands of the fringe, and in the upper sl. of each strand. In the other two rounds crochet always around both upper veins of the stitches of the former rounds.

Java Canvas and Crochet Tidy.

See illustration, page 581.

THE foundation of this tidy is of white Java canvas, in the centre of which is set an application figure of leaves and flowers worked in crochet with red yarn, and on the outer edge a lace of the same material. A tied fringe of white yarn borders the cover on the outer edge. The pattern is twelve inches square. The flowers and leaves are worked singly in middling fine red yarn; they are always begun in the centre. The scallops and points of the flowers are worked, according to the illustration, in sc. (single crochet), sdc. (short double crochet), dc. (double crochet), and tc. (treble crochet). The lace is worked from the middle both ways, in nine rounds, as follows: On a foundation of the requisite length crochet for the 1st round alternately 1 dc., 1 ch., passing over one stitch. 2d round.—2 dc. in the first ch. of the former round, * 8 ch., passing over seven stitches, 2 dc. in each of the two following ch. Repeat from *. 3d round.—2 sc. in the first 2 dc. of the former round, * 1 sc. in the next ch., 1 ch., 4 dc., each separated by a ch. in the same chain stitch scallop, 1 ch., 1 sc. in the last ch. of the same scallop, 4 sc. in the next 4 dc. Repeat from . Three more rounds, which are easily worked from the pattern, complete this side of the lace. Then work on the other side of the foundation thread three rounds as follows: 1st round.—1 sc. in every stitch between 2 dc., after each sc. 1 p. (picot), which is formed of 4 ch. and 1 sl. (slip stitch) in the first of the four. 2d round.— 1 sc. in the middle stitch of the next p., 5 ch., passing over one picot. Repeat from *. 3d round.—In every chain stitch scallop 1 sc., 1 sdc., 4 dc., 1 sdc., 1 ch. Having finished the lace and the single flowers and leaves, sew them next to the foundation, as shown in the illustration, with red yarn. Then work the stems in half-polka stitch. Coarse red yarn may be used for these. Lastly, tie on the fringe around the outer edge.

Tatted and Crochet Insertion for Chemises Russes, etc.

THIS insertion is worked with fine crochet cotton, the figures being first wrought. Each figure consists of four rings, and each ring of 9 ds. (double stitches), 1 p. (picot), 9 ds. Having worked four of these rings close together, tie the beginning and end threads, by means of which are formed the four-leaved figures, which are joined by crochet stitches as follows: 1st round.—1 sl. (slip stitch) in a picot of a ring of a four-leaved figure, * 10 ch. (chain stitches), 1 sl. in the picot of the following ring, 10 ch., 1 sl. in the picot of the third ring, and at the same time in a picot of a new four-leaved figure. Repeat from *. 2d round.—1 tc. (treble crochet) in the first sl. of the former round, but, in completing this, a new tatted figure must be joined, which is done as follows: just before the thread is brought through the last time run the needle through a picot of the new figure, and then bring the thread through it and the loops already on the needle at the same time. Then 10 ch., 1 tc. in the next sl. of the former round, but, before completing the stitch, run the needle through the picot of the next ring of the figure just fastened on and also through a picot of a new figure, and draw the thread through both picots and the loops already on the needle at the same time; then again 10 ch., 1 tc. in the next sl., fastening on the picot of the following ring. Repeat from . 3d round.— 1 sl. in the picot of the lower ring of the first figure, 10 ch., 1 sl. in the first tc., 10 ch. Repeat from *. The remainder of the work can be easily executed from the illustration. Having completed the requisite amount, run through it narrow ribbon or velvet.

at the distance of one-fourth of an inch a ring like the first. Then turn the work again, by doing which the ring just finished points downward, and work at the distance of one-fourth of an inch from the second ring another ring like the former, but, instead of working the first picot, join to the last picot of the first ring. Then turn the work again and work another ring, which must be joined to the last picot of the second ring. Continue in this manner till the strip has attained the requisite length. Having completed as many strips as are wanted for the width, sew them together, as shown in the illustration, by running the needle through two opposite picots, and then again through to fasten them firmly, then through the next two picots, etc.

FEMININE RESPECTABILITY.

THERE are two very opposite motives which make men cling to the opinion that, at least as long as possible, women ought to avoid the business of providing for themselves. Some people want to make them better, and some to make them more dependent. It must seem very ungracious to quarrel with the first of these; for a woman to complain of the chivalry that ap- portions to her the best and easiest place, of the hard usage she receives from the sex who are willing to take upon themselves the burden of the maintenance of herself and her children, to do all the rough work of her life for her, to keep away out of her sight, and even out of her knowledge, the repulsive and degrading part of the experiences they are compelled to make, to give her precedence on all occasions when the necessities of their position do not require them to take the command, and who ask in return only a greater refinement, a higher morality, and a warmer heart than they have themselves. Surely the woman must be actuated by inferior motives who is discontented with such a position! But the drift of our lamentation is rather that she is not discontented. That except a few who wish to escape from its restraints, women are content to take all that is offered them, even with the condition annexed that they shall earn nothing for themselves. If a change of opinion on this matter take place it will not be one sex only that will move, leaving the other where it is; but the more advanced of both sexes that will find reason to alter their conduct, and the rest will follow without knowing why. It is not easy for an unpracticed mind to imagine the results of a different training, and above all they can not get over the feeling that to be different is in itself to be wrong. The phrases "her place," "her sphere," "her natural position," are all various modes of begging the question whether her employments might not be changed with advantage. They say, in fact, that she is right where she is, because she is there. But to those who believe in the possibility of progress it may be interesting to dwell on the evils of the present system as the first step toward amendment.

And, first, for the ungracious objection to those who are willing to spend most of their time and means in providing for their womankind.

It must be admitted that so far they have not succeeded in doing it. They should not claim the return so long as women are not provided for. So small a number of them are above the necessity of working that it is no misuse of language to say that women have to work as hard and as long as men. Those who do not work to earn wages work to save them in their own households. So the only practical result of ignoring in their education the necessity of earning is, that they work to less purpose than they might do. A state of things which at least proves their leisure and their capacity for labor. But though they are not taught how to make their labor productive, the good to be gained by being provided for, the leisure and opportunity, are not won; neither is the freedom from anxiety, and from the harass of changing fortunes; but to these is added the misery of being passive, the consciousness of being helpless. The charity that prompts the exclusion of women from money-making, on account of the hardships attending it, is but disguised cruelty unless it secures them a better alternative. No woman would need advising not to undertake an employment that would expose her to a more unpleasant life than she would have to bear without it. It is poor reasoning to tell her that since her capacity is inferior, and she can never earn what a man can, that therefore she must not alleviate her poverty by the skill she has. She ought to compare her gains, not with the handsome earnings of more capable people, but with the pittance or the destitution that would fall to her lot if she did nothing. Her desire ought to be to fight for a place in the world as best she can, not to throw down her arms because others can win a better.

It is the fighting we object to, says the chivalry. It hardens and unbeautifies a woman's character. Even if she gets richer by it, her moral deterioration is more serious and more certain.

Certainly the generosity that takes upon itself the whole duty of providing for and protecting women, has a right to ask of them to prefer poverty to moral degradation. But, we would respectfully ask, how does helplessness or inactivity keep temptation at a distance? By taking away all natural wishes for money, and the things that money can buy? If not, which is most degrading? To have none but indirect or disreputable means of increasing their store, or to have one at hand that at least produces something? From the desire for wealth we are none of us ever free. We are all liable to be tempted by it to fraud or harshness, cruelty or cunning—but how, in the name of wonder, are these temptations averted by closing all avenues to honest earning?

But the necessity of holding her own in face of opposition makes a woman unfeminine. At least so say those who evolve the idea of a woman out of their moral consciousness. But those who would take from women the power of resisting their impulses, even their natural and kindly ones, would really take from them the main safeguard that stands between them and perdition. Without the power of "holding their own," in spite of persuasion, entreaty, and their own feelings, they would be fit for no place of trust on this earth; and if the misplaced chivalry of men succeeded in manufacturing women so deficient, it would go beyond even their generosity to marry them.

Remains the objection that by mixing with the world they would become acquainted with evil. There is no reason why they should. A woman is no more obliged to learn evil from those with whom she buys and sells, or from whom she receives wages, than a lady is from a cabman, or a housekeeper from the costermonger. There are plenty of women in doubtful and degrading trades—especially of those women who have been "brought up respectable," and have no better to turn to. But the remedy for this would be to change the current of public opinion, and make it "respectable" to earn a living—and to learn how.

No one dare say of the few women who maintain themselves that their industry makes them inferior. It is not found that they deteriorate, or become unfit for the class they belong to. But so long as living in the expectation of being provided for is thought more worthy of respect, the majority, of course, will endeavor to do so. Respect is more to them than money. Competence, friends, the happiness of marriage, all are involved in the choice between working and waiting—only waiting; nothing worse than that. No wonder, then, if they swell the ranks of the waiters. The young will always prefer to aim high and fail rather than give up hope and accept an inferior position. So the years that should be passed in active work or in learning how are spent in waiting, and the untaught woman is made incapable for life. For getting a living is not so easy that it can be begun in a day, and the whole bent of the mind reversed at once because the fortune changes. An employment that is thought degrading can never be heartily followed. By taking from them their self-respect, the poor women are maimed for life. They travel on in pain and weakness, and need all their courage to move at all.

Why is it only when all other resources fail that women begin to think of these things? Because they are foolish? The folly is common to all classes. If it were customary for the upper classes to teach their daughters how to provide for themselves when their fortune was too small, or even to manage their own property when they had any, those inferior in station would do the same. Women do the best they can, but how can they be expected to go about inventing new doctrines with all the world against them? Is it reasonable to say they ought to find it all out in case of necessity, or when they find they don't get married? They can not work without learning how, and they can not learn a trade with want at the door.

There is another class of objectors, who do not like women to work because they would like them to be more dependent. They become acquainted with wrong, it is said, and accustomed to protect themselves against it. And this attitude and capacity strike some people as disagreeable. In urging this objection they are dropping the woman's advantage out of sight, and putting their selfish taste in place of it. Who is most likely to be disagreeably impressed by the knowledge that women can take care of themselves? Those who wish them well will rejoice in their strength as an assurance of their safety. But what of those who absolutely object to their power of self-protection? What makes a man wish a woman to be deprived of all hopes and interests except those that centre in pleasing the other sex? To be without prospect of a maintenance except what he may give or withhold? How far has his selfishness led him toward wickedness when he advocates such a position of the sex as leaves it entirely at his mercy, with starvation for the alternative?

This unconscious influence of mean motives has a great deal to do with the opposition often made to feminine independence. It is not the danger that women may neglect good counsel that some people dread, it is the power to resist evil that they find in their way. But so long as temptation is abroad in the world, it is much to be regretted that the idea of feminine respectability does not include the power to help one's self.

A NICE CORRESPONDENT!

"The glow and the glory are plighted
To darkness, for evening is come;
The lamp in Glebe Cottage is lighted,
The birds and the sheep-bells are dumb;
I'm alone at my casement, for Pappy
Is summoned to dinner at Kew;
I'm alone, my dear Fred, but I'm happy—
I'm thinking of you.

Was there ever so rude or so reckless
A darling as you?

But, Fred, he's not nearly so charming
A poet as you.

I saw how you rode Chanticleer,
I have read the reports of your speeches,

Small marvel that fashion is making
Her idol of you.

Sometimes I half wish I was merely

TAKEN BY STORM.

MISS COMFORT sat in the doorway knitting a dish-cloth.

Her house was so low that a lilac-bush beside the door brushed the eaves; and so green with moss that the lilacs and old-fashioned red rose-bushes seemed to be a part of it.

"Five times more across will finish it," said Miss Comfort, spreading out the square of knitted cotton.

Put in the needle, over the thread, draw it through, take off the stitch. Put in the needle, over the thread, draw it through, take off the stitch. Back and forth, back and forth till the very last time; when the gate-latch clicked.

Miss Comfort looked up, but saw nobody. Then she looked down, and saw what might be a stalk of clover walking out on its own responsibility; but as it came nearer up the graveled path, between the beds of chamomile and sage and balm, the round red bobbing clover-head took on the face of a little smiling girl.

"I've come for you, Aunt Christyana," she cried. "Ma sent me, and she wants you to come right up to her house and stay to supper. Mrs. Dubant is there, and somebody else is coming; Mrs. Small, I guess."

"What is your ma going to have for supper?" asked Miss Comfort.

"Oh, cake and honey!" replied the mite. "Will you come? Ma said I must bring you."

Miss Comfort looked up at the clear blue sky. "Isn't it going to rain?" she said, doubtfully.

"Oh no, ma'am! Ma's camphor foams when it is going to rain, and it doesn't foam a bit to-day!" answered the child.

"Well, I don't see how I can go. Midas's hens will be right in scratching up my peas sure as I am not here to watch them. There! there comes old Speckle now!"

As she spoke Miss Comfort jumped up as quickly as one lame knee would allow, and, dropping her knitting, started in chase with an old broom which she kept behind the door on purpose. The hen ran and fluttered and flew, and so did Miss Comfort, until, after a deal of rounding of corners and heading-off and screaming on the part of both, Miss Comfort caught the hen under a gooseberry-bush, and giving her a good shaking, in a neighborly way, to teach her better manners, threw her over the fence that divided her garden from Mr. Midas's; and came back to her doorway, victoriously, out of breath; while the hen shook out her crumpled feathers with an indignant cackle, and went to brooding imaginary eggs on a heap of sand.

"Well, there!" cried Miss Comfort. "I guess now she won't venture over here again to-day!

But I don't know as I can go home with you, Christy. Somebody might come, too. I think more than likely Mrs. Riggs will be here. She told me two weeks ago she meant to come down, and I have baked and got all ready twice on purpose for her. It is a good day to-day, and likely she will come."

"Ma sent me for you. She said I must bring you with me sure," returned little Christy, true to first principles.

"Well. I shall have to bring in some wood first, for fear there may come up a shower; and fix my windows and things to leave," replied Miss Comfort, presently.

Then she set to work picking up and putting away as though she were preparing to sail around the world, instead of going two houses off, over the brow of the hill, for an afternoon. After an hour's hard work she was ready; her starched white sun-bonnet, with its crimped border, on her head, her great black silk "work-pocket" on her arm, and her hooked-handled umbrella for a staff in her hand. She locked her house-door carefully, placing upon the threshold a shingle with the words "Gone to Barnum's" chalked upon it; and then, with a parting look over her neighbor's treacherous fence, set forth, with little Christy trotting triumphantly by her side.

For fourteen years, ever since her mother died, Miss Comfort had lived alone in this brown bird's-nest, but no mother of ten had wider sympathies or fuller call upon them. Nobody fell ill and nobody got well; nobody married and nobody was widowed; nobody was lonely and nobody had company, but they thought of, and sent first to, Miss Comfort. So she was far enough from being lonely or selfish; and though she had her ways, as we are all apt to have, she was as amiable and kind a soul as any under the hending sky.

Now, with her other qualities, Miss Comfort had eyes that served her as good purpose as a fly's; she could see with them before and behind and on all sides; and she had not fairly crossed Mrs. Barnum's threshold before she perceived there was something in this invitation besides Mrs. Dubant, Mrs. Small, and cake and honey.

To be sure there sat little Mrs. Dubant in a flutter of blue ribbons, as empty and silent as a last-year's bird's-nest; and there was certainly a decided smell of freshly-baked cake and new bread coming from the open pantry that adjoined the family sitting-room. But there was upon Mrs. Barnum's face, which had never more concealment than a mirror, such a studied look of innocence that an owl could have seen, even at noonday, something was behind it.

"I am glad you have come, sister Christyana," began Mrs. Barnum. (The first Mrs. Barnum was a sister of Miss Comfort, and the second Mrs. Barnum, with the husband, adopted all the relations of the first.) "I persuaded Mrs. Dubant to stay and take a cup of tea with me, and I knew you would enjoy a visit with her of all things. Her brother Ebenezer had business above here and brought her over. See, you knew he had lost his wife, didn't you?"

The blue ribbons gave a plaintive shudder, and Miss Comfort said to herself, "Oh, that is it, is it?" But aloud she only said to Mrs. Dubant, "Your brother's wife left quite a family, if I remember."

"Six 'm." "Who has the care of them?" continued Miss Comfort, whose warm heart really yearned over the forlorn little orphans already.

"Her mother," replied Mrs. Dubant. "Ebenezer lives there too for the sake of the children, but the old lady don't make it pleasant for him. I do wish he could find somebody who would be kind to the children. He is a good provider, Ebenezer is; and always had the name of making a kind husband. The neighbors will all tell you so," continued the little woman, who was outdoing herself in her sisterly anxiety.

"Well; now I wonder if Sally Beaville wouldn't make him a good wife. I mistrust she would be willing to marry if she had the right kind of an offer. You know she hasn't any home to speak of, and it would be an excellent opportunity for her, sure enough."

Evidently this suggestion was not acceptably received by her hearers, though Mrs. Dubant only rustled a little while Mrs. Barnum looked more innocent than ever; and just then the unhappy, bereaved Mr. Ebenezer Stainsby drove past the window into the side-yard in his great lonesome wagon.

"Oh, why! If you are not back already! How time flies! Well, I must hurry up my tea. These men always want to be going first, you know," cried out Mrs. Barnum, when he entered. "I will trouble you to take seats in the front-room till supper is ready. Sister Christyana, will you be kind enough to show the way? Oh, there! Mrs. Dubant, if you'll wait just a jiffy I will go out and cut that rhubarb for you before I forget it," she continued, with a sudden burst, as though she had not arranged her plan and even her words long before.

So Mrs. Dubant dropped out of the little procession, and consequently, when Miss Comfort turned about after opening the door at the other end of the hall, she saw only Mr. Stainsby with a button off his coat, rips in his gloves, and a widowed look all over him. She disdained the cowardice of turning back herself under any pretext, so she went in like the fated six hundred at the battle of Balaklava. Then she drew up the Venetian blind with a deal of noise and incident, and then, sitting by the farthest window, she began to talk. And she talked and talked and talked with a flow of words steady as the flow of water at Niagara.

But it was of no use. When a man has any thing to say he will say it in the face of twenty Niagaras. So of a sudden out it came.

Ebenezer Stainsby was wiser than a serpent, and he understood very well which was the unfenced corner of Miss Comfort's heart. So he said little about his own loneliness and need—a hundred creases and wrinkles eloquently proclaiming that for him—but told, with tears in his eyes, of the forlorn state of his motherless little ones.

"Every body in Ashland knows what their grandmother Belcher is, Miss Comfort. He means well, perhaps, too; but she is elderly and not in firm health, and has always been a woman of high temper, besides being so set in her own way and inclined to be fretful. I don't say these things to speak against the old lady; but really, Miss Christyana, when I know what an uncomfortable home my little children have my heart aches, I do assure you, and so would yours."

Miss Comfort's heart did ache just in sympathy as she listened; but sympathy is quite another thing from really going upon a hot six-barred gridiron one's self.

"I am truly sorry for you and your family, Mr. Stainsby, and I wish I could do something for you. But I don't wish to change my situation. I am too old to think of such a thing, though I thank you for the honor," she said, with the formal propriety of an old-school lady.

She tilted her chin as she spoke, with an air of decision that her neighbor Midas's hens were very well acquainted with, but that Mr. Stainsby tried not to understand.

"I have always heard a great deal," he began again, "of your kindness to children, and mine need a mother so much. I am sure you would love them if you knew them." Then he went on pleading with fatherly rather than lover-like earnestness; but Miss Comfort would not be moved. She drew up her mouth like her silk "work-pocket," and was very sorry.

So at last the poor man went away clothed, as to his spirit, in sackcloth and ashes; and, as to his body, in garments rent like an old Israelite's; and Miss Comfort came to Mrs. Barnum, flushed and pained. "I will box the ears of the very next child I meet. A good name gives one trouble sometimes as well as a bad one. There can't a mother die in the country but her husband comes for me to take care of the children," said she, with a sense of having been very disobliging.

"I always understood that Mr. Stainsby was very indulgent to his wife," replied Mrs. Barnum, pensively.

Some time during the next week, as Miss Comfort was hoeing among her beans, with a man's straw-hat upon her head for company, her gate clicked again, and again little Christy Barnum appeared, bobbing up the walk; but this time leading a white-headed child no larger than herself—a pretty-faced girl, with gentle manners, but with a forlorn look of neglect about her.

"This is Selma Stainsby, Aunt Christyana," said Christy.

"Oh! well, you may pick a stalk of caraway for her and one for yourself," replied Miss Comfort, thrusting her hoe with violence into the heart of a thrifty pig-weed.

"Barnum's wife's work; but she will lose her trouble this time as well as the last," thought Miss Comfort.

It was useless, however, for her to try to take no interest in the child. The sun, generally considered so impartial, allied itself against her, making the garden too hot directly. Then the curiosity which was in the heart of woman even before the fall, and of which Miss Comfort inherited a share like Benjamin's portion, allied itself against her attempt at making herself indifferent to her visitor. She did wish to see what Stainsby's child was like. And, unfortunately for her indifference, Stainsby's child seemed like a very sweet and attractive one. Oh yes! Mrs. Barnum knew what she was about.

In half an hour the little girls were sitting together eating caraway cookies on the door-step, not to scatter crumbs on the house-floor; and Miss Comfort was telling them stories and singing them old-fashioned songs. They strung over the quaint, bright bead necklace that she kept for just such entertainment; they looked at her box of children's books and old almanacs; played with her pig and kitten; and went away at last, each with a piece of plum-pie as big as her own face.

Miss Comfort could not help asking little Selma to come again; and sure enough she did, in little more than a week, bringing with her a younger sister, who was more winning and loving than herself even, and who looked even more motherless and neglected. Dear, little, dimpled Constance; with a mouth always ready to be kissed, patient eyes, and hair that had as much longing to curl as a grape-vine, but that had to be braided in two long queues and tied with a piece of faded green braid.

Miss Comfort felt sorry all over for the unmothered baby, and took her right into the tenderest spot in her tender heart. She curled her hair, made her a rag-baby with a "come-off dress," an "open-and-shut fan" of a bit of newspaper, picked her largest peony for her, and only said, "Be careful, dear," when Constance dropped her bread-and-butter-and-sugar upon the floor, butter-and-sugar side down.

Finally, as Miss Comfort sat in her best ginger-ham at the round tea-table between the front windows of her sitting-room, with a small Stainsby on each side, helping them to cake and jelly, Constance cried out, with a little scream of joy, "There's my papa! there's my papa!" And, slipping from her chair like water over a rock, in a moment Miss Comfort, with a feeling of envy and lonesomeness, saw her in Mr. Stainsby's arms, kissing him again and again, while he passed his hand admiringly over her beautiful curls and held her close to his heart for a moment.

Then he put Constance down and took the baby from the wagon. This baby was two years old; but something was the matter with his back, so the poor thing had never walked. and might never. And he, as Mr. Stainsby brought him in—dressed in a gown made of a high-colored, large-flowered one of his grandmother's—was the most touching sight of all in his sweet helplessness.

"How much he looks like a little brother of mine who died at about his age! The little dear! Do let me take him. Is he afraid of strangers?" said Miss Comfort, holding out her hands.

The baby answered this question for himself by reaching out his hands in return, and springing with a glad cry from his father's arms into Miss Comfort's.

"Mamma! mamma! come!" said he, nestling his head upon her neck.

There were tears in Miss Comfort's eyes as well as Mr. Stainsby's as she stooped her head to kiss the little white cheek.

"You have always reminded me of Paul's mother, especially in your eyes," said Paul's father. "But I did not suppose Paul remembered her. He was only eight months old when she died."

The children not being through their suppers Miss Comfort of course had to ask Mr. Stainsby to eat with them; so he sat down opposite her, and she poured his tea with Paul, who clung to her, in her lap.

"Constance dear, you are holding your knife in the wrong hand. Let pa spread your bread for you," said Mr. Stainsby. "I hope, Miss Comfort, you will excuse my children's manners. Their grandma doesn't think of such things. But I wouldn't mind that so much, if that was all. Children are trying to old people, I suppose," he added, with a suggestive sigh.

As soon as they had finished their suppers Mr. Stainsby began to tie on the bonnets and pin on the shawls; but he did it so awkwardly that Miss Comfort was glad to come to his help.

"I wit Mit Tomfort would pit on my tings every time. T'e do it more better," said Constance.

"Yes, dear, so do I," replied her father.

"Oh will you, Mit Comfort? My pa said he wit you would," cried the child.

Miss Comfort made as if she did not hear, but Paul was not so easily disposed of. "No, no! Mamma come! mamma come!" he sobbed with baby grief, clinging fast to Miss Comfort's neck when his father tried to take him.

"You see, Miss Comfort, how they need you!" said he, piteously. "If you only would come!"

"Do come! Will you come?" asked Constance, holding fast to Miss Comfort.

Selma alone did not speak, but she looked up with hungry eyes that said as much as all the rest.

"Well, well, I suppose I must, then. But you will have to go now, all of you, only the baby. He can stay if he wants to," said Miss Comfort, desperately.

And so, as the children could wait no longer, the very next week Miss Comfort went.

LONDON CORRESPONDENCE.

THE great Derby-day—London's great holiday—is over, and the result is in every body's mouth. It is proverbial that the favorite rarely if ever wins, but it is but seldom that the favorite is nowhere in the race, and narrowly escapes being last of all in the struggle. As I told you in my last letter, there has scarcely ever been so much excitement, even about a Derby-day, as there was this year. The favorite, Lady Elizabeth, was the property of Lord Hastings, who, once the possessor of fine estates and a very large income, has managed to lose it pretty well entirely on the turf; and the winning of the Derby was supposed to be the last chance he had of retrieving his fortunes and saving himself from utter ruin. Indeed of late he has been unable to meet his vast and recent losses, and it was necessary to enable him to enter the ring at all that he himself should find £10,000, and his friends another £10,000. His friends proved themselves equal to the occasion; and by the sale, it is said, of his wife's jewels on the previous day, he too was able to pay the sum required of him. After all this, it was natural enough that when early in the afternoon (for the result of the race is known in London a very few moments after it is run) the news spread that Blue Gown was first, King Alfred second, Speculum third, and Lady Elizabeth ninth, that the commiseration felt for the Marquis was intense; and yet it was all wasted, for though, of course, had his own horse won he would have fared much better, his book was so cleverly made that he was still the winner of, some say £80,000, some say £30,000, the medium being probably the truth. The cause of Lady Elizabeth's defeat seems to have been her unconquerable temper, which rendered her nearly utterly unmanageable, even by Fordham, one of our best jockeys, and one of the most successful—save at the Derby, where he has invariably ridden a losing horse. A great deal of money has, there is no doubt, been lost by the outside world, whose faith in Lady Elizabeth appears to have been unbounded; but the most extraordinary part of all is that the owner of the winning horse, Sir Joseph Hawley, is himself a loser. He ran two other horses, Green Sleeve and Rosicrucian, and stood to win with them.

I doubt if any one but an Englishman can realize what the Derby really is, or the excitement it creates. Every man who possibly can puts in an appearance; it is a day given up to fun and frolic, to a plentiful imbibing of Champagne, and unheard of consumption of cigars, good and bad (more bad than good, I fear), and to practical jokes of all kinds. Hucksters' carts, vans, omnibuses, old worn-out carriages which never see daylight save on occasions of this kind, mingle with the four-in-hands, and the barouches with postillions, and such other aristocratic equipages in which our young men of the upper and richer class delight. Very few ladies are present, save a sprinkling of the nobility who accompany their husbands, and remain on the grand stand. The demi-monde muster in good force, with very wonderful toilettes, and display much hilarity of spirits later in the day, when the Champagne-bottles have been uncorked. It is essentially a vulgar race, though the highest in the land are there. This year the Prince of Wales traveled all night from Scotland to be present at it, and was accompanied by the Crown Prince of Denmark, who is now on a visit to his sister, the Princess of Wales, at Marlborough House. He came, they say, from Copenhagen in order to see our Derby.

Of late years the Derby has altered its character greatly—viz., since so many railways have been opened. You can reach Epsom Downs, which are about eighteen miles from London, by three or four different lines, and they all keep pouring in one continuous stream of people from early morning. In old days there was the road, and nothing but the road; and the road to and from the Derby was considered one of the most wonderful sights of the day. City clerks, shopmen, hard-worked lawyers, together with M.P.'s and noblemen (for neither Houses of Parliament sit on that day), all seem to consider themselves entitled to a holiday—a holiday they all mean to enjoy. A man bent on an expedition to the Derby is recognizable by every body. White hats are very much the order of the day, and the long blue or green veils wound about them are as much a part of the programme as the Champagne, light coats, and opera-glasses, to say nothing of light hearts.

Down past Clapham Church and Clapham Common (a suburb much frequented by city men, who, confined all day in dreary, stifling offices, delight in even the faint semblance of country which suburban London offers them), where, all along the route, the inhabitants pour out to see all that is to be seen of the Derby road and the Derby fun; and by-and-by you find yourself on the Epsom Downs, surrounded by all that heterogeneous mixture of people which congregate at races. Ethiopian serenaders, thimble-rig, Aunt Sally, fortune-tellers, and the like, are ready to amuse you, if such amusements please you. Plenty of challenges from professional betting-men await you, which, if you care to embark on the very treacherous ventures they propose, will probably find you a poorer, if not a wiser, man. If you are among the favored few you may turn into the paddock, and there inspect the horses, and see the preparations necessary before their appearance in public. You will find yourself here in good company, for the Prince of Wales is sure to go there, as all other great patrons of the turf; you may saunter over the course until the time comes to clear it before the race begins; you may mingle among the various vehicles congregated on the opposite side; or you may take your place in the grand stand, or in any of the many private stands which abound. But the principal things which struck every body, on this last Derby-day, was the wonderful brightness of the weather, so different to last year, when it positively snowed; the bright green which caught the eye wherever a patch of ground was left untenanted, and the myriads of people which abounded on all sides.

The first race was for the Bentinck Plate, won by Wild Darell; and then came the Derby Stakes, the great Derby race. It was run in two minutes forty-three and a half seconds. What breathless moments to many of the spectators! As the horses flew past the noise was deafening. The various partisans cheered their favorites. "Blue Gown wins!" "No, no; King Alfred!" and so on. One horse, Franchise, broke her leg badly in the struggle. From the first the contest lay between King Alfred and Blue Gown, the latter winning at last by half a length. It seemed wonderfully soon over. They say Lady Hastings, who was with her husband, wearing his colors and showing the greatest interest in the event, shed tears at the result; but the truth of this deponent knoweth not.

The Borough Stakes, the Manor Stakes, and the Epsom Town Plate followed; but when the Derby is over very little interest is felt by the general public in the racing, and lunches are partaken of with much gusto, and amidst a good deal of fun. As the day begins to close in the rush toward the railway stations and the block on the road is something better imagined than described. About eight o'clock a van at Kensington broke down, which eventually stopped the progress of all other vehicles for a good ten minutes, and the confusion and damage to panels and poles must have been by no means inconsiderable; but good-humor was pretty general, notwithstanding that most of the inmates of the carriages were plentifully besprinkled with flour, sold for the purpose on the road by itinerant vendors. These showers of flour, and a liberal display of small wooden Dutch dolls, were among the most popular witticisms of the Derby this year. The Tomahawk, a paper which, as its name implies, deals pen-and-ink vengeance on the faults and misdoings of the age, published a cartoon the Derby week, which represents a barouche on its way to the Derby; in it a youth, supposed to be Lord Hastings, with two friends and a lady. Flying from his hand are two dolls, on which are written "honor" and "self-respect," or something of the kind; the other hand is held up to receive a glass of Champagne, which a servant in the shape of a grinning skeleton is pouring out for him. A sign-post near by indicates the road to the infernal regions.

A bet with regard to the Derby has been a great deal talked about. The wager was, that a woman was to leave Clapham on the Derby and reach the race-course at Epsom before a gentleman who left Cornhill at the same time in a four-in-hand. The result has not yet leaked out, though a great deal of money depended on it.

All the world nowadays seems to rush into print, so many of our nobility have been writing books of late. Lady Herbert, of Lea, the widow of Lord Herbert (better known as Mr. Sydney Herbert), first made her fame as an authoress by a clever work on Spain, which she has followed up with others of equal talent. She has been passing the winter in Rome, where she has been most seriously ill, but has now recovered, and is on her way home. Lord Wilton, who married for his first wife a daughter of the twelfth Earl of Derby, and is among the most well known of our nobility, has written a work "On the Sports and Pursuits of the English as Bearing on their National Character." As one of the most successful sportsmen of the day his opinions on this subject carry weight.

Lady Diana Beauclerk, the Duke of St. Alban's sister, has just published her impressions of Norway. Les grande dames, it is rumored, are immensely proud of their literary success. Lady Franklin, the widow of the great Arctic navigator, is spending the winter in India; rather a wonderful journey for an octogenarian. Our Queen is just now in Scotland, but returns in a fortnight, and is about to hold public breakfasts in Buckingham Palace; the first is to be given in honor of Prince Alfred. His return among us safe and sound, after the late dastardly attempt on his life in Australia, will give rise to the most hearty and universal rejoicings here. The news that the Princess Dagmar, wife of the Czarewitch of Russia, and sister of our Princess of Wales, had given birth to a son caused a great deal of satisfaction generally. The Grand Duchess of Russia presented her with a necklace worth £6400 in honor of the event.

Among the recent deaths of public men that of Sir Benjamin Guinness is announced. It was he who at his own expense restored St. Patrick's Cathedral, Dublin. It must have been a proud moment for him when the Prince of Wales was so recently installed there a Knight of the Order of St. Patrick with much pomp. Poor man! he was present on the occasion, but has scarcely survived this crowning triumph of his life above a month. He was the head of the great brewing firm of the name, and had realized an enormous fortune. Funeral sermons were preached in St. Patrick's on Sunday, and the cathedral was draped in black.

It will interest you all, I am sure, to know that it is proposed to erect a statue to your illustrious citizen, Mr. Peabody, near to our Royal Exchange. In the Academy this year there is a portrait of him, similar to the one now belonging to her Majesty. It is eagerly sought by the visitors there, who are not likely to forget the munificent gifts he has made to the nation.

Nowadays, since the Saturday Review has taken upon itself to be so hard on the fair sex, every story to their disadvantage seems to find its way into print. Two of these are going the round of the papers now, viz.: that a woman of title drove in her brougham to see Barrett, the Fenian, hung at Newgate, and of course, when the dreadful moment arrived, fainted; the other, that another lady, of equally exalted position, made a bet that she would walk through a Scotch fair in a kilt, a feat that she eventually performed. I should very much doubt there being the smallest atom of truth in either of these tidbits of gossip. English women are not at all given to this kind of performances.

The prosecution of Governor Eyre, of Jamaica fame, is at an end. The grand jury have returned "No bill," which is equal to declaring that the case can not be tried.

An Exhibition of Art has just been opened by the Prince of Wales at Leeds, in Yorkshire. It contains some wonderful paintings, and a choice collection of artistic treasures of all kinds.

Her Majesty's Theatre, which was burned down in the autumn, is to be rebuilt at once. The plans are already accepted. Drury Lane Theatre has been most charmingly fitted up as an Opera-house for the time being. I went there the other night to hear your American prima donna, Mademoiselle Kellogg, in "Somnambula." Both her voice and acting were admirable, and she has won golden opinions here.

ARDERN HOLT.

THE WOMEN OF THE DAY.

AN able English writer in Saint Pauls makes the following sensible rejoinder to the stinging diatribes against women which have of late seemed the special mission of the Saturday Review, particularly the "Girl of the Period":

"The women of our day are not the counterparts of their mothers. Times have changed, and women have changed with them. The old conception which prevailed till the last generation, that when a woman had married young, had kept her home in good order, had reared a family of children, and had lived in harmony with her husband, she had fulfilled the whole aim and object and purport of her existence, is dying out of fashion. Our women know more, read more, think more than they did in the good old days; and we can not reasonably expect that they should be contented with the same narrow round of pleasures and duties. It always seems to me that these 'laudatores temporis acti' are engaged in solving the insoluble problem of how to eat your cake and have it. If you are to have women who are fit to share the thoughts, desires, and aspirations of men in a high degree of culture, you can not also have women who cumulate the functions of nurse, housekeeper, and cook. Notwithstanding the fashion for co-operative stores, the principle of the division of labor is the ruling one of our day. In virtue of that principle we have to a great extent exempted women from household and menial cares; and by so doing we have secured a degree of culture and refinement not compatible, I think, with any very active interference in domestic matters. I often wish that the wiseacres who repeat the parrot cry about the happy time when ladies cooked their own dinners, and mended their own clothes, and did their own marketing, could know something of the family life of countries where women still perform the duties I see urged so eloquently upon their attention. In the north of Europe the wife is still the 'good woman of the house.' There the ladies cook the dinners with their own hands, wait at dinner to a considerable degree, pass no small part of their time in the kitchen and the store-room, and even lend a hand at the wash-tub. I do not dispute the fact that if you wish your womenkind to be only a superior description of upper servants you had better seek for them in these patriarchal climes. But even the courage of a Saturday Reviewer would shrink from the idea of marrying or living with these 'brave housewives.' As a rule, I am afraid you must say that the excellence of women as housekeepers is in inverse proportion to their excellence as intellectual companions. I do not say that a clever educated woman may not keep her home comfortable, and her household in good order, and bring up her children excellently. Intelligence and organization will supply the place of personal labor and constant supervision. But I do say, that, if the nursery and the kitchen and the laundry are to be considered the proper sphere for the exercise of women's energies, it is idle to imagine they can also be ideal companions for the drawing-room and the study. Persons in the habit of reading the advertising columns of the daily papers must be aware that there are two classes of advertisements emanating from ladies who desire to fill the position of housekeeper to a single gentleman or widower. The advertisers of the one class describe themselves as domesticated and fond of cooking; the other base their pretensions on being musical and agreeable companions. The distinction thus drawn appears to me representative of modern womanhood—to apply to wives equally with housekeepers.

"Common honesty compels me to confess that I believe women were created for other objects than bearing children, and that I doubt whether, when a woman has married a husband and made his home comfortable, she has done all which God or man have a right to expect of her. But my wish is now to treat the subject from a purely masculine stand-point. Looking at the great woman-question from the male point of view, I hold that we are unreasonable in expecting that English ladies should unite the inconsistent merits of the intellectual companion and the bustling housekeeper.

"If I am right in this opinion it is idle to imagine that this transition period, during which women are emerging, as a class, from the kitchen and store-room into the study and library, will not be attended with a great amount of extravagance and absurdity. And this phase will, undoubtedly, afford good scope for small social satire of the ordinary Saturday Review calibre. There is room for any number of pretty, twaddling essays about æsthetic women, pushing women, little and big women, Papal women, women in orders, and so on.

"I should wish that the critic whose utterances I have criticised in turn might tell us whether he really meant to accuse the women of our day of anything more than vanity and folly. If not, he ranks at once amidst that great class of writers who, from time to time, have sharpened their wits upon the foibles of the female sex. But if he meant more than this—if he understood the purport which his words conveyed—if he intended to imply that English women were immodest, heartless, and vicious, I deem him to have uttered a very foul and base libel, which it behooves men, even more than women, to protest against loudly. It would, indeed, be an evil day for England if the time should ever come when our countrywomen should be spoken of habitually in the terms which the Saturday Reviewer has thought himself justified in applying to them. When such language has been used it ought not to be passed over in silence. Women can always hold their own in the contest with their critics. If every English newspaper were to go on writing articles about the extravagance of female attire from now to the end of the year they would not lessen by a single item the milliners' bills which will come due next Christmas. But the case becomes different when the attack is leveled not against fashions, but against reputations. And it argues ill for the condition of a country when men hear the women who are near and dear to them libeled without resenting the insult. It is for that reason I have entered this protest of mine."

RED CLOVER BLOSSOMS.

DEAR little children, wandering down the paths,
When all the meadow-lands are bright with these,
Fill both their hands with the red clover blooms,
Finding a deeper sweetness than do bees.

And I? I pass the fair June roses by Unwatched; let the tri-colored violets grow;
But, with fast-throbbing heart, I linger long
Where, through the grass, the clover blossoms glow.

I used to pluck them, too, in other days;
But, ah, not now—never on earth again!
Grow, little globes of brightness, unafraid,
Breathing your fragrant lives out in the glen.

I would not dare to touch you, lest my hands
Should stain the whiteness of a thought that comes,
So near to me, so very near and dear,
And smiles forever from your purple blooms!

I know not if in willfulness, or love
Of something hid in you, she placed you there,
I can remember only that she wore
A fragrant clover blossom in her hair.

Tasseled Curtain Band in Crochet Tatting and Knotted Work.

MATERIALS: Fine white guipure cord, coarse tatting cotton, white knitting cotton.

This band consists of a cord fifty-two inches in length, the ends of which are finished by tassels and trimmed with a tatted rosette, as shown by the illustration. For making the cord prepare, first, a skein of coarse knitting cotton, fifty-two inches in length and of the thickness desired, and wind one end a few times with guipure cord. Then, with the same cord, knot a row of button-hole stitch not very close together, putting the end of the cord through the thread which was wound around, and then continue in this manner, making a stitch in every stitch of the previous round till the entire cord is so covered; after which string on each end of the finished cord four rows of interwoven rings of crochet tatting. The smallest row, which is joined in a ring, and which is first pushed on, counts six rings, each ring consisting of 8 ds. (double stitches), 1 p. (picot), 8 ds. The following row counts seven rings, each ring being composed of 12 ds., 1 p., 12 ds. The third row counts eight rings, and each ring 14 ds., 1 p., 14 ds. The largest under row counts nine rings, and each ring 18 ds., 1 p., 18 ds. Then finish both ends of the cord with a bunch of tatting cotton four inches in length, and cover the end of the cord where this is fastened on by means of the tatted rings which have previously been pushed on the cord, and which are now sewed down as shown in the illustration, the three larger pointing downward and the upper one upward. This completes the tassels. The rosette which fastens the cord together, as shown in the illustration, is composed of four rows of interwoven tatted rings, which are sewed fast to a circular foundation. This foundation is crocheted in single crochet, and is an inch in circumference. The largest row of rings, which is first sewed on the foundation, consists of thirteen rings, and each ring of 18 ds., 1 p., 18 ds.; the next row counts ten rings, each counting 18 ds., 1 p., 18 ds.; the third row consists of eight rings, each composed of 16 ds., 1 p., 16 ds.; while the central smallest row counts only six rings, each composed of 12 ds., 1 p., 12 ds.

Tasseled Crochet Curtain Band.

MATERIALS: Tatting cotton, cotton cord.

This band consists of a crochet cord, the ends of which are furnished with tassels, and are held together by means of a rosette in the form of a flower, as shown in the illustration. For the cord make a foundation of 15 ch. (chain stitches), join in a round by means of a sl. (slip stitch), and work on this as many rounds sc. (single crochet) as are needed to make the cord 52 inches in length. Then work on each end still five rounds sc., in each of which widen twice at regular distances, and after this a round without widening. The cup-like ends of the cord thus formed are finished each with five leaves, which are worked singly, and then crocheted to each end of the cord. Each is begun in the middle by a foundation of nine stitches; passing over one stitch, crochet back on the eight remaining stitches, 8 sc., then 3 ch., and on the other side of the foundation row also 8 sc. This completes the first round; after which crochet 1 ch., turn the work, and crochet the 2d round: work back on the last row 8 sc., putting the needle through under the entire stitch; then in the 3 ch. of the former round 2 sc., 3 ch., 2 sc., 8 sc. in the following 8 sc. of the former round. Now crochet again 1 ch., and turn the work; then crochet back on the former round 10 sc. in the first 10 sc., then twice 2 sc. separated by 3 ch. in the 3 ch. on the former round, 10 sc. in the following 10 sc. In the same manner work the three remaining rounds of the leaf, but each round is widened twice by two stitches. Having completed five of these leaves, crochet them together from the back as far down as five stitches from the upper end, and join them by means of sc. with the cord, having first laid a pleat in the middle of each leaf. Finally, ornament the cord above the leaves by means of four rows of crocheted scallops. The upper row counts five scallops, and each following row increases by two. Crochet these in the sc. stitches of the cord as follows: In an sc. of the cord

1 sc., 1 sdc. (short double crochet), 1 dc. (double crochet), 3 ch., 1 dc., 1 sdc., 1 sc. This completes a scallop. The next is worked in the third following sc. of the round, but it must be observed that one round of the cord must be left between each row of the scallops, and that the last row must cover the edge on which the leaves were fastened. Having finished both ends of the cord in this manner, run through it, in order to make it firmer, a cotton cord, on the ends of which fasten the threads for the tassels. These must be four inches in length. Then sew together the ends of the cord at some distance above the tassels, and trim with a rosette of single leaves of various sizes. These leaves are worked like the leaves which ornament the ends of the cord.

Embroidered Alphabet and Figures.

THESE letters are designed for marking pocket-handkerchiefs, table linen, etc. They are worked in satin stitch and point russe with white or colored cotton, or with black silk. The manner of working is shown by the illustration.

FRENCH ETIQUETTE OF COURTSHIP AND MARRIAGE.

AS a general rule, the French bride comes to her husband fresh from the school and the convent. She has never been blighted in affections, or played with her own happiness or that of others. She has had no period of flirtation, and generally she is prepared to love the husband whom her parents or guardians may recommend her. Generally speaking, we believe Frenchwomen—except among the luxurious and depraved circles—make excellent wives; and when a Frenchwoman is good as wife or mother her tact and intelligence render her of inestimable value to her husband and children. As for falling in love, except at first sight, this is not very common or even possible. Girls are rarely long in society before they are married—marriage takes place on both sides early; and even when girls go into society the opportunities for flirtation and engaging affections, etc., are so limited and so carefully guarded against by mothers and chaperons that they practically do not exist.

We will suppose that M. Horace Delaunay has seen Mademoiselle Rosalie Dubois, or that she has been spoken of to him, and that on inquiry as to her position, etc., he finds she is a person whom he would like to marry. He is bound to observe a rigorous compliance with inexorable rules, the violation of any one of which would be probably the ruin of all his hopes.

The first step which M. Delaunay or his parents must take for him is to ask a mutual friend to inquire of the family of the young lady if his offer of marriage will be agreeable. It is absolutely contrary to all good-breeding for M. Delaunay to do this himself; and if he is refused, good-breeding requires him to make no sign of disappointment, but to remain with the family on just the same footing as before. It will be comprehended that all allusion to the refusal would be of the worst of tastes.

If the reply be favorable, M. Delaunay asks for permission to visit the family, or he asks to be introduced, if he has not been so already.

This first visit must take place without the presence of the young lady, and all affairs of property, settlement, etc., are then to be discussed. The family are supposed already to be informed of all details about the position of M. Delaunay by his intermediary; the parents or guardians are now supposed to put further questions to the young man, and to declare whether the replies are satisfactory or not, and to communicate on their side all details about the young lady's fortune and expectations. The young man is invited to visit them on a future day, and the day and hour of the visit are fixed. If the replies of M. Delaunay are not found satisfactory the young lady's representatives require time for reflection, and they separate on the most cordial terms possible, and the suitor is required by good-breeding not to make any further advances unless he is recalled.

However, suppose M. Delaunay has satisfied the exigencies of father, mother, guardian, notary, etc., and the hour of the first visit is arranged in which he is to see the object of his marriage-intentions for the first time as a suitor. The visit must naturally be arranged to take place when no other visitors are expected. Good taste requires toilettes on both sides to be carefully proper, although any display—une toilette tapageuse—is of the worst taste; the young lady especially must be simply but neatly attired. Mademoiselle Dubois, having already been informed of the proposal, sits between her parents, and no allusion whatever is made to the subject of M. Delaunay's visit during the first interview. It is, in fact, a simple visit of reconnaissance; the enemies are placed in presence of and examine each other, talking about the most indifferent things in the world. If, however, either on the occasion of the first visit or of the second, M. Delaunay is not satisfied with the explanations given him, or the appearance of Mademoiselle Dubois, he can still retreat conveniently by writing to say that a little journey, which he is obliged to take, will deprive him for some time of the pleasure he anticipated in being able to continue his visits, etc. If, on the contrary, he desires to go on with the negotiation, he must make a formal demand, by his father, mother, or other relative or friend, to be admitted into the family under the title of prétendu.

If the request is accepted M. Delaunay ought immediately to write a note to the parents to ask when it will be agreeable for them to receive his visit of acknowledgment and thanks; and when this interview takes place Mademoiselle Dubois, having been duly informed of the present condition of the proceedings, will, after the proper compliments have been passed on both sides, be sent for; and the young man is presented to her as her future husband.

From this time M. Delaunay is received in the house of the family on intimate but not on familiar terms, with respect to which there is a wide distinction. M. Delaunay is required, for example, always to come with a toilette suitable for a visit of ceremony, and the young lady on her side too must observe a similar carefulness. M. Delaunay is expected, of course, to pay frequent visits to the house, but always in ceremonious form; and he should announce his intention of coming by sending in the morning a bouquet to his betrothed, whom, indeed, he will never see alone until the marriage is finally celebrated before the mairie and in the church; for marriage-contracts are such slippery affairs that M. Delaunay and Mademoiselle Dubois may have gone through all these forms to no purpose. If M. Delaunay should wish to retire at any moment he can yet do so by writing the little billet and announcing le petit voyage; and the family of the young lady could cover her retreat by any equally simple device; and to prevent all unpleasant consequences, and all chance of malevolent tittle-tattle, the whole affair should be kept a strict secret on both sides till the marriage-contract is finally signed. And, moreover, the young people will never either speak to or of each other by their unadorned Christian names; they must address each other and speak of each other always as Monsieur Horace and Mademoiselle Rosalie. But when the contract is signed and the marriage formally announced the rigors of etiquette may relax in some measure toward the young couple; but, as respects the family, it increases, for the father and mother of the fiancée are now required to shut up their house—that is to say, not to receive at home any but members of the family; and Mademoiselle Rosalie will carefully avoid, and would not, indeed, be permitted to make, appearance either in society or any public place of amusement.

The next step is the signing of the marriage-contract. All expenses of the proceedings are to be paid by the future husband. The notary reads the document; M. Delaunay rises, makes a bow to his fiancée as though to ask her consent, takes the pen, signs the deed, and then passes the pen to Mademoiselle Rosalie. The young lady signs in turn, and passes the pen to the mother of her intended, who passes it on to the mother of the bride, and so on through the members of the family present, who sign for the most part in the order of their age.

It is on this day that M. Delaunay is expected to send the presents known as the corbeille de mariage. The value of the presents should amount to about ten per cent. of the dot of the lady. They consist generally of shawls, jewels, lace, furs, gloves, fans, books, and a purse containing a certain number of gold pieces of money, which should be new. These presents should be put either in an elegant box, or in a work-table destined to form part of the furniture of the young couple. The corbeille should arrive on the morning of the signing of the contract, accompanied by a handsome bouquet of flowers; and the corbeille, together with the trousseau of the fiancée, which by this time should be prepared, is exhibited in her room, tastefully arranged with flowers, for her friends to admire. If there is a ball that evening, as is customary, at the house of the fiancée, the young lady should be in white. She opens the ball with her intended, and in the second quadrille she belongs de droit to the notary, who in olden times had the right of kissing her on the cheek. Every body who signs the marriage-deed is expected to make a present to the young lady.

As for the actual marriage, it is well known this is performed in two ceremonies—one at the mairie, the other at the church. The marriage at the mairie is of a strictly civil character, and is often performed on the same day as the other, but sometimes one or two days beforehand. It must, however, precede the other, though strict Catholics look on it as a mere legal formality, and as no marriage at all in a proper sense. When the bride has signed her name at the mairie she passes the pen to her husband, who receives it and says, Merci, Madame. The lady is thus styled "Madame" for the first time in her life by her future husband. The publication of the bans for the marriage in the church takes place much the same as with us. On the morning of the marriage the bridegroom and his family come to call for the bride and her family. The bridegroom then presents the bouquet de nocces, which must be entirely white, to his fiancée. Carriages hired by the bridegroom, who defrays all the expenses of the day with the exception of those at the house of the bride, are sent to fetch the witnesses of the marriage and the members of the two families who are invited to be present, to the house of the bride. The bridegroom, besides the bouquet, brings the wedding-ring and the pièce de mariage—a piece of money, of gold or silver, according to the condition of the parties; if of the former it is placed like a medal in a morocco case. Among the peasants a piece of copper coin fulfills the function of the pièce de mariage, which must receive the priest's benediction during the ceremony.

As soon as the whole party is assembled they start for the mairie. The bride is in the first carriage to the right with her mother on the back-seat, with her father or his representative in front of her. In the second carriage is the bridegroom, on the back-seat likewise; but his mother—or her representative if he has none—takes the right, and his father sits on the front-seat. The witnesses of the marriage and the other members of the family follow. Arrived at the church the father of the bride leads her to the altar, and the bridegroom follows with his mother. Then the mother of the bride should follow in procession with the father of the bridegroom. The nearest relatives and most intimate friends of the two families also approach the altar. The rest of those invited sit in the body of the church on chairs prepared for them. The family of the bridegroom and the bridegroom take the right, the bride and her family take the left, of the altar. During the service a quête is made in the church, which is performed by the younger sisters of the bride and bridegroom, if they have any, one on each side. In the absence of younger sisters the nearest younger female relatives supply the deficiency.

During the ceremony, when the priest addresses to the young couple the question, "Consentez-vous à prendre pour époux?" etc., each of them before replying turns to the side of the father and mother, makes them a bow or courtesy, and then each replies, not in a loud tone, but à mi-voix. After the offertory of the mass the young couple arise, and each takes a wax-taper, which is placed before them, and they go to the altar and place the money which they offer as alms in the hand of the priest. And after the "Pater" is said a pall is held over the heads of the bride and bridegroom by the youngest boys—the nearest relatives of each family. When the marriage mass is over the young pair go to the sacristy, and there receive the congratulations of their friends. The order, however, of going there is just the reverse of what it was on entering the church. Thus, the father of the bridegroom now leads the bride, and the mother of the bride now takes the arm of the bridegroom. Those invited to the wedding follow after and make their compliments to the newly-married couple and to both families. There is a general presentation by the bridegroom of his friends to his bride, and the mother of the bride introduces her friends to the bridegroom.

Etiquette has now another order of the day to impose on departure from the sacristy. The bridegroom is now allowed for the first time to give his arm to the bride, the father of the bride gives his arm to the mother of the bridegroom, the father of the bridegroom to the mother of the bride, and after this, it appears, etiquette relaxes, and allows the rest to follow as they please, except that on the return home in the carriage the bride and bridegroom must get together into the first carriage, which, however, is now to be filled up with the family of the bridegroom, while the family of the bride makes up the second carriage. And it must be observed that only on the occasion of a marriage service is a giving and taking of arms admissible in a French church.

All persons invited to the marriage will show good taste if they arrive at the church before bride and bridegroom; and they are expected not to laugh or talk at the wedding, more especially when the priest gives his benediction; and they are expected also to make a visit of congratulation within a fortnight, or send a letter of apology, alleging sickness, calamity, or other reasons by way of excuse. The bride's gloves must be white, like her toilette; while it is now out of fashion for the bridegroom to wear any thing lighter than beurre frais.

It is contrary to all French usage to invite company to the marriage of a widow, or even of any lady, sur le retour, above thirty, which ought to take place early in the morning, without display; and the toilette of the bride in such cases should not be white.

It is not generally the custom now in France to take a journey after the marriage; on the contrary, the wedding-party often spend the day together, go for a drive in the Bois de Boulogne, and have a dinner and ball in the evening. The guests who have been invited to dine are expected before leaving to give an invitation to the young couple for a dinner or a soirée; and such a return is called the rendu de nocce, and they are allowed a whole month for the giving of the rendu de nocce, at which, naturally, the best places and all the honor are given to the new couple. No one, of course, must appear at a marriage in mourning; even a widow, if en grand deuil, must appear at the marriage of her daughter in white and gray. In the best society, however, the festivity of dinner and ball takes place on the day of the signing of the marriage-contract; and it is to be observed that a Protestant minister may be invited to the wedding, but a Catholic priest never.

The lettres de faire part of the marriage are to be sent within fifteen days, and the persons who receive them are expected to pay a marriage visit within a month.

THREE HORNS TO A DILEMMA.

LEST the following story should seem too absurd I beg to state that it is substantially true. The hero was once well known to me, and I never heard any harm of him, except that, as he pathetically expressed it, he "didn't know his own mind." He flitted from flower to flower in the "rose-bud garden of girls," like a well-disposed but exceedingly light-headed butterfly. Whether there is fascination in such fickleness I am not prepared to say; but Frederick Pardoe was acknowledged by the fair sex to be "a remarkably agreeable man."

He had a pair of "deep, unutterable eyes," which, according to Dr. Holmes's theory, may have descended to him from some great-aunt, who possessed a superior nature, but had bequeathed to her nephew only the empty eyes, with the meaning left out. Certain it is, there were sentiments sleeping in those magnificent orbs of his which he knew nothing about and could not have understood after the most minute explanation.

I introduce him to the reader at a large party, under the full blaze of a chandelier. He brought the sweet Adelaide Blythe in his carriage, but is now as forgetful of that young lady as if she had been quenched under an extinguisher. She sits in a corner, weaving her vexation into radiant smiles, while she watches him hovering near her friend, Miss Fontleroy.

"If his attentions to me had not been so very pointed I might think—; but no, I will not, can not doubt him!"

The elegant Miss Fontleroy sings:

"New hope may bloom,
And days may come
Of milder, calmer beam;
But there's nothing half so sweet in life
As Love's young dream."

Mr. Pardoe turned the leaves, and looked unutterable things. Yes, love's young dream was deliciously sweet; he had found it so, with this peculiarity—he had never had any definite object for his dreams. He had worshiped particular stars, but they had all had their time to set. He was beginning to think the lady of his love must surely be an "impossible she," since she took as many forms as Proteus himself.

"Miss Fontleroy," said he, breaking the spell of silence by plucking a sprig of cedar from a neighboring vase and presenting it, "you know the language of this:

"The memory of our love shall be
As lasting as the cedar-tree."

Miss Fontleroy gracefully accepted the gift. Their eyes met. Such a heart-beam as shone in Frederick's!

"I will doubt him no more," thought the proud May. "His conduct may at times seem a trifle capricious, but he is truth itself. I will never be jealous again, and of such a girl as little Addie Blythe!"

At that moment Mr. Pardoe was thinking,

"'Pon honor, now, I would give a pretty penny if I knew my own mind!"

Men have had larger minds than his, and have known them thoroughly. It looks reasonable, therefore, that it was not the size of Mr. Pardoe's intellect which stood in the way of his becoming acquainted with it. Neither its profundity.

Judging the future by the past, it did not seem probable that his very diffuse affections would ever come to a focus. His heart was a little like his cousin Sarah's eyes; and they were serviceable enough till she tried to thread a needle, and then she found she was what the country people call "scatter-sighted;" she could see every thing else but the needle and thread.

"There's nothing half so sweet in life
As Love's young dream."

These words sang themselves over again to four persons at least; for there was a third young lady at Mrs. Pulsifer's party that night who had, or thought she had, a right to palpitation of the heart when Mr. Pardoe pressed her hand. Had he not told her that "for several virtues he had liked several women, but she so perfect and so peerless," etc., etc.?

And a man who "knew his own mind" could not have quoted Shakspeare more aptly, for Jane Liscom was a rare woman, with only the one fault of sentimentalism. It was a marvel that the shallow Pardoe could appreciate her, a greater marvel still that Jane should have looked on him with favor. I shall not try to account for it. We all know what little god was born blind.

In the midst of his conversation with the queenly Miss Fontleroy Mr. Pardoe's "errant eyes" wandered across the room to Miss Liscom's.

"Noble woman!" thought he, "wrapped in the majesty of her own thoughts! She is not a beauty, but how do I know she is not the second self I am seeking? I wonder if she would spill ink into my coffee? I really must go over and speak to her."

Miss Liscom met him with frank cordiality and a certain blushing consciousness. Why not? She was almost betrothed to him. Such was the glamour this man had thrown around her that she actually supposed his fate rested in her hands, and that she was waiting to know her own heart better before giving him a final answer. He greeted her rapturously, smiled upon her tenderly. She looked into his eyes, and thought she was gazing down, down, a thousand fathoms; whereas it was probably about the sixteenth of an inch, and no more. But Fate had designs on our hero this evening, and meant to push him to extremities.

"My dear Miss Liscom," said he, in low, soft tones, which, like his eyes, never meant what they expressed; "my dear Miss Liscom, you remember the promise you made me last week?"

He only intended to remind her to give him a copy of one of her poems, but she mistook his meaning.

"Mr. Pardoe, I—I—you know it was only conditional. I said I would look into my—my—heart."

Mr. Pardoe was visibly startled. He now remembered distinctly that a few evenings before this he had unintentionally carried compliment to the very verge of a declaration.

"Good Heavens!" thought the discomfited swain, "can't I speak to a woman without committing myself?" But he added aloud:

"Charming girl, pardon my importunity. I promise never, never to allude to the subject until you give me leave."

"That ought to settle it," thought Mr. Pardoe; "of course she won't take any steps toward marrying me till she hears from me again!"

Still his conscience was not easy. He hurried away from Miss Liscom only to meet fresh danger in the guise of Adelaide Blythe. That curly-haired nymph was looking at her gossamer robe in dismay. Some careless foot had mistaken it for a spider's web and nearly demolished it.

"Oh, Frederick!" said the pretty creature, looking into his face confidently, at the same time laying her little hand on his arm, "do take me away out of these rooms, and then go call May Fontleroy to help me. I'm such a figure! Do, dear Frederick, be quick!"

"Dear Frederick" felt himself seized and possessed. Here was another woman who certainly laid claim to him. Perhaps she had a right, he really could not tell. He was always more or less in love with such affectionate little souls as Adelaide; if he had committed himself in that quarter he was very sorry. Just at this moment, however, the question was of torn dresses, not lacerated affections. He conducted Addie up stairs to the dressing-room; then he must find May Fontleroy and a paper of pins.

"What a helpless baby she is!" was Miss Fontleroy's mental comment, as she swept sylph-like across the parlors, leaning on Mr. Pardoe's arm. They passed Miss Liscom.

"Come with me, Jane," said May, playfully. "I need your help in arranging a tableau."

The young lady took May at her word and followed. Mr. Pardoe offered his left arm.

"Pity I hadn't three arms for all these girls," thought the poor victim, with a suppressed groan. "I've heard of a man's being placed between two fires; but—hang it!—here are three!"

Not a word spake Frederick, as they wound their slow way up stairs; but his thoughts were legion.

"If I do get home alive I'll treat myself to a dose of prussic acid!—Verdict: 'Found, the body of a tender youth, a victim to his own fascinations. Justifiable suicide. Fickle young men, go and do likewise.'"

"Mr. Pardoe, you are certainly ill," said his literary lady-love, seeing with the quick eye of affection that something was wrong. "Your face is frightfully pale."

"Is it faintness?" inquired the other lady-love on the right, with tender emphasis.

"My dear May—I mean, dear me—no, girls, no!"

"Giddiness?" pursued the sylph.

"Oh yes—oh no. There is something whirling; but I—I—believe it is not my head."

"He has had a fright," thought the lady on the left, jumping at a conclusion; "the house is on fire—he hopes to get us out with our things on before the alarm is given."

"I do trust it is not wine," thought the lady on the right, "deeply as we are both attached I must dismiss him if he drinks!"

Meanwhile, the moisture on Mr. Pardoe's forehead was increasing to such an extent that he longed for the ability to get possession of his pocket-handkerchief.

"Three women laying hold of one man! I can't stand this! I must put an end to it. But suicide is—is— And I owe a duty to my mother; I must live for her sake."

"Mr. Pardoe!" cried May, in piercing tones, "you stagger, you're certainly faint."

"Where did the flames originate? Don't be afraid to tell us," exclaimed Jane, holding fast to her wild fancy of fire.

"The flames? More than one flame! Yes! I fear you are right. More than one flame! And my heart without any insurance!"

What did he mean? Where were his wits? His fair companions were stricken with a new fear. This was sudden insanity. They exchanged meaning glances.

"Miserable me! I have betrayed myself," thought Mr. Pardoe. "Yet why not? No time like the present." The color rushed back to his ashen cheeks. A desperate resolve had seized him.

"Ladies, dear ladies, the distress under which you see me laboring is not—is not—"

"May Fontleroy," said Jane, with forced composure, "let us all three seat ourselves on this landing—Mr. Pardoe is seriously ill."

"Not on the landing," gasped the unhappy knight; "let us go as far as yonder alcove."

"I feel," continued Mr. Pardoe, after they had established themselves in the alcove, "I feel that I owe you an explanation—both of you—all of you."

"By no means, Mr. Pardoe; do not attempt it. Jane, will you wait here while I go for a glass of water?"

"May—Miss Fontleroy—stay! Listen to me. When I called you out of the parlor it was to get a pa-paper of pins."

"Yes, yes, Mr. Pardoe; do not exert yourself to speak. (You'd better steal off, Jane, and bring some sal volatile.)"

"A pa-paper of pins."

"Yes, we know; it was pins," replied Jane Liscom, who, on attempting to rise, was held to her seat by the firm grasp of Mr. Pardoe's hand.

"Pins," repeated he, as if determined to keep his ideas to the point, and afraid to diverge. "But pins are a small part of it. Girls, did you ever hear of a man who didn't know his own mind?"

"Yes, indeed, often and often," replied Jane, in an indulgent tone, while May fanned the supposed lunatic with vigor, having a dim idea that air might restore him to his senses.

"Didn't know his own mind," went on Mr. Pardoe, with a look of anguish, "nor any one else's mind either, for that matter; for I certainly don't. Girls, may I speak in a parable?"

"To be sure you may. But wait till you are easier. Don't try to talk now."

"A parable. Once upon a time there was a man who appeared to have the equated amount of brains; but there was one thing lacking: he didn't know his own mind."

"Yes, yes, we understand. Do you feel any air from this fan?"

"He hadn't the faculty of understanding what he wanted."

"No, I suppose not. (May, is there a doctor down stairs?)"

"He was always in love, but there never seemed to be any particular object in it."

"Oh no!"

"I mean to say he had no particular object to love. His heart wasn't hard; indeed it was quite too soft—as soft as wool—only you can't make any impression on wool, and his heart was impressed all over. And over again, as you may say."

May looked hard at Mr. Pardoe. He had grown comparatively calm. She began to see a little method in this madness.

"He couldn't see a beautiful lady without admiring her, and he couldn't admire her without saying so. And every time he said so he put the wrong words together and made a declaration of love."

Jane Liscom felt a stifling sensation, and laid her hand on her heart. "If this man were to be burnt at the stake, girls, and the fagots all ready, he couldn't point his finger to the lady of his choice if it would save his life. Choice! That's the thing that's left out of my composition. I can't make a choice."

"Mr. Pardoe, explain yourself, Sir." It was May who spoke with "majestical high scorn."

"Girls, I throw myself on your mercy. Remember what Dr. Johnson says. He says some excellent men can't fall in love—misapplied to me. I can, and do, and am."

"Mr. Pardoe, if you are suffering from aberration of intellect we pity you. If you have your senses, speak, and say what you mean."

"I mean that I would make—this man would make—the kindest and truest of husbands. Miss May, Miss Jane, I don't care which—if somebody would only be so good as to take him."

"How dare you insult us in this manner?" said Jane, her serene gray eyes fairly blazing with a blue light.

"Oh yes," returned Mr. Pardoe, wringing his hands. "I knew how it would be. You mock me. You can't have patience. If I could only make you understand what it is for a man to be too appreciative! Intellect, beauty, and grace. Three of you—I mean Adelaide too. I could love any one of you. Decide among you which it shall be."

The girls bent on him a withering glance and moved away. Mr. Pardoe looked at them imploringly.

"Don't pronounce too hastily. I am sure I shall never love another. It is one of you three or nobody. Go into the dressing-room with the pins; talk it over, and tell me your answer to-night."

No reply was deigned. If the girls had turned back they might have seen the "appreciative" lover bury his face in his hands in unmitigated despair.

Addie met them at the dressing-room door.

"May Fontleroy, where in this world have you been? I sent Frederick for some pins."

May threw herself on the bed, crushing her wreath of violets in the pillow.

"Oh, Addie Blythe, I couldn't come sooner. I've been receiving an offer of marriage."

"You absurd creature! Where are the pins?"

"Have you no curiosity, Addie? 'Can't you ask who the gentleman was?'"

Addie looked up carelessly, holding together the films of her cobweb dress.

"Whoever it may be," said she, "he has broken Jane Liscom's heart. She sits on the foot-board like a statue of grief."

"By no means," cried Miss Liscom, with a ghastly smile, "for I have received a proposal myself."

"From the same quarter too," pursued May, clapping her hands.

"Indeed," said Addie, "such a parade as you make over half an offer!"

"What would you say then to a third of one, my sweet child? Jane, I think we are authorized to tell her she 'comes in for her thirds.'"

"And while you sit there talking nonsense, girls, here is my dress."

"It is no nonsense, Addie. I always thought Frederick Pardoe was an idiot, and now he has come out and acknowledged it."

"Frederick Pardoe!"

"Yes; he has pursued me with attentions for three months; escape them I could not."

(Oh, May, May, did you ever try!)

Addie dropped into an easy-chair. This, then, was her faithful Frederick!

"Dear, dear," went on Miss Fontleroy, in light, mocking tones, "the times that man has talked to me under the stars of congenial spirits and connubial bliss! And the same to you, I suppose, Jane Liscom?"

"I am ashamed to repeat what the dastardly wretch has said to me," replied the high-minded Jane, longing in the depths of her soul to creep somewhere out of sight. She could conceal her mortification, but she could not make light of it like the high-spirited May.

"You don't need my help, girls, in bidding off the man at auction. I will withdraw my claim and go down stairs."

Suddenly there was a sob, then a laugh. Addie had thrown herself on the floor in a fit of wild hysterics.

"So he has been making love to all three of us! What a capital joke! And we never mistrusted it! Tell me, May, did he think we believed him?"

"Of course, dear; he considers us violently enamored. And he returns our affection in a threefold degree, for he is an 'appreciative man.'"

"How happy could he be with either, Were either dear charmer away!"

Two of us must take ourselves out of the way. He is too much of a gentleman, Addie, to make any choice. We must settle that trifling matter for him. Jane has withdrawn; it rests between you and me; which shall be the happy woman?"

"Oh, May, it is too absurd of you. As if I cared for that conceited creature!"

"Well done, Addie Blythe!" thought May, approvingly, "you have a little womanly pride as well as myself."

But she said aloud:

"Of course I was jesting, Addie. Any body would know us both better than that. I pity the woman who could be duped by such a fool."

"And I, too," responded poor little Addie, pouring her imaginary pity into her pocket-handkerchief. "May Fontleroy, how can I ride home with him after this insult?"

"It is too bad, Addie; but somebody must see him and finish the business, or we shall have it all to go over again."

"But, May, what shall I say? Tell me how."

"Why, say we tried to dispose of him at auction, but there wasn't a bid. Tell him to 'go forget us'—he may yet see three more who will fill our places."

"I wish you could do it, May; you could slash him into small pieces. But I shall do the best I can; I don't mean to leave enough letters to spell his name."

The homeward ride was an ordeal for Addie, though she never told precisely what was said. She entered the carriage with the dignity of an empress, feeling the utmost contempt for her chevalier, on her own account and in behalf of the other girls. But when she had told him so with all the fierceness of an angry dove, he was so humbled, so ashamed, that she was moved to pity him a little.

"Oh, Addie," said he, "I shall never hold up my head again!"

It was certainly hard for him. If one ordinary rejection is as much as a man can bear, what must it be to have three at a blow? Addie had fully intended to annihilate him, but she had spent all her powder at the first shot.

"Oh, Addie, I could bear the contempt of the other girls, but yours—"

Poor fellow! What could she do but turn comforter? The consequence was, as might have been predicted, that, in spite of her sternest resolves, she ended the matter by accepting her third of an "appreciative" heart.

"Oh, May and Jane!" said she, deprecatingly, when the girls shrugged their shoulders. "It was foreordained. If either of you had ridden home with him instead of me you would have done as I did—you would have pitied him so!"

Really the match was not a bad one—Mr. Pardoe's wife proving just as suitable for him as if he had "known his own mind." He has been a kind and faithful husband, for aught I know to the contrary. It is not recorded that he ever drew a comparison between the soft-hearted Addie who pitied, and the other girls who scorned him. We can only conjecture that there may have been regrets in his mind unexpressed; for we know "there is no cream like that which rises on spilled milk."

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

ALTHOUGH watering-places, and mountain hotels, and various fashionable country resorts are opened to the public in June, the "season" is not fully inaugurated until the midsummer heat becomes oppressive. Then there is a general rush to the Springs, to the sea-shore, to the Lakes—anywhere, out of the city. People labor under a delusion in taking it for granted that city life is necessarily uncomfortable in the summer, and that it must, of course, be always cool and delightful in the country. It is often very much the reverse. In a majority of cases home, wherever that may be, is the most comfortable place in uncomfortable weather. However, very few will believe this until they have passed through sundry experiences. Moreover, it is both amusing and improving to see life in the phases it assumes at our fashionable summer resorts. But the midsummer dissipation in which so many indulge is any thing but rest and refreshment. For any lengthy stay let the children and young folks, at least, go where they can have pure country air and freedom from fashionable restraint.

One great attraction at Saratoga this season is the New Congress Hall, which has been built on the site of the old Congress Hall, which was burned in the Spring of 1866. It has a frontage of four hundred feet, and is five stories high. The building contains six hundred sleeping-rooms and parlors, all of which are light and airy, looking out either on the street or grounds. The dining-room is an immense one—two hundred and sixty feet by forty-five; and when this and the hop-room are thrown into one a thousand persons can be seated. It is a curious fact that more than fifty miles of bell-wire have been laid in this hotel. The building is said to have cost about $550,000.

It is refreshing, in the midst of the warm season, to learn from New Orleans that they are making ice by steam from the water of the Mississippi. Hitherto the people of Louisiana have been dependent upon the North for their supply of ice, the demand for which is constant throughout the year. Now, the Louisiana Ice Company has been formed; and it is said that a very satisfactory article can be made, steam being the chief agency employed. The blocks of ice can be made about two and a half feet in dimensions each way. Whether this method of manufacturing ice will be successful enough to supply the market remains to be seen.

The latest thing advertised is a "complete system of Handkerchief Flirtation, printed in letters of gold, and warranted to please." It is probably based upon the Spanish system of "fan flirtation." The coquettish señoritas flutter their rich fans in the most extraordinary manner, and are said to convey the finest shades of meaning by various turns and evolutions.

An unfortunate old bachelor gives it as his opinion that the trails of ladies' dresses are infernal machines, from the fact that a blow-up took place directly after he put his feet on one.

A very remarkable instance of that rare optical phenomenon known as mirage occurred a few weeks ago at Batavia, which is about thirty-seven miles from the foot of Lake Erie. An eye-witness says that while admiring a golden sunset the waters of Lake Erie rose upon the vision in a mirage so perfect and brilliant that it was difficult to believe he was not in the region of enchantment. The phenomenon, in its full brilliancy, lasted about half an hour. It was also witnessed by several citizens of Buffalo. At one time eleven vessels were distinctly visible; even a steam-tug was seen, with steam issuing from the smoke-stack. The Buffalo gentlemen were naturally enthusiastic, and declared that they had never seen the lake of their pride exhibit itself in more natural habiliments.

Ingenuity in devising methods of killing rats must be nearly exhausted. A German journal recommends the following as very efficient. A piece of new or unused sponge is cut into small pieces, which are smeared with butter, and placed within reach of the rats, next to a dish of water. The rats eat the sponge, and becoming thirsty, drink the water, which swells the sponge, and in a short time kills the animals.

A young girl recently died in London under peculiar circumstances. A post-mortem examination was ordered, and the surgeon found a pin in the stomach, which had penetrated the liver. The pin had been swallowed about two years ago, and had caused fits and other disturbances, which resulted in death. Such cases are doubtless rare; but the habit of putting pins and needles in the mouth is both disagreeable and dangerous.

A true lady is easily recognized in public places by her neat and tasteful dress, by her quiet and unostentatious demeanor, and—if there is occasion for her to speak—by her gentle voice and choice language. A loud, harsh voice, and "slang phrases" coming from those who in other respects appear to have been well brought up, always jars unpleasantly upon the hearer. There is a long list of unauthorized words and phrases, which are in common use, and are supposed to give a certain zest to conversation, but which are very far from being elegant. They are coined in various places—in the boarding-school, in college, in the store, and in the street. One by one they enter the family circle, and become disagreeably common. A man who continually interlards his conversation with words which the dictionary ignores, does not, thereby, increase our regard for him; and when we hear a woman habitually using "slang," we can not but feel that she is wanting in that delicacy and refinement which are the brightest ornaments she can wear. Indeed, it is very certain that the frequent use of coarse and vulgar words begets a disagreeable condition of mind which may not be realized by the possessor, but which is very apparent to associates.

The following is given as one of the authorized regulations of the "city" of Boston in 1639: "No garment shall be made with short sleeves, whereby the nakedness of the arm may be discovered in the wearing thereof, and such as have garments already made with short sleeves shall not hereafter wear the same, unless they cover their arms to the wrists with linen or otherwise; and that hereafter no person whatever shall make any garment for women, or any of their sex, with sleeves more than half an ell wide in the widest part thereof, and so proportionable for bigger or smaller persons."

The use of sugar in the body—like that of starch and fat—is to protect the organized tissues, and to keep up the internal temperature. Its purpose is not to add to the substance and strength of the muscles, but to support the process of respiration. Breathing is a process of slow combustion, and sugar, starch, and fat are materials thrown on to the fire. The fire will burn—if we live—and unless we supply it with fuel it will take what it wants, first from any store of fat laid up within the body, and then from the tissues, which it would be better for it not to touch. If mere fat be added to the food than is necessary to keep up the temperature the excess is stored away in cells; and then we say the man is growing fat. In like manner an excess of sugar is converted into fat and stored away till wanted. In the process of digestion, sugar is formed within the body from the starch of potatoes, bread, peas, and other articles of our diet; but the facts just referred to may account for the almost universal taste for a little sugar in our daily drink. Hence we see that the instinctive fondness which children have for sugar may be indulged to advantage at proper times and in suitable quantities.

There is food for thought in the story that is told of a young lad, who for the first time accompanied his father to a public dinner. The waiter asked him, "What will you take to drink?" Hesitating for a moment, he replied, "I'll take what father takes." The answer reached his father's ear, and instantly the full responsibility of his position flashed upon him. Quicker than lightning various thoughts passed through his mind, and in a moment his decision was made; and in tones tremulous with emotion, and to the astonishment of those who knew him, he said, "Waiter, I'll take water."

Of all the callings by which women earn their bread few seem more ungrateful than that of dancing-girls. Yet the supply is always greater than the demand. How many have any conception of the training of a ballet-dancer? They are so graceful, so airy, so agile, that one can not refrain from fancying their training must be as easy and pleasant as their personal appearance. But the facts relating to their education give a very different impression. It is said that in Paris dancing-girls are taken in hand when they are seven years old. The first thing done is to place the feet in hollow wooden clamps or boxes, whose bottom and top are stoutly strapped together, and which are moved by straps, so as to bring the heels of the feet heel to heel, while the knees remain turned out. This is extremely painful under any circumstances; it is doubly painful when the feet are swollen and bruised as they almost always are. This exercise lasts half an hour. Then for another half hour the young girl is obliged to place first her left and then her right foot on a wooden bar, which is placed on a level line with her chin. Then she dances all the steps used in ballets. This series of exercises must be pursued and reviewed all day long, until exhausted nature sinks. It is said, after a lesson two hours long, without an instant's pause, Mlle. MARIE TAGLIONI fell half-dead on the floor of her chamber, and was undressed, sponged, and dressed, before she recovered consciousness. Her father, who gave her the lesson, stood by and made no other comment on the scene than to say, "She will be unusually brilliant to-night." A danseuse shines in her profession only by this assiduous exercise, which commences when she is seven years old and ends only with her retirement from the stage. If she ceases it for recreation she must afterward labor three times more than ever she did to regain her old suppleness and elasticity. And woe to her if idleness brings flesh! That flesh must be dissipated, for flesh is a dancing-girl's enemy—it will prove her death. Many strange, painful, and dangerous exercises are practiced by the danseuse to acquire the needful agility and lightness. And then when beauty fades, and the slender form loses its firm and delicate outline, her career is ended, and she loses the few hundreds a year for which she endured all these pains and perils.

Some time ago a singular story was told of an ingenious youth, who, while in prison at Paris, constructed a watch of straw, which would keep good time for several hours. Now we hear a more wonderful tale of an Austrian, imprisoned for several years past, who has made an astonishingly complete and accurate astronomical clock from the kneaded crumbs of his rye bread rations. It indicates the seconds, minutes, hours, days, and the months of the year. Yet every thing about it is made from bread-crums, excepting the dial hands, which are of wood, and the figures of the dial fashioned from fragments of straw obtained from the prisoner's pallet. Even the key used for its monthly winding is of rye crumb. The only instrument employed in making it was a wretched pocket-knife worth a few cents. The skillful workman having served out his time, is now turning an honest penny by exhibiting this marvel of skill.

THE FOURTH OF JULY IN TOMPKINS SQUARE, NEW YORK.—"THE SOGERS ARE COMING!"—[DRAWN BY WINSLOW HOMER.]

THE FOURTH OF JULY.

[CRUSTY OLD BACHELOR LOQUITUR.]

HUMPH! Independence-day, indeed!
That's just a bit of national slang.
A man can't tell if his soul is his own,
In this confounded him! bum! bang!

Hear Lumpkins' youngsters over the street!
Their racket alone would wake the dead.
But they're nice to the rest—the villainous imps!
With their fire-works aimed at a fellow's head!

Well for Liberty, wearing a flimsy cap,
Bullet nor powder can't injure that;
But where would Liberty's liberty be
If she waiked out to-day in my Sunday hat?

I wore it this morning—a pale pearl felt,
Cost six and a half, cash down. Who cared?
Wasn't it Independence-day?
George! how the idiots laughed and stared

When, maddened by racket, I tore it off,
And there on the sidewalk flung it down.
"It's spoiled. Do your worst!" I said. And then
They riddled the thing in rim and crown.

Who knew that the pistols were loaded? Not I.
(The outrage of boys having real shot and powder!)
Well, I rushed in the house—bareheaded, of course—
And ground my teeth as the din grew louder.

I try to sit at the window and smoke;
"Let's give him a light!" the rascals cry;
And before I can wink they have thrown it in—
A lighted pack—and aimed at my eye.

As for reading—by Jove! with this blasted firing,
This banging and crashing from breakfast till supper,
This ear-splitting, heart-breaking racket of rackets,
A man can't distinguish John Milton from Tupper.

As for sleeping—well, really, what's funny in that?
You may laugh, but I tried it—a very loafer—
And maybe I dreamed, and maybe I swore—
I can't recollect. Go ask the sofa.

There's a lock of hair in yonder grate;
This morning it lay in a perfumed casket.
I've treasured it long; but I've done with it now.
Her hand—Pooh! What a fool to ask it!

Fancy me now a married man, Sir,
Bothered like Lumpkins with all those—Heavens!
What's that? Ah, humph! These cannon
Have set my nerves at sixes and sevens.

Quite lucky. There's nobody hurt. I was fearful
Yon fat little Lumpkins had put out its eye.
The youngster has ways of its own that are winning
On all days of the year but the Fourth of July.

Why didn't I go out of town? Stuff and nonsense!
How could I, with steamboats and cars so packed,
So solid with traveling fools, that 'twere better
To sit here alone, though to madness racked?

Don't talk to me of "our glorious past."
Hang our forefathers! Hang "Declarations!"
We've wasted powder enough in their honor
To have started a hundred republican nations.

And whatever you do don't slander the facts
By christening this "Independence-day."
I tell you it's slavery—tyranny—yes, Sir,
Tyranny! (Hear them!) I mean what I say.

And yet if the girl whose hair I have carried
Had known when a fellow was really true;
In short, if, like Lumpkins, I'd ever married,
And, like Lumpkins, had had a youngster or two,

Like enough I'd have been no wiser than he—
Fed 'em Star-Spangled Banners and Eagle broth—
For, hang it, those stubborn old heroes were right,
And ours is the play, and theirs was the fight—
And much as I hate this outrageous din,
Those boys of mine (if boys they had been)
Should have banged with the rest on the pesky Fourth.

PETS.

THE rigorousness of that law which imposes upon men a desire to make unto themselves idols is as general as its manifestations are diverse. The necessity may be seen in a dozen examples, each differing from the other. One man elects to the post of chief favorite, his wife; another, his wealth; a third, his party; a fourth, art; a fifth, old china; in short, the exemplifications of the word Pet are as numerous as the meanings Corporal Nym attached to the word Humor. What alone seems universal is the tendency of all men to make a pet of something or other; to choose some object either in the animate or inanimate world for the purpose of lavishing thereon a great deal of superabundant affection. It is by no means necessary that the fondling thus elected be capable of reciprocating the tenderness expended upon it. Any body familiar with pets in their manifold range, from Skye-terriers to spoiled children, must have noticed a degree of peevishness and irascibility in the beloved one incompatible with the idea of lovability. In this light the derivation of the terms petty and pettish appear reasonable enough, as denoting the qualities which pets supply. But the absence of endearing attributes in the object selected for favoritism, far from proving inimical to the affection spent upon it, would seem to intensify that affection, importing into the case an element of self-sacrifice. Who is the usual pet of the pious, gentle, widowed mother of six; who, save the great, hulking, idle, irreverent member of the family? She has five dutiful sons and daughters who amble amiably along their appointed paths, but her darling is the wayward scamp who from birth has never proved aught but a heart-sore to his parents. And the course of all untrue love demonstrates the same perversion: the snubbed and blighted wooers are ever the most ardent; the worst-used patriots are most devoted to their country; the oft-whipped dog loves his master best; and there are enough ill-served faithful wives in the world to have called forth that cruel proverb about "a woman, a dog, and a walnut-tree"—three articles which are supposed to progress in worth according to the chastisement meted out unto them. On the whole, then, it would seem that the capacity of expending affection on our pets is strong in inverse proportion to the likelihood of a return.

THE HOUSEHOLD ANGEL.

By FITZ HUGH LUDLOW.

CHAPTER VII.

UTTERLY unused to the signs by which Derrick read her husband's case, Mrs. Kearney still knew that the latter drank again. She could not tell that his habitual energy and liveliness, so different from his old manner, betokened a system perpetually under the nervous strain of stimulus. She would have been likely to congratulate herself upon it as an evidence of radical improvement in his spirits, owing to a more active life and circumstances more favorable to the development of his self-reliance. She would have credited even his new-born fluency, and freedom from bashful awkwardness, to the healthy vigor of a renovated physique and the native fire of his intellect, had not those looks of playful inuendo, with which Derrick seemed to take her into his confidence, planted in her nature a suspiciousness foreign to it, and set her imagining liquor, whether justly or not, whenever Cuthbert's tongue ran more glibly than the average. But there were two things which she deemed unmistakable proofs of his drinking. She could smell his breath and scrutinize his eyes. Whenever he neglected to kill the odor of whisky, or seemed to shun her gaze, she was sure of him. At first she inflicted on him the penalty of her tears—a punishment almost too heavy for his heart to bear—so heavy, that many a time he quite gave way beneath it, and wept more bitterly than she, because, being a man's, his tears came harder than hers. But he always had a good excuse. He had drunk only as a medicine—he called her in bare justice to him to witness that he had not once been under the influence of liquor since the terrible day it must shame him to his latest hour to think of. And now—she knew his health required it—his very love for her made him take it; he could not do the work by which their own and Lily's living was made without it. These interviews would end by his kissing away the tears from her eyes, and their both, as she had said on that last October morning, trying to forget all about it.

Just at this period she committed what any wife who does it finds a most terrible mistake. Derrick's smile of innuendo had been peculiarly trying to her for several days, and her feverish state of mind was her excuse. She met Cuthbert at the gate as he came back one afternoon from Owlville, and, stretching forth her arms to clasp him with more than her usual empressement, said, "I'm so glad you came home early!" Then, lifting her lovely, dimpled face to his, and pouting her rosy lips into a bud, said, "Oh, kiss me, darling!" His whole heart adored her as it had in the youngest hours of their love, and he thrilled, whenever their lips met, to the deepest fibres of his nature as passionately as he had thrilled then. Seeing that sweet mouth challenge him, he clasped her tighter to his breast, and again and again with fervor pressed his lips to her own. In the midst of his dearest delight she drew herself, almost stepmotherly, away from his embrace, and, in a severe tone, said to him, "You've been drinking! I knew you had!"

Poor Cuthbert stood like one transfixed—a blush of intense shame tingling through him from head to foot—quite silent for a moment, with head hung down.

"And it was for that," he asked, in a voice of broken-hearted mortification, as soon as he could command words at all—"for that that you wanted to kiss me?"

But she answered nothing—relying, woman-like, on the one simple ground that she was right, because he had been drinking, and in that he was wrong. So they went silently up to the house—she, cherishing indignation against the man who loved her best on earth, who would have laid down his life for her; he, stung to the very quick, both of his pride and love, with the thought that the woman he so worshiped could betray him, even to herself, with a Judas kiss, tasting his lips to confound him, as a detective would try a still—and that he had been shamefully inveigled, by the very sacrament of conjugal love, to let out his heart's deepest intimacy of passion frankly as angels show it in the inmost heaven, only that she to whom he had confided all might make occasion and find warrant for contemptuously spurning him. For a moment it seemed as if his heart had never been so sore in all his life—never, even on that dreadful morning before he met his angel at "the Pool;" and, what was more terrible to him than any soreness of his own, he was indignant—burningly indignant—and he could not help it—with her—her whom he loved as he did love! It was many days before he could kiss her again without a heartache—and in that time, alas! he had been much away from home, and they seemed to have grown farther apart.

Another chastisement with which she punished his drinking was reproach; but oh! if tears could not succeed how vain words were! Much that she said was true; but being partly argument, and therefore no feminine weapon, was badly wielded. When she accused him she sometimes had the facts on her side; but not content with these, she must supply him motives and draw deductions, which, based on what a woman would have felt, done, or intended under similar circumstances, became erroneous when applied to the man's case. If aught on earth be bitter to a man, it is to have the woman whom he loves unjust to him, unless that injustice consists in being too merciful, when he usually bears it well. Poor Cuthbert writhed in agony on hearing her denounce him. For a while he could only writhe, and when at last he learned to answer back, the fear that he had said something to hurt her would keep him awake for a whole night. Oftentimes she was not right even as to her facts. At intervals all his manliness would rouse itself, and seek to shake off the incubus of a habit which he felt sure could never again disgrace him, but from which he yearned to free himself simply for freedom's sake. Repeatedly he went without touching the black bottle for three days—twice for a week—once during the early spring for a fortnight at a time. Seeking to replace the artificial gaiety which he had lost he forced himself to talk and act with an energy which was his own perpetual astonishment. It was terribly up-hill work; and looking back one week at the self which had worn this manner and done these things so easily he wondered how he could be the same man. Derrick saw the effort, studied it with philosophic curiosity as he would have looked at the transformation of a caterpillar, and, expert as he was in diagnosis, realized fully that his friend's fervor depended during these periods on no stimulants; but, if it ever occurred to him to tell Mrs. Kearney so, he neglected the opportunity until it was too late for her to be of any use as a minister of encouragement in the contest, and Cuthbert had gone back in despair. It happened that some occasion, during each one of these struggles, was the very one selected by the young wife for the severest of her admonitions; and when the poor broken-hearted fellow told her in an agony that he had not touched liquor for days, she inflicted on him the final torture by answering him in plain terms that he was intoxicated at that very moment, and she would not believe his asseveration if he went down before her on his knees. At last the terrible rack on which these two poor hearts stretched each other was tacitly folded up and put away—its ropes chopped and its screws burned—two dungeons, far apart and icy cold, with black bread and bitter water, being substituted for the acuter anguish. To abandon metaphor each let the other go his own several way, and referred no more to the terrible schism which was cleaving their lives, but brooded over it in secret, and over the memories of their happy poverty in that far century when Lily was a baby.

About the end of April Cuthbert was compelled to go to the further border of the adjoining county to attend to the re-leasing of one of the Dalmager estates. Derrick, who of late seemed to feel the warmest sympathy for the two young people, and had striven in many tactful ways to alleviate their suffering, proposed that Lily should go with her father, and made every preparation to insure her comfort on the trip. But at the last Mrs. Kearney, in a sudden caprice, withdrew her permission. Weeping bitterly and clinging to the little girl with an unintelligible fervor, which seemed as much like terror as maternal fondness, she sobbed out that Lily was all she had left on earth, that she could not let her go. Lily's eyes filled also, her heart had been set on this delightful week of her father's companionship; but she was more than an adult in her experience of self-sacrifice, and bravely as ever—braver than her father, who could not conceal his disappointment in his face—she bade him good-by, and after hearing the last sound of his carriage wheels ran out to weep and pray in her favorite hay-loft for the father and mother whose estrangement she had only too clearly seen.

This was Cuthbert's first protracted absence since matters had reached their worst. He had relied on Lily's society to make it tolerable, and deprived of her, every mile which he put between him and home made him feel more as if both God and man had deserted him. The black cloud settled thicker and thicker about his lonely carriage, and by the time he reached his destination he was in that mood of despair where self-oblivion seems the only condition of preserved sanity. Unfortunately for him at this juncture the people among whom he staid had the old-fashioned Southwestern notions of hospitality—and the gratification of a virtue which involved keeping a guest perpetually on the verge of intoxication was entirely consistent with their own interest in getting the estate from him on a lease which showed no favor to his principal.

On the morning of his return he awoke with intense chagrin to the discovery that he had let the property for three years longer than Derrick intended, upon terms at least a thousand per annum less remunerative than the arrangement which had just lapsed by time, and with nothing to show for the deficit but a week of uproarious suppers and reckless, insensible days—a cracking headache and trembling nerves in esse, and a dire series of confessions and recriminations in futuro. His nature sent up a bitter cry for oblivion than on the journey outward, and he scarcely left the carriage during all his way home, excepting at the half-way house, where he stopped for a single night to sleep, or the settlements at which he replenished the black bottle. Late upon the second evening his driver drew up once more at the gate of the Dalmager demesne, and getting down to open it, found Cuthbert fallen in a limp, inanimate tangle on the carriage floor, with his head upon the seat. Lacking Perro's tact, he went at once to the portico, and calling loudly for assistance, carried the unconscious man to bed in the presence of several of the family and with the knowledge of all.

It was long after midnight when he awoke. The transition, as often happens, was from the heaviest of stertorous slumbers, dreamless as death, into an intensity of vigilance, on which it seemed as if his wide, staring eyes could never close again. His forehead seemed hooped with hot iron; he was bedewed from head to foot with clammy perspiration, and consumed with intolerable thirst. All his faculties leaped out of their late long paralysis into a giant vigor; trooped into his consciousness, as into a terrible judgment hall, swift witnesses of ruin, clamorous to accuse him. He was in thick darkness without, though such horrible clarity reigned within him. For several minutes he could not imagine where he was—there was no candle, no open window to help him. A great terror choked his breath as he asked himself whether he could have died in his drunkenness, and if this could be a waking into hell. He leaped up; found that he was undressed; and as he went groping about in black space, began trying back for a solution of the mystery. Could he have stopped any where on the road home? Was this a farmer's house where he sometimes put up? All the days and nights of his absence were confusing themselves in his memory just as in thrusting forth his hand he struck a familiar object—a little wicker work-table of his wife's, and realized that he had got home.

"O God!" groaned the wretched man. "Brought home to her thus!" and in his agony he cowered to the floor. If he could only have died! Oh, why could not a merciful God have given him the reality when he had the semblance of death, and spared him this waking?

But death would not come. He lifted himself again, felt upon the mantle-piece till he found a match, lighted a candle, and, plunging his face into the water-pitcher, nearly drained it dry. He was all alone. They had not even ventured to trust his little girl with him; Lily's crib had been removed into another room, and his wife's place was vacant by his side. But he must have human companionship. He must see some living face, even if it wore nothing but reproach to him—any thing but being left alone with his own terrible, haggard visage in the glass. He would wake no one up. He would ask no one to speak to him. He would simply go and find his wife—his child, even Derrick, and crouch by the bedside without disturbing the sleeper until daybreak. He opened the chamber-door noiselessly and stole out into the hall. The lamp which hung over the stairs was out, but a faint glimmer came through the crack of the door at their foot which led into the saloon and had been left slightly ajar. Descending the staircase on tip-toe, his bare feet made no noise, he reached the door without so much as making a plank creak. Just as he was about to touch the knob a low murmur reached his ear. It was his wife's voice, and he involuntarily drew back; for it sounded as if it were still wet with recent tears, and he could not bear to start them afresh by his sorrowful apparition. Her words he could not hear—they seemed smothered as if she were speaking with a hidden face. Then a deeper voice answered her—a voice full of the richest, tenderest music. That voice he knew also—it was Derrick's, and, unlike hers, its words were audible.

"Darling, darling!" it said; "dearest, only love! Forget the great mistake of your life—forget your ignorant, inexperienced girlhood, tied with its eyes shut to that weak thing you called your husband. Remember only that you are free now—remember that you are the whole world to a man whose own you are forever."

Transfixed with horror Cuthbert caught the baluster that he might not fall, and through the crevice saw a sight which made Heaven's cruelty in waking him to consciousness up stairs seem tenderest mercy compared with the providence which had let him live till this moment. The Argand lamp, turned down to one small ray, showed Derrick seated on the sofa with Cuthbert's wife upon his lap, their arms twined round each other, and their lips meeting. Uttering one loud, exceeding bitter cry, the desolate husband, the betrayed friend, fell senseless on the stairs.

When he awoke again the broad daylight was streaming in above him, and Lily sat by his side. At his first movement of consciousness she was on the bed nestling her curls beside his cheek and clasping him round the neck, while she covered his face with kisses.

"Don't try to talk, darling papa!" said she. "You mustn't tire yourself or you'll get faint again. You were very sick in the night, and mamma and Uncle Derrick were up with you for a long, long time. Oh, I'm so glad you've got back! You were sick because you didn't have your little Lily with you; and they say you needn't go away any more, ever, without taking me along."

All the night's host of dreadful memories began rushing back on Cuthbert's brain; he groaned aloud in anguish, and nearly swooned again. Lily ran to get him a glass of water, and the sound of her feet brought Derrick from an adjoining room. He came softly to Cuthbert's bedside, and met his gaze of silent, reproachful agony without blenching.

"Kearney," said he, tenderly as a mother, "don't think of any thing that disturbs you—nobody will upbraid you—only treat yourself as a sick man, and put yourself entirely in our hands. I can tell you now safely that you have been very sick. I helped your wife put you to bed about ten o'clock. She went to lie down in the north spare room with Lily, and I threw myself on the lounge in the hall, to watch you, with my clothes on. I was pretty well worn, and finding you quiet, got into a dose. About two o'clock I was waked by a noise, and found you wandering down stairs in a wild delirium. It was all I could do to get you back to bed. Lord! I had no idea how strong you were—you fought me like a tiger! But at last I managed to put you to sleep again, and here you are—doing better than I had any reason to expect eight hours ago, I can tell you!"

Cuthbert passed his hand across his eyes, then raised himself up on one elbow, and sternly looked Derrick through and through. The Doctor's only answer was a quiet smile, and the question, "What now? Do you feel worse again?"

Cuthbert sank back bewildered. Could Derrick be telling the truth? Could he—with that wonderful face of self-possession, be lying? He gave his own eternal peace of mind no less than Derrick the benefit of the doubt, and answered faintly,

"I have had such a horrible—horrible dream! Where is—where is my wife?"

"She was so exhausted with last evening I did not waken her—she needed sleep almost as much as you," answered Derrick, with the faintest shadow of reproach in his tone. Then he gave Cuthbert an opiate, and went away to make his professional calls. The poor fellow almost immediately slept again, and did not waken till late in the afternoon. This time, when he opened his eyes, his wife, Lily, and Derrick were all beside him. His terrible suspicion still lingered; but his heart failed him utterly when he attempted to read his wife's face as he had Derrick's—partly because he felt that his soul would not be able to stand the verdict if he saw "guilty" written on that countenance, and partly because the moment he fixed his eyes on her she cried, "Oh, my poor, poor Cuthbert!" fell upon his neck, and wept as if her heart would break. He was utterly vanquished. It was a dream! Yes; thank God, it was! Once more he lay before her, the sinner not the accuser, and wiping away her tears poured forth entreaties for forgiveness.

When he got well enough to go out again nothing could exceed Derrick's kindness to him. Even when he had learned the worst of Cuthbert's late financial mismanagement he did not utter a word of blame. He made Cuthbert treat himself to a short vacation, and took charge of his own business in the interim. He sent the entire family out picnicking in the carriage for days together, and when Mrs. Kearney was compelled to stay indoors by a succession of sick-headaches, would not hear of Cuthbert's denying himself the fresh air, but got her an experienced nurse, and made him and Lily keep perpetual holiday like a pair of gipsies. Cuthbert once more struggled manfully against drink, and the heavenly hours which he and Lily enjoyed, making expeditions into every picturesque nook of that Eden of Kentucky, were things to be remembered a whole lifetime.

SONG.

CAN I wonder much if eyes
That have looked on me with pleasure
Grow indifferent, high, and strange,
Yield me not their smiling leisure?
No; it is the old sad way—
Flowers fading in a day.

But they, ere their dying, yield
So much beauty, so much sweetness,
We are well content to take
Frail delight of their completeness.
Briefest pleasure longest cheers,
Attar drops perfume for years.

Ah! but some shy bird will sing
Sadly, from the covert sedge,
For the violet of the spring—
Brightest on the wet wood edges;
And some heart look backward yet,
And light love bring long regret!

BRAZILIAN DIAMONDS.

THE true nature of the diamonds found in the Brazils was long unsuspected, and they were thrown away or used as counters for card-players; but when it got to be known the Government took forcible possession of the land where they were found, and declared the diamond-trade a monopoly and themselves the exclusive proprietors. The yield during the first fifty years was so enormous that it reduced the value of diamonds all over the world by one-half. It was the veritable Tom Tiddler's Ground. Mere gold was abandoned to the slaves as unworthy of attention. Children, after the rains, collected the grains of it which lay strewn over their path. The crops of all fowls killed were carefully examined, and often found to contain diamonds. (The Goose with the Golden Eggs would have been treated with scorn.) A negro once found a stone of five carats adhering to the roots of a cabbage he had plucked for dinner. Think of looking for a cabbage and finding five carots sticking to it! This excessive harvest of wealth has long ceased. The most productive district at the present time is that of Matto Grosso, in the vicinity of the town of Diamantina. When a slave finds a diamond of eighteen carats he receives his freedom, and is led, crowned with flowers, to the proprietor; while for smaller stones proportional rewards are given. Thefts, however, are very common; sometimes the slave, under the very eye of the overseer, conceals a stone in his hair, mouth, or ears—sometimes between his fingers or toes; and they have even been known to throw stones away, in the hope of finding them again after nightfall.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

DEBUTANTE.—One of the prettiest combinations for evening dress is white and green. A white tarlatan trimmed with ruffles of green tulle makes a beautiful trained dress. A short dancing dress of white muslin may be worn over a silk slip of Metternich green. We think it prettier, however, over white muslin skirts, trimmed with Valenciennes lace on the flounces, and quillings and bows of Metternich green ribbon.

BLANCHE.—Garlands of flowers worn as diadems, and over the chignon or just in front of it, are newer than small sprays set about among the frizzes and braids. The diadem has a large flower in the centre with graduated smaller ones on each side.

M. R. S.—Japanese parasols are entirely flat. They are not pretty, and it is not probable that they will meet with favor. The large pongee parasol is worn with suits.

INQUIRER.—The wide flounce around the skirt is promiscuously called the Spanish and the Marie Antoinette flounce. It is sometimes seen on all the breadths of a skirt but the front one, and again it is only on the front breadth. It may be either box-pleated or gathered. The box-pleats should be separated by a space of their own width. When gathered the ruffle should not be full, one-third its length over is sufficient fullness. The wide flounce is preferred now to three smaller ones. In silk and woolen goods it is cut bias. Care should be taken that it is true and exactly on the bias. In muslin the widths should be straight.

HARRY.—In writing to two sisters you should address the letter thus: The Misses Smith, and not: The Miss Smiths.

INQUIRER.—No bath, cold or hot, should ever be taken on a full stomach. Our doctor says nothing is more dangerous, and advises every one wanting to bathe to wait at least until three hours after his last meal. He, however, at the same time recommends every early morning bath, after the long fast of the night, to eat a bit of stale baker's bread half an hour or so before plunging into the cold water.

JOSEPHINE.—The Greek dress is pretty for a boy four years old—skirt of striped blue and white cashmere, pleated all round so as to alternate one blue pleat with one white one; or the whole skirt of white cashmere, with the pleats edged with blue silk braid; jacket of white cashmere, braided and edged with blue, short behind, and fastened at the throat with a single button; blue silk sash tied at the side over the jacket; and white felt hat, with low crown and narrow brim.

AUGUSTA.—You should not accept the book or any other present from Mr. —, under the circumstances. Upon reflection you must agree with us.

SARAH L. Jova.—Bouquet is spelled as we write it, and pronounced bokay; and there is no such word as boguet sounded bokay.

Mrs. M., San Francisco.—Ladies who are comme il faut do not any longer promenade Broadway with long trains. These they keep for the carriage and indoors.

STRANGER.—There is a law in England prohibiting marriage with a deceased husband's brother or wife's sister, but there is none such in this country.

ETIQUETTE.—No precedence should be given to the wife of a member of Congress, or to any woman, on the score merely of the official rank of her husband. In this country the age and relative degree of strangeness of the guest should govern the position given to the lady at the dinner-table, etc.

EUGENIE.—There are various dyes to give the hair the light color now in vogue. The only one our doctor cares to divulge is this, which is harmless:

Common white wine..... 1 pint.
Turkey rhubarb..... 4 ounces.
Boil down to one half and filter.

The hair must be well moistened with this, and then allowed to dry.

TEMPERANCE.—The coldest iced water can be drunk in the hottest weather without the least danger, if swallowed slowly by single mouthfuls.

BUZZARD ROOST.—As we have repeatedly stated, we furnish no patterns outside those contained in the Supplement. We have already published several shirt patterns.

In the window of WHEELER & WILSON, No. 625 Broadway, may be seen their Paris Gold Medal; an illustration of the Exposition at Paris; their No. 1 and No. 300,000 Sewing Machine (the former having been in constant use fifteen years); their new Button-hole Attachment, for families and manufacturers, making one thousand button-holes a day; their new and noiseless machine, and a miniature working model, fac simile of WHEELER & WILSON's Machine, complete in every part, with case of elaborately carved tortoise-shell, which was one of the mechanical gems at the Paris Exposition.—[Mail.]

BURNETT'S COCAINE is one of the most excellent and beautifying hair preparations to be found in this or any other country.—Charleston Mercury.

AT THE EXPLOSION

In the Bowery,
On the evening of the 18th,
Those fearful scenes,
The mangled bodies,
The scalded, quivering victims,
Pleading for help, relief—
Some begging to die,
To escape the dreadful agony—
Brought to my mind forcibly
My own condition
A few months ago.
I was at work in a brewery,
A tub of boiling liquid
Above my head;
I was in the act of removing it
When it partially upset,
And the large sleeve
About my right arm
Was filled with the hot juice.
I called for help;
It took a full minute
Before assistance came.

I had to hold the tub, or have my whole body scalded if I relaxed my grasp. But that minute seemed an hour. I supposed my arm was ruined for life. The fearful agony I suffered no mortal tongue can describe.

My physician who was called in ordered a pint bottle of WOLCOTT'S PAIN PAINT. My whole arm, although cooked, was soothed and kept constantly wet with Paint for two hours. I was relieved of all my pain in less than 20 minutes. The circulation continued perfect. Not even a blister. It seemed a miracle. The evaporating quality of the Pain Paint kept the whole limb perfectly cool, and the very next day I resumed my business as usual. The only difficulty experienced after the first day was in removing my clothing. Knowing that the late disaster in the Bowery has produced at least a score of mangled or scalded limbs and bodies, I would most earnestly recommend Wolcott's Pain Paint as the most cooling, most efficient remedy that can be used. I know it will give relief at the very first application; and continuing its use freely, by keeping the wounds constantly wet, heal and cure those who would otherwise die or be crippled for life. ONE WHO KNOWS THE VALUE OF PAIN PAINT.

THE GREAT NEW ENGLAND REMEDY.

DR. J. W. POLAND'S WHITE PINE COMPOUND Is now offered to the afflicted throughout the country, after having been proved by the test of twelve years in the New England States, where its merits have become as well known as the tree from which, in part, it derives its virtues.

THE WHITE PINE COMPOUND CURES Sore Throat, Colds, Coughs, Diphtheria, Bronchitis, Spitting of Blood, and Pulmonary Affections generally. It is a remarkable Remedy for Kidney Complaints.

This medicine is free from any thing deleterious, pleasant to the taste, safe, yet sure and effective in its action.

From the Boston Journal.

BOSTON, January 20, 1866. POLAND'S WHITE PINE COMPOUND.—After having given it a thorough trial, we can confidently recommend Poland's White Pine Compound as a very valuable article for the cure of colds, coughs, and pulmonary complaints generally. In several cases we have known it to give prompt relief when all other remedies which had been tried had failed. It is an article which, in a climate so promotive of sudden and severe colds as is that of New England, ought to be in every family; and we are sure that those who once obtain it and give it a fair trial will not thereafter be willing to be without it.

A VALUABLE MEDICINE.—Dr. Poland's White Pine Compound, advertised in our columns, is a successful attempt to combine and apply the medicinal virtues of the White Pine bark. It has been thoroughly tested by people in this city and vicinity, and the proprietor has testimonials to its value from persons well known to our citizens. We recommend its trial in all those cases of disease to which it is adapted. It is for sale by all our druggists.—Independent.

The White Pine Compound is now sold in every part of the United States and British Provinces.

LOVE OR MARRIAGE? A Novel. By WILLIAM BLACK. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

An interesting plot, honest, earnest thought, and graceful language.—London Review. The composition of a cultivated mind; it is full of thought, of careful writing, of pithy, of pungent, of epigrammatical remarks, and it is eloquent in suggestiveness.—London Leader. The tale is simple enough, but well told, and in that lies its chief charm.—Athenaeum. This novel is one of great power... It is certainly the production of an imagination—we may almost say of a genius—which we should conceive fully capable of works of art that might live.—Spectator.

FACETIE.

MARK TWAIN says that when women frame the laws, the first thing they do will be to enact:

1. That all men should be at home by ten p.m., without fail.
 2. That married men should bestow considerable attention on their own wives.
 3. That it should be a hanging offense to sell whisky in saloons, and that fine and disfranchisement should follow drinking it in such places.
 4. That the smoking of cigars to excess should be forbidden, and the smoking of pipes utterly abolished.
 5. That the wife should have a little of her own property when she married a man who hadn't any.
- "Such tyranny as this," says Mark, "we could never stand. Our free souls could never endure such degrading thralldom. Women, go your way. Seek not to beguile us of our imperial privileges. Content yourselves with your little feminine trifles—your babies, your benevolent societies, and your knitting—and let your natural bosses do the voting. Stand back—you will be wanting to go to war next. We will let you teach school as much as you want to, and we will pay you half wages for it, too; but beware! we don't want you to crowd us too much."

A Yankee riding on a railroad was disposed to astonish the other passengers with tough stories. At last he mentioned that one of his neighbors owned an immense dairy, and made a million pounds of butter and a million pounds of cheese yearly. The Yankee perceiving that his veracity was in danger of being questioned, appealed to his friend:

"True, isn't it, Mr. —? I speak of Deacon Brown."

"Y-e-s," replied the friend, "that is, I know Deacon Brown, though I don't know as ever I heard precisely how many pounds of butter and cheese he makes a year; but I know he has twelve saw-mills that all go by buttermilk."

FRESH PEARS—Newly-married couples.

A MOVEMENT IN REAL ESTATE—An Earthquake.

A TUNE THAT EVERY ONE IS SEEKING—Fortune.

A gentleman was praising the beautiful hair of a lady, when one of those precocious little misses who always have a word to say remarked, "I guess my hair would look as well if I took as much care of it. Mamma never sleeps in her hair."

3.—THE RECEPTION.

A gentleman who greatly disliked the custom of giving fees to servants, provided himself with some farthings, and on leaving the next party he attended, presented one to the footman as he stood at the door. "I beg your pardon, Sir," said Johnny, "but you have made a mistake." "Oh no," said the gentleman, "I never give less!"

"Do you like Owen Meredith?" asked the poet of his rural friend. "I don't like owin' Meredith, or any other man," was the reply.

"Can you tell me how old the devil is?" asked an irreverent fellow of a clergyman. "My friend, you must keep your own family record," was the reply.

SANGUINARY REVOLUTION—Circulation of the blood.

MAXIMS FOR YOUNG LADIES.

Don't scream unless you are frightened.
A narrowness of waist shows a narrowness of mind. It is a fine silk that knows no turning.
The true test of a man's temper is to keep him waiting ten minutes for his dinner.
Never faint when you are alone. Always select some good opportunity—or young man. The more persons there are about you the more successful will be your fit. A woman should not only faint well but be above suspicion.
Dreams are the novels that we read when we are fast asleep.
Eyes are the electric telegraph of the heart, that will send a message any distance in a language only known to the two souls who correspond.

In Wisconsin, an Indian woman died recently at the age of 123. She left a son who is 97 years old.
The above "reminds us of a little story" lately narrated in our hearing of a gentleman who, in the course of his travels in the West, one day emerged from a neck of timber, and suddenly descried a country tavern, upon the porch of which sat one of the oldest white-haired men he had ever seen, and crying like a child. In answer to an inquiry as to the cause of his trouble he sobbed out that "his father had just licked him." Upon entering the bar-room the traveler discovered another and much older man behind the bar, whom he addressed: "You seem to have some trouble here, stranger. Your son informs me that you have whipped him." "Yes," rejoined the landlord, excitedly: "I could not avoid it. The young rascal was chasing his grandfather round a ten-acre lot, and stoning him. I had to interfere, stranger."

Carriage Dresses.

See illustration on first page.

Fig. 1.—Dress of blue silk, with tablier simulated by a puffing of the same, edged with narrow black lace, which begins at the waist, and sloping on each side borders the entire bottom of the dress, excepting the front breadth. Two similar rows of puffing, separated by black lace, are set above this on the bottom of the skirt. A row of silk bows, composed of four loops without ends, are set down the middle of the front breadth, in the manner of buttons. Large carriage mantle, with full slashed sleeves, of black cashmere, lined with rose-colored silk, and trimmed with gold fringe and galloon. Black lace bonnet, with gilt diadem, and red rose and leaves at the side.

Fig. 2.—Dress of changeable silk (gorge de pigeon), trimmed with a box-pleated flounce. Black lace mantelet attached to the bonnet. Corsage half low, with white muslin chemise Russe. Sleeves tight, trimmed with three silk folds. Belt edged with a bias fold of silk. Half long gloves of peau de Suède; changeable silk parasol, to match the dress, lined with white gros de Naples, with wide changeable fringe.

THE LILY OF THE VALLEY.

THERE is not any weed but hath its shower,
There is not any pool but hath its star;
And black and muddy though the waters are,
We may not miss the glory of a flower,
And winter moons will give them magic power
To spin in cylinders of diamond spar;
And every thing hath beauty near and far,
And keepeth close and waiteth on its hour.
And I when I encounter on my road
A human soul that looketh black and grim,
Shall I more ceremonious be than God?
Shall I refuse to watch one hour with him
Who once beside our deepest woe did bud
A patient watching flower about the brim?

SUMMER DRINKS.

THERE is nothing but water capable of satisfying the thirst. All other drinks, therefore, taken for this purpose, answer it only in proportion to the quantity of this fluid they may contain.

Water, if pure, may be drunk at all times and in almost any quantity with impunity. The manner of drinking it, however, is a matter of no little importance. If gulped down in large quantities it may, by suddenly filling the stomach, so distend it as to produce a pressure not only painful, but subversive of the functions of that and of other internal organs. If, moreover, the water thus swallowed be excessively cold and the body unduly heated, a fatal shock may result from the instantaneous change of temperature. Thus cases are recorded of death from this cause. These, however, do not occur as often as was once supposed, and most of those fatal results before attributed to drinking cold water are now supposed to be owing to the joint effects of heat and fatigue, or to what is ordinarily termed a sun-stroke.

Water may be drunk in its coldest degree of temperature, and in the largest quantity the thirst may demand, by any person, whatever may be his state as to health or illness, heat or cold, provided it is swallowed gradually. By sipping not only is the desire for drink more thoroughly gratified, but all danger avoided.

Iced water, when properly drunk, is unquestionably the best of all summer drinks; but there are others which, if indulged in moderately, may be allowed. The ordinary soda-water—or water impregnated with carbonic acid gas—is a not unwholesome beverage, although it is often made so by the sirups, spirits, and other concoctions mixed with it. The various fruit sirups, if genuine, may, when well diluted with water, be safely taken. The sugar, however, they contain so abundantly, and which according to the chemists is a great heat-producer, makes them unfit for constant summer drinking. Science condemns the use, particularly in hot weather, of all the spirituous drinks, as brandy, gin, and whisky. These, according to some chemical philosophers, may be of advantage to those exposed to the severe cold of winter. Others deny that they can ever be useful, and assert that they always act upon the brain and nerves as direct poisons. Both, then, are agreed in condemning them as summer drinks. Liebig and his followers give this as the reason: Alcohol, the chief constituent of all spirituous drinks, is mainly composed of carbon, which is the fuel required by the body to keep up its animal heat. In summer, of course, but little of this fuel is required—much less than in winter. If, however, a large quantity is supplied there will be an excess, which is left unconsumed, and remaining in the body without use does harm in various ways. Drinking alcohol, therefore, which contains a great deal of carbon, in summer, is supplying the body with more of this fuel than it requires, and is in consequence a harmful practice.

The French wines, if stimulants are at all required, are the best, because they are the purest and the weakest. The American practice of putting lumps of ice into them, which so surprises all European connoisseurs, is not a bad one, for most of the foreign wines imported into this country are brandied to suit the supposed strength of head of our countrymen, and will largely bear dilution.

SWIMMING.

EVERY animal except man will, when first thrown into deep water, save itself from drowning by swimming. We rational beings, as we complacently term ourselves, though better supplied by nature than most inferior creatures with the means of keeping afloat, do not avail ourselves of them; but obstinately resist our instincts, sink gurgling to the bottom.

We must forsooth be taught to swim, and when we have submitted for a long time to some artificial process or other for the purpose, we discover at last that we were always swimmers from the beginning had we but known it. The timidity of man prevents this knowledge, and curiously enough forces him to resort to the teaching of art in order to acquaint himself with an endowment of nature. Swimming is instinctive, and there is no doubt that man would, if he were either more or less rational, avail himself of it at once, when the occasion required, without any previous study. If man were less rational he would trust like brute animals to instinct; if more, he would so master his fears as not to allow them to interfere with the exercise of his natural powers. In either case he would swim and not sink, as most self-termed rational beings persist in doing.

The whole art of swimming consists in getting rid of the excessive fear of deep water, and acquiring a consciousness of the natural power possessed by man of keeping afloat. A guide or teacher, though not absolutely necessary, will greatly facilitate the process. Most of the swimming-baths in Europe have instructors connected with them. These men try more or less to mystify their art by various pedantic contrivances; but their whole system, when shorn of its redundancies, is nothing more than this: The pupil is supported in the water not far below its surface, by means of a rope attached to a band around his waist. The neophyte, thus conscious of his safety, soon acquires sufficient confidence to avail himself of his instinctive power of floating. In regard to moving in the water he can not have a better guide than the frog, whose movements are exactly those which are best adapted to man, who in fact instinctively imitates them. With a rope, a waistband, and a strong arm, or a hook with a pulley attached to the roof of the bath, to sustain the weight, the most timid man, woman, or child will soon overcome all obstacles to being a swimmer.

Notwithstanding the facility of acquiring what people wrongly insist upon calling the art of swimming, and its obvious advantages, it is surprising how many there are who know nothing at all about it. The majority of men are unable to swim, and a female swimmer is almost as rare as a mermaid. Is it possible that some fastidious notion of delicacy has prevented the fair sex from acquiring the art of keeping themselves afloat in the water? Their lives in these days of travel are as much exposed to danger as those of men; and there is no argument which can be offered in favor of the utility of swimming to the one, which is not applicable to the other. Perhaps the female sex is relying upon the gallantry of the male as a security against drowning. Cold water, we would remind our gentle dames, is very apt to quench all the fire of chivalry, and to wash away all superfluous sentiment from the human heart and leave it in its naked selfishness. Learn to swim, and trust to your own skilled arms for safety, and not to the chivalrous interposition of your male friends. It is, moreover, exceedingly difficult even for the strongest and most skillful swimmer to save from drowning a person entirely unable to aid in his own rescue.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.Another Letter to a Bride.

MY DEAR LAURA,—I do not forget my promise, and yet I wonder how I shall fulfill it. You expect me to tell you in what way I think you can best secure the happiness of your new home, and I can almost see your face bright with mirth as you say to your husband, "Now let us see what this wise old Mr. Bachelor has to say upon the art of making marriage happy. He is an expert! He ought to know!" Ah! you blithe young bride, I can hear your laugh, as you speak, ringing out as merrily as the bobolinks I heard at Mrs. Margery Honeysuckle's last week.

But tell me, Laura, do you really suppose that I mean to make myself the target of your sweet shafts of satire? Do you really think that I shall allow you to say: "Poor old Mr. Bachelor! like all sagacious men of the world, he has one enormous weak spot, and any fool can touch it." Not that I imagine you think yourself or call yourself a fool; for I should have much less respect for you if I did. But I have heard you declare that every Achilles has his heel, and you have said to me, "Mr. Bachelor, where is yours?" as if you were determined to find it. Well, it isn't here, at any rate, although I perceive you think you have found it.

Do you observe that I am showing myself to be still more a man of the world, as it is called, than ever, and not in the most agreeable aspect? I seem to suspect the sincerity of your letter. You wrote to me with perfect frankness, to ask my advice, and I imply that you did it in badinage, and merely to expose an amiable weakness of mine as an entertainment for your young spouse; as if you would follow the customs of great weddings, where bees and birds were sacrificed, and sacrifice an old Bachelor upon your bridal altar! My dear Laura, I do not doubt you have sacrificed a great many!

I take your request as honestly as it was offered, and I will not reason from the depths of my inner consciousness, as the transcendental artist constructed his lion; but I will intrench myself in experience—not in my own, certainly, for I have none—but in my observation of that of others. If I can not tell you how to be happy with Louis, I can at least tell you how I remarked that Mrs. Margery succeeds in being happy with Honeysuckle. And the fundamental principle derived from long and patient study, my dear young bride, is this: that most great things are made up of many little things, as, for instance, to begin with a prodigious illustration, the planets of star dust, the globe of particles, sound of an infinite series of vibrations, and that cloud of countless drops. Of course there must be some organizing force, some law, some attraction—as cohesion or gravity. Do you see—for we are getting very learned for the honey-moon—the point at which I am now about to arrive? Here it is: married happiness is a glorious planet, or a perfect globe, or an endless music, or a summer cloud. It is an aggregation of little things, of particles, so to say, and there is one great organizing force, sometimes called love—and, whatever you call it, it is love, and nothing else. What, then, is the obvious rule that results from this principle? It is, to look out for the little things, or, as I said in an earlier letter, to boil the peas in your shoes instead of walking with them unboiled.

It seems to me, from much observation, that the secret of wedded bliss which is worthy the name is regard for the little things: the little words, the little acts, the little ways; and I am sure that this has been practically discovered by Mrs. Margery Honeysuckle. I saw in one morning that she knew the impossibility of two persons living together constantly in the most intimate personal relations without incessant care and forbearance. For instance, she is very fond of pretty colors, she has a marvelous taste in color, and the most extraordinary eye and sense of fitness that you ever fancied. I have known that woman to go down to New York to get a border for a new wall-paper, and when she found that she had lost the pattern, she was still able to carry the various delicate shades so perfectly in her mind that she could buy exactly the border she wanted, and it would be a marvel of felicitous matching. Very well: such a sensitiveness to color is to be respected. Such knowledge will make its own laws, and ought to be allowed to do it. Honeysuckle knows it. The good fellow is virtually color-blind. I grieve to say that I have known Roland Honeysuckle wear a bright blue cravat with a bright purple waistcoat. He is hapless and hopeless in regard to color.

Before he was married he was one morning attending the beautiful Helen of Troy to the wedding of the eldest Miss Priam, and he had bought a pair of gloves for the occasion which had seemed to him peculiarly suitable to a morning wedding, and as he sat opposite the beautiful Helen in the carriage, and pleasantly chatted, he drew on with care and success his new gloves. Occasionally, he said afterward, he saw his companion regard his hands with a curious glance, which, however, he tranquilly accepted as a natural homage to the extremely neat fit and dainty hue of the new gloves. Now, as you know, no taste is more exquisite, and no knowledge of what is comme il faut is more intuitive, than those of the beautiful Helen of Troy; and no solecism of dress or manner can escape her perception. So, as they came nearer to the church, and Honeysuckle seemed entirely satisfied with his extremely appropriate attire, which was a buff waistcoat, with a negligent blue tie around his neck, a dark morning coat, and white trousers, Helen of Troy said to him quietly, but with an arch sparkle in her eyes:

"Do you really prefer that color in gloves for a wedding?"

Poor Roland Honeysuckle says that, knowing his weakness, his knees would gladly have smote together had he permitted them, and he trembled to think what inexpiable crime against good taste and the fitness of things he was at that moment committing; but, with a weak smile, he asked, without looking at his gloves, which indeed would have been of no use:

"What color?"

"Bright grass-green," answered the beautiful Helen of Troy, and so radiantly laughed that Honeysuckle says he would willingly wear green gloves every day in the year if they would always occasion such heavenly laughter.

Now you may imagine that when such a good fellow, but undoubtedly not strong in color, married Margery, if he had persisted in wearing bright grass-green gloves upon all occasions, there would have been real annoyance to her; and at last seeing his unwillingness to recognize his own want of eye for color, and his disinclination to gratify her preference in so small a thing, Mrs. Margery could hardly have helped feeling that he was both unreasonable and selfish, and then—why then, any thing but wedded bliss. But Roland is the worthy mate of Margery. He told her the tale of Helen of Troy at some time after they were engaged, and after a good laugh over it he said to her:

"Remember, Margery, you are to match my cravats and gloves and waistcoats. I promise not to wear grass-green gloves if you'll only help me."

And he has kept his word. Grass-green gloves is a term very liberally interpreted in the Honeysuckle family. Mrs. Margery's green gloves are landscape gardening. She is a rural queen, but she does not know what kinds of trees are best to plant, nor where they should be planted, nor in what groups shrubs should be set out, nor how to produce by cutting out and filling in of evergreens and foliage precisely the beautiful effects which she wishes upon their lovely place. Do you suppose that she persists in wearing her green gloves? Do you suppose she tells the gardener to cut down this tree and to level that grove, and to put a bed of scarlet verbenas here and a cluster of rhododendron there? "By no means; by no manner of means," as my old friend, the Reverend Doctor Blunt, used to say. Mrs. Margery Honeysuckle is as worthy of her husband as he of her, and if she thinks that a certain tree is an impertinence, or that a grove somewhere would heighten the beauty of the grounds, she suggests it to Roland, and if he is opposed he shows her why he is so, and if she can not exactly see it as he does she knows that upon those points he is always right, and she yields to him just as he yields to her when he is fascinated with a particular cravat, and she tells him that he has not a single waistcoat with which it would agree.

My dear Laura, this is the whole secret. This is the rule derived from that prodigious fundamental principle of which I spoke, that all great things are aggregations of little things. It is the fact that the great happiness of married life is made up of a myriad little facts and compliances and surrenders upon both sides—in a word, wedded bliss consists in not insisting upon wearing your grass-green gloves at all hazards. I know that you are smiling as if you thought me hardly so wise as I probably think I am in supposing that the wearing of green gloves is a fair symbol of the trials of matrimony. It is very easy, you think, to agree upon wearing or not wearing gloves, to give up a particular cravat or waistcoat; but when it comes to subjects upon which there is a fair difference, not of taste but of temperament and judgment and character—ah, then, says my dear Mrs. Laura in her secret heart, my friend Mr. Bachelor will find that his green gloves will let all his fingers through. For instance, if a father and mother differ about the education of a child, which shall surrender?

Well, dear Laura, in that case begin as all good commanders do, by a parley. I can see very clearly that if there is a simple and sincere desire to do the best thing, and not merely a determination to have your own way, the solution is not very difficult. Mrs. Margery Honeysuckle is my example again; for although she and Roland differed about their boy Harold, Mrs. Margery saw that the experience of Roland was superior to hers, and he showed her that his view was the better one. Indeed, you have sense enough, my dear young bride, to know that two young people can not be housed together to live through every chance of life to the end without an infinite power of self-sacrifice and mutual consideration. Matrimony is an enormous compromise. That is the result of the observation of your old friend who has lived intimately in the family of his sister, Mrs. Smith, and has seen with sympathetic eyes the happiness of Margery Honeysuckle. Perfect courtesy, an incessant guard upon the temper that no irritability shall become a habit, the constant conviction that where two have equal authority, a harmonious decision can be always reached only by the utmost reasonableness; these are little amulets that will banish the evil spirits and keep your home serene.

Take these amulets. I can make you no wedding gift so perennially costly. They will be every year more precious. Take them, dear Laura, for they cost me nothing. I shall never need to wear them. May you and Louis wear them always!

Your true friend,
AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

LADIES' HAIR-DRESSING.

THE rumor of a probable return to smooth hair and small chignons has proved to be a fallacy. The front hair, in order to be stylish, must be profusely crêpéd, and chignons increase in size in the same ratio that bonnets decrease. A quantity of false hair arranged in a variety of ways has become an important item in a lady's outfit. The use of it is so universal that ladies no longer hesitate to acknowledge it. Besides, it is not without its advantages. It can be removed at night; whereas an abundant suit of natural hair is uncomfortable to sleep in; and hair-dressers say it is easier to arrange separate braids and switches that can be pinned on just where they are needed than one's own hair, which must all be gathered into one bunch.

False hair has advanced fifty per cent. in price within the last three months. Hair that will curl without heat, by the aid of water alone, is the most expensive, bringing five dollars an ounce. Water frizzes and long curls are made of this. Importers and dealers say there is scarcely any long hair in the market, and that it becomes more expensive every year. Ladies who have long braids are admonished to use them carefully. The handsomest braid shown was marked $100. It is very long, and of a beautiful brown color. By a new device short hair is mounted on long points, and arranged upon pliable cords in a way that gives the appearance of a long braid, and has not that stiff unwieldiness that has made stems of curled hair so objectionable. The braids thus made are smooth and even, and are of course much cheaper than those made of long hair—one of this kind at fifteen or eighteen dollars looking as well as a hundred-dollar braid.

Light hair is more expensive than dark, and is at present so much the fashion that a yellowish powder, like the pollen of flowers, is used to make dark hair a regular blonde color. A small box of this powder is sufficient for dressing the hair several times. The antique powder and diamond dust are not so much used as during the winter.

"BOILED" HAIR.

Frizzettes and braid puffs, over which chignons are arranged, are too warm and heavy for summer. A plan for dispensing with them and making a fine display of a small quantity of hair is called "boiling." The braid is plaited in innumerable tiny braids and put in a pot of boiling water. After it has been boiled for three or four hours it is dried by "baking" in an oven. When the small braids are taken out the hair will be crimped in the style now so fashionable, and the crimp will remain permanently, defying all moisture to make it limp. The crimps make the hair stand out so lightly that frizzettes are not needed. It is then loosely plaited in a large "three plait" to form the chignon, and after being wound into shape is held securely by an invisible net. Such chignons weigh only two and a half or three ounces, and may be readily put on without the aid of a hair-dresser. The process of boiling does not injure the braid. It requires to be done by an experienced person, and is expensive at first, but as it does away with the necessity of a hair-dresser on many occasions it is really economical.

HINTS ABOUT THE COIFFURE.

The most stylishly-arranged coiffures are those that appear to be dressed with the least care. This is, however, studied carelessness, and in it lies the perfection of the hair-dresser's art, requiring more painstaking than smooth folds and bandeaux. Long curls are only loosely curled at the ends and crimped. Chignons are loose and "fluffy," and puffs and frizzes are stuck about on the head in impossible places, where they never could have grown.

The chignon should be dressed close to the head, retaining something of the natural contour, instead of projecting from it as many ladies wear it, especially when puffs and frizzettes are used. The object seems to be to cover the whole head with the chignon, as it is worn very far forward, often quite to the front crimps, and falls over the back of the head down to the growth of the hair on the neck.

Crimped chignons in large plaits and puffs are in favor for dressy occasions. The front hair is crêpéd, and a long curl is worn over the left shoulder. A succession of thin rolls, forming a coil, are preferred for morning and traveling coiffures. The Grecian twist, surrounded by a heavy plait, has been in favor for a long while, and is still worn. A puffed centre, with a crimped braid, is also very pretty, and is easily arranged by the wearer.

A braided chignon of permanently-crimped hair is marked $45. It is without cushions or braid puffs, and is exceedingly light and stylish. The braid is thirty-five inches long, and will be valuable after the present style has gone out. Another, also of crimped hair, was braided in the centre with a row of puffs on the outer edge. As the hair is only twenty-two inches long, this chignon is sold at from $12 to $15.

AMAZON COIFFURE.

A full-dress coiffure, called the Amazon, is admired for summer wear. It is formed of several rows of short curls, about four inches long, attached to a foundation of net. The hair is exceedingly fine, and is not so heavy as the Grecian curls that are pulled out of curl by their own weight. On the crêpéd front hair is a diadem of hair, or of jewels, or it may be arranged in the Pompadour style over a cushion. Short water-curls are fastened behind the cushion, and fall forward on the forehead.

MARIE ANTOINETTE COIFFURE.

The Marie Antoinette style is just now considered the highest fashion. The large chignon is crimped and braided in an oblong shape, being narrow and reaching far forward and low on the neck. To make this chignon the hair has to be mounted on a square frame with a comb attached. It is impossible to arrange it properly with a braid in which the hair is gathered into a single point. The front hair is brushed upward from the forehead and temples over a roll. A bow or rosette made of hair with a jeweled centre or a small flower is placed on the top of the head. Two curls on each side under the back hair are worn falling forward.

TREATMENT OF THE HAIR.

Nothing beautifies the hair so much as the frequent use of a stiff brush. It gives a glossiness more natural than that obtained by the use of pomades, without the disagreeable oiliness. The magnetic hair-brush is said to be very soothing and cleansing to the scalp. An occasional shampooing and frequent brushing will keep the scalp of the head in good order. The fine comb increases scurf and dandruff. A preparation called Hirsutus, and a creamy liquid known as Japonica Juice are commended by experienced coiffeurs as the best dressing for the hair. They are put on with a soft brush, making the hair retain any position, and keeping it smooth and lustrous.

DYEING THE HAIR.

In answer to inquiries of our correspondents about dyeing the hair we have consulted the best authorities in the city, and learn that gray hair may be disguised to inky blackness, but that a good brown dye has never been obtained. Attempt to make the hair brown, and it becomes a greenish hue that renders the sham transparent at a glance. The process of dyeing the hair is very disagreeable, and ladies have been known to faint under it. It requires two or three hours to be well done. The head is dipped into what seems to be a great bowl of ink. But when properly done it is so perfect that experienced hair-dressers are not able to detect it. It requires, however, to be frequently submitted to the dyer, and a thorough dyeing about once in three months.

HEAD-DRESSES.

There is but little novelty in head-dresses, as the great quantity of natural hair used leaves but little room for them. Wreaths and trailing garlands are more fashionable for full dress than the sprays and tufts of last season, and instead of a stereotyped row of the same flowers forming a crown we have diadems made up of a variety of flowers, with fern leaves, metallic grasses, and golden-winged beetles and grasshoppers. Berries and fruit are also in vogue in Paris. One lovely wreath shown was of mother-of-pearl marguerites, with fern leaves and a long spray of dwarfed pink hyacinths. Price $28. Another was of forget-me-nots with a white camellia in the centre.

Bridal wreaths were shown us at prices varying from $10 to $30. One of white lilacs was marked $10. Another of jasmine and orange buds was $16. A third had sprays of lily-of-the-valley drooping on the forehead, with a branch of orange blossoms falling back over the chignon.

The Grande Duchesse head-dress is a coquettish little hat made of small flowers. It is worn on the left side, and is scarcely large enough to conceal the crêpés. A long wreath encircles the head and is entwined in the chignon, falling almost to the waist.

For simple evening dress sprays are used. Natural flowers are the best taste for home toilettes, but they soon fade and wither in the heated ball-room. The ingenious French stick them in quills filled with water to preserve their freshness.

For demi-toilette narrow bands of ribbon, or of satin, the prevailing color of the dress, are worn over the front hair with long streamers beneath the chignon. A pretty one shown us has two bands of blue satin with steel beads in the centre, and pendants on the edge over the brow. Another very simple is a band of inch-wide ribbon around the chignon, with a small rosette at the side. Black velvet studded with jet nail-heads is suitable for any dress. With a blue grenadine a band of white gros grain is worn. Large flat rosettes are placed far forward in the centre of the head, with one long streamer falling backward. A blue velvet coiffure made in this way was studded with white daisies.

For middle-aged ladies who object to dressing their hair in the elaborate styles, ribbon and flowers are mingled with lace barbes, and the tiny imported coiffures of Chantilly and point appliqué that are sold at such fabulous prices. Blonde lace in light patterns is preferred above all others for the hair. Real point is too heavy. Folds, and bars, and rosettes of satin, with a few small flowers, are arranged around the chignon, or brought slightly forward in front of it.

CAPS.

Small fancy caps for breakfast are eagerly adopted by newly married ladies, because they are universally becoming. They are made of muslin, with Valenciennes and guipure lace, interspersed with knots of ribbon. They are either square, or fanchons, or in the peasant shape, with a bag crown for the hair. When trimmed to match the white morning dress they are exceedingly pretty. Small muslin aprons trimmed en suite with the cap are worn with self-colored muslins.

For afternoon toilettes ladies more advanced wear scarf coiffures of lace fastened beneath the chignon. A velvet rosette is on the brow. These may be economically made of tulle, tucked and edged with real blonde. In the fanchonette shape a puffed cap with wide blonde scarfs is caught on the breast with a rose.

GENTLEMEN'S HAIR-DRESSING.

The styles for arranging gentlemen's hair change but seldom. In the present warm weather the penitentiary fashion of closely-shaved hair is very prevalent. Parting the hair in the middle and back of the head is no longer admired.

For information received we are indebted to the courtesy of Messrs. BRAITEAU; W. J. BARKER; WILLIAM DIBBLEE; Miss HAMILTON, and Madame FERRERO.

PERSONAL.

THE General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, at Chicago, brought together to a larger extent probably than has been witnessed hitherto at any similar assemblage the men of mark of that church. Among the bishops was Bishop THOMSON, who is described as a small, spare, intellectual-looking man, with white colorless face, and equally spotless collar and cravat. He is the most grave and reverent in his aspect of any of the college, and contrasts sharply with the rubicund and at times almost rollicking face of the greatest statesman and governor of them all—the massive Bishop AMES. His voice is light and thin, not sharp and piercing, but of low and conversational quality. His air is more scholarly than that of any member of the body, and one would think that he would prefer the shades of the literary monastery, to the tumult of the Episcopal throne. He is a very beautiful preacher, or rather a preacher of very beautiful sermons, a gift that beautiful preachers rarely possess. His nature is large, and even grand. Of widest sympathies, of noblest instincts, of happiest temper, of finest culture, of devout and even saintly spirit, he will be one of the best known and most popular bishops of the church. He should prepare his sermons for the press. They will shine in this department of sacred literature.

"NERO," the favorite dog of LOUIS NAPOLEON, has given his last yelp, and his funeral obsequies have been performed. A Paris letter says: "The great event of the day is the death of NERO, to whom funeral honors as a leading personage at the Tuileries have been accorded. Some may be puzzled to think who NERO was. He was only the Emperor's English setter. But that was a great deal. His whole life was passed in the presence of majesty. Secretaries and chamberlains, and other great functionaries, when they wished to break unpleasant news to Cæsar, used to place the missive containing it in the setter's mouth, and let him incur the responsibility of delivering it. He slept by his Imperial master's bed, lay at his feet while he worked, and followed him in his walks in the country. The Empress, it is said, was jealous of the confidential position of the dog, who was the only courtier in the palace that personal interest did not move to fawn and crouch before his master. NERO, peace to his ashes! sleeps in a corner of the reserved garden of the Tuileries. His likeness, both in a picture and a celebrated marble group by CARPEAUX, in which the Prince Imperial is the principal figure, will be handed down to posterity."

Mrs. GAINES, after passing half her life in a bitterly-contested litigation, has at last, by the Supreme Court of the United States, been declared to be the legal owner of the vast property in New Orleans to which she laid claim. In the very hour of her triumph, and secure beyond peradventure in possession, she becomes weary of her fortune, and publishes in the New Orleans papers the following offer of compromise:

"TO THE OCCUPANTS OF MY ESTATE.—After thirty-five years of litigation, which has terminated fully, finally, and in every particular, in my favor, by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, rendered in April, 1868, I now again, as in former years, reiterate my desire to compromise on liberal terms, and invite all those who feel disposed to take advantage of this, my last offer, to come forward and enter into a final settlement. The utility of any further opposition will appear obvious."

"MYRA CLARK GAINES.
"No. 196 CAMP STREET, June 13, 1868."

The style of woman of whom they make queens in the region of Abyssinia would scarcely be deemed to have that degree of culture which a pampered civilization demands of the leading lady in London, Paris, or Washington. It is said that the two Galla queens (from the country south of Abyssinia), WORKITE and MASTRAT, had a race to see which should be first to congratulate Sir ROBERT NAPIER, and narrowly escaped arriving at the same time, which would have been unfortunate, as they mutually hate each other. It is believed they formed but a poor opinion of British gallantry in love, but outwardly they professed great delight, giving and receiving various handsome presents. It is said they possess the true martial spirit, and go into battle, and handle spear, sword, and gun bravely; but usually they go about so muffled that their appearance is any thing but Amazonic. WORKITE kept herself closely wrapped and hidden during her stay, but MASTRAT boldly threw aside her rich royal robe of crimson, speckled with gold, and came out of her tent and before the soldiers, to have her photograph taken. Her complexion was very pale olive, fairer than that of many Europeans, and her expression—though the features were large and scarcely like those of THEODORA's widow, of the thorough-bred type—was queen-like and commanding. She looked capable of leading an army any where.

Among the many personal sketches of our new minister to England the following, by a correspondent of the Cincinnati Commercial, seems to hit about as near the mark as any we have seen: "His head and face are strong and intellectual down to the lip; the under-lip and chin are retreating, and decidedly irresolute and self-enjoying to me. I know that it is often a mistake to judge public men by these facial marks. Mr. JOHNSON has, besides, lost one eye; and while this does not make him at all unsightly, it gives a humorous suggestion of the arena to his face. His ears are large, like those of nearly all Senators. Politicians have habitually big ears. His head is solid and large, and the milk-white hairs hold fast to it, except around the temples. His eyesight is now very dim indeed. His life has been moderately successful in temporal things. He has a good farm, stock, a city residence, but scarcely ranks among rich men. There is no affectation about him. Perfectly at home over a dinner of roast beef and old port, old enough to fulfill a British idea of a statesman's age, and widely acquainted with the personnel of American and foreign public people for half a century, we send this most agreeable of our public men to England with the indorsement that he is more unlike Boston Common, and also more unlike a first family of Virginia than any type of man we possess."

—The Rev. HENRY WARD BEECHER is at his farm in Peekskill, taking in the necessary bodily fuel with which to run his intellectual locomotive during the next season. He says: "I wake at three o'clock in the morning, and after listening to the birds for ten minutes, go to sleep again and sleep until six. Whether I should emerge even then if it were not for the savory odor that begins to steal through my cottage, I can not tell. After breakfast there are so many things to be done first that I neglect them all. The morning is so fine, the young leaves are so gorgeous, the bloom on the orchards is so beautiful, the sounds and sights are so many and so winning, that I am apt to sit down on the veranda, for just a moment, and for just another, and for a series of them, until an hour goes by! Do not blame me! Do not laugh at such farming and such a farm! The soil overhead bears larger and better crops, for a sensible man, than does the soil under foot! There are blossoms in the clouds. There is fruit upon invisible trees, to those who know how to pluck it!"

—In the Brussels papers mention is made of a cheery old gentleman named VAN BLOCK, of Zele, in Belgium, who is 3 per cent. above par, having reached his 103d year. He has the use of all his faculties, and is not afflicted with any of the infirmities of old age. He belongs to an association of cross-bow shooters, and intends to go to Brussels in September to be present at a competition organized there for that time. The Feuille de Tournai also mentions that a widow lady, Madame GRAVIS-VINCENT has completed her hundredth year, as testified by her certificate of baptism, which that journal gives at full length.

—A Paris correspondent reports that the Empress EUGENIE has struck out of her invitation-list two American families, the young ladies belonging to which she considers as too eccentric in dress and manner to be received at Court. One of the young ladies in question, whose skating had been much remarked last winter by his Majesty, lately sent him his portrait executed by herself, with the following naïve inscription: "D'une amie à un ami."

—Mr. LONGFELLOW seems to be having a most excellent time in England. When he entered the Senate House at Cambridge, to be LL.D., he was received with a burst of acclamation. A London writer pronounces it to be the fact that no living English poet has half the circle of readers in England that Mr. LONGFELLOW has. He is published in green, in blue, in Russia, in cloth, in paper covers. He is gilt-edged, marble-edged, and plain; in types so large that Methuselah would not have wanted spectacles in deciphering him, and in pages where any thing less than a microscope would have been of little service. Every farmer's wife has a LONGFELLOW, if she has only a dozen books in her case. At the fairs in the villages LONGFELLOW lies in some form or other on the stalls. He is turned into Latin and into Greek. He is quoted in sermons and in lectures. The liking for Mr. LONGFELLOW's poems in England has something in it of a personal issue. The pathos of much of his writing has made the people think of him with affection. When they speak of him their faces soften.

—When General GRANT was on his way from West Point to Washington, and trying, at Jersey City, to catch the cars, one ardent admirer pressed through the crowd, rushed up to the warrior, and asked, "What do you think, General, of the present political prospect?" The General replied, "I don't think of it at all, at present; my principal object, just now, is to catch the train." And on he put, with the impetuosity and resoluteness of an old cavalry man.

—Mr. SYDNEY HOWARD GAY, formerly managing editor of the Tribune, has joined the editorial staff of the Chicago Tribune. Mr. G. is a gentleman of marked ability and culture, and will prove a valuable acquisition to the literary and social circles of the great railway and grain metropolis of the West.

—For the simple reason that MATILDA HERON has died of consumption over one thousand times—in "Camille"—comes, probably, the phrase, "dead as a Heron."

—The Roman Catholic Bishop of Montreal has addressed a pastoral to his diocese, remonstrating against "the prevailing extravagance of dress," which threatens the ruin of many families. If his lordship had, in a postscript, suggested that every family should take Harper's Bazar, and thus learn to cut and make their own garments, useful and ornamental, he would have recommended a more practical way of overcoming the evil.

—It is stated that JANE LIND, as the divine artiste was called by the Quakers, is coming to the United States this fall, accompanied by her husband, O. GOLDSMITH, and the children.

—The PRINCE OF WALES has just added to his other dignities that of President of the Royal Agricultural Society. In the way of oats his R. H. is said to have had large and diversified experience, having sown a large breadth of the sort called wild, of which he is now reaping a heavy crop.

—Mile. VANZINI (Mrs. VAN ZANDT), daughter of the magician BLITZ, has received a handsome offer from MAX MARETZKE, for an engagement to sing in opera for six months. This promising prima donna has been received with great enthusiasm at the Covent Garden Opera House, London, where she is now performing.

—AMELIA B. EDWARDS, one of the most popular of English novel writers, is described as tall, admirably built, fair-haired, with a head that gives assurance of rare intellectual ability, and a face whose lines show not only strong character, but thorough and charming femininity. She is now residing in the South of France, superintending the instruction of her two daughters.

—The wealthiest artist France has ever produced is GUSTAVE DORE, who is reported to be a veritable millionaire. Although yet a young man, he has earned more money than INGRES, DELAROCHE, and DAVID made together during their whole professional career. MEISSONNIER considers DORE a humbug; precisely what DORE thinks of MEISSONNIER.

Guipure Net Square.

This pattern has a very pretty effect and is easily worked. Work, first, the netted foundation over a mesh one-third of an inch in diameter. This counts twenty-five holes in length and breadth. Next work together the five outer rows of holes in point de toile and point d'esprit. In point de toile work also the middle figure, the centre of which is composed of four leaves in button-hole stitch. Then work in the remaining holes the small berries, and after these the raised leaves in point de reprise. The stems are worked like cord.

Braided Twine Door Mat.

This mat is very pretty, although composed of the most simple material, and we recommend it on account of the new and easy manner in which it is made. It consists of twine braided in the form of connected leaves, which are worked in rows. The accompanying illustrations show different stages of the work. Begin by laying the thread in a loop two and a half inches long at one end; hold this with the end between the thumb and forefinger of the left hand, and wind it with the thread as shown by Fig. 1, by which means a second loop is formed; then draw tightly the part designated by the letter a, which tightens the thread that was woven around the first loop, and ties the two loops together at one end. Draw the thread b till the second loop becomes of the same length as the first, and weave the thread through or around both loops in the manner shown by Fig. 2 till they are equally covered with thread as shown by Fig. 3. Then draw the end of the first loop through the second, which finishes a leaf. On the end of this work a second leaf in the same manner, beginning by drawing the working-thread into a new loop through the point of the first loop, winding this as shown by Fig. 3, forming a new loop, etc. In making the cover work, first, the perpendicular rows of leaves singly, and join them through the rows of leaves which lie between. This is done by working the last in a jagged line, fastening between every two leaves of the perpendicular rows of leaves. Draw the first loop of every new leaf through the interlaced ends of a leaf on the perpendicular rows by means of a strong crochet needle. The pointed row which borders the cover is now worked together around the row. The mat may, of course, be made four-cornered and of any size desired.

We remark, also, that this kind of work may be done in finer material; for instance, in silk cord or braid, and used for mats, tidies, etc.

NAMING OF JAPANESE CHILDREN.

WHEN an infant, either male or female, is about a month old, all its near relatives assemble to take it to the temple to be named.

It is not considered a feast time, although sake and sweetmeats are handed round. The child is borne in its mother's arms, while she is conveyed in a norimon, escorted by her friends. On arriving at the temple they stand before the family shrine, and the priest places his hand over the child's head, and calls it by the name which is to individualize it, and which corresponds with our Christian name.

The names of brothers and sisters bear a certain relation to each other, being distinguished by an affix; for instance, if the name of a brother be Yos-yero, the sister's name will be O-yosi, making use of the two first syllables, with the O to distinguish the sex.

The priests sometimes choose these names, because they are supposed to be learned in the knowledge of lucky and unlucky designations; at other times the name is selected by the parents. When a female child has been thus named, she is taken to her nearest kinsman, who gives her a shell filled with paint.

There is no religious sentiment connected with this ceremony of naming, which yet, in its outward form, bears a curious resemblance to our christening service. The family-name is added to the one conferred at the temple, exactly as among ourselves.

PARIS CORRESPONDENCE.

THE Grand Prize of Paris has been run, and the crowd present, perhaps, exceeded any thing ever before seen on such an occasion. The Earl was the victor, and Lord Hastings has, therefore, regained the immense sums which he had lost with the same horse at the London Derby, amounting, it is said, to over a million dollars. The noble Lord turned very pale during the last seconds of the race. It must be conceded that the stake was one to justify the emotion.

The Empress was present at the races; she was entirely in sky blue; foulard dress with tunic trimmed with fine guipure; Marie Antoinette fichu of point de Venise, edged with the same guipure, and knotted behind without coques, and white tulle bonnet, with large white feather falling behind.

The Duchess de Mouchy (the Princess Anna Murat) was also in blue; dress of blue silk, trimmed with point d'Alençon, lace set on square in front (en tablier), with silk bows down the centre, and wide-pleated flounce at the bottom, covered with lace, and surmounted with a ruche à la vielle; fichu entirely of point d'Alençon, with the ends crossed in front; white lace fanchon, very narrow, showing the whole chignon, with blue feather en aigrette—that is to say, falling over the forehead, and strings caught loosely on the corsage, with a blue rosette; gaiters like the dress, buttoned with pearls; and Marquise parasol covered with point d'Alençon. One of the queens of fashion, the beautiful Countess de Pourtales, was in pearl gray, with tunique abeille covered with ruches, and caught up over a skirt with seven small flounces, black lace Marie Antoinette mantelet, and black lace toquet, with very long strings, tied over the chignon of luxuriant blonde curls.

The greatest elegance was displayed in the equipages; among which the four-horse calèches en Daumont were especially remarkable. The Empress had magnificent light gray horses, with harness inlaid with silver, and jockeys in bright green, with silver epaulettes; no one ventured, therefore, to dress his jockeys in these colors. It must be said that, next to the equipage of the sovereign, the finest was that of a celebrity of the demi-monde, the richissimmo Madame Musard, whose diamonds are said to be worth millions; she was likewise drawn by four horses, with two jockeys in bright apple-green caps and jackets, and two powdered footmen seated behind the carriage. She was dressed in blue silk, with a black lace tunic caught up with peacock's feathers; her black lace bonnet was likewise adorned with peacock's plumage.

Madame Alexandre Dumas, filz, was in black, with a Chantilly lace bonnet and a large rose with trailing sprays at the side; her husband accompanied her in a simple little panier à salade.

Blue was the prevailing color, and almost all the dresses were profusely ornamented with lace. A few somewhat eccentric women wore low corsages with necklaces of pearls and even of diamonds.

Two beautiful young American ladies, who are soon to leave us—the Misses Beckwith—were greatly admired. They were also in blue with white muslin tunics trimmed with Valenciennes and toquets with white feathers. Another beautiful lady of the same country, Mrs. Post, wore a very stylish dress of white and maroon pékin, skirt with deep pleated flounces, and tunic of the same with large puff, and caught up en panier with a large bow and ends; and white straw-hat edged with black velvet, with a cluster of blue-bells and corn-poppies without leaves on the side. The new bonnets and toquets are trimmed with such an immense quantity of flowers that the ladies look as if they were carrying huge bouquets on their head.

The court is at Fontainebleau, where it will remain for about a month, until it is time for the Emperor to set out for Plombières. The Emperor and Empress live there in all the quiet of country life. There are no series of gayeties as at Compiègne. Intimate friends like the Duchess de Mouchy are alone admitted. The ministers come there almost every day to work with the Emperor. Fontainebleau being only an hour and a half from Paris, communication is very easy.

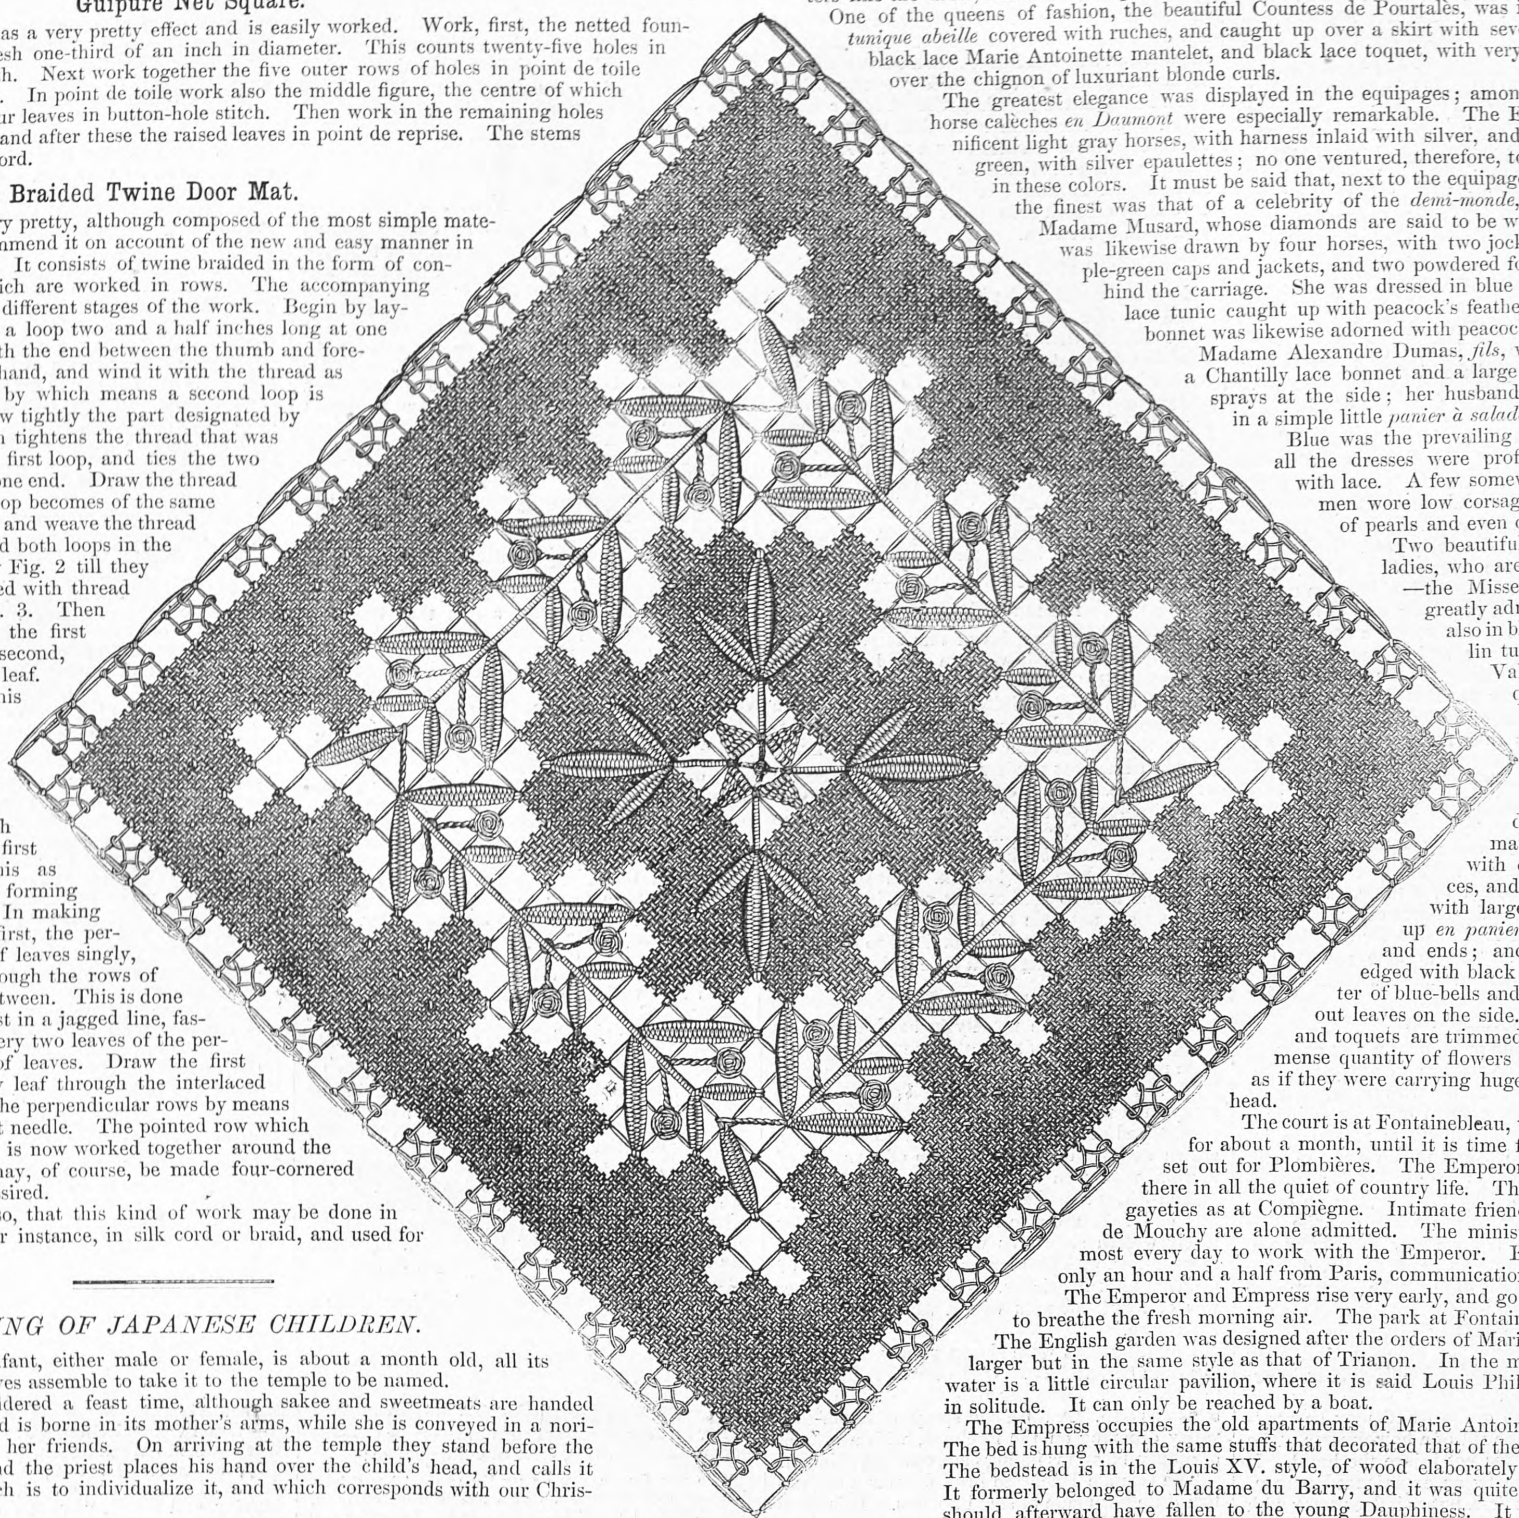

The Emperor and Empress rise very early, and go down into the park to breathe the fresh morning air. The park at Fontainebleau is a marvel. The English garden was designed after the orders of Marie Antoinette. It is larger but in the same style as that of Trianon. In the middle of a sheet of water is a little circular pavilion, where it is said Louis Philippe loved to work in solitude. It can only be reached by a boat.

The Empress occupies the old apartments of Marie Antoinette, in the castle. The bed is hung with the same stuffs that decorated that of the unfortunate queen. The bedstead is in the Louis XV. style, of wood elaborately carved and gilded. It formerly belonged to Madame du Barry, and it was quite astonishing that it should afterward have fallen to the young Dauphiness. It was canopied with white damask. When the city of Lyons presented Marie Antoinette with a chamber suit of lampas the queen caused her bed and room at Fontainebleau to be hung therewith. The lampas is sky-blue, brocaded and sprinkled with pink flowers. The room was dismantled in the time of the Revolution, and the draperies torn down and sold. Napoleon I. repurchased them, and the royal apartments to-day are furnished precisely as they were in the days of Marie Antoinette. On the bed is a couvre-pied of sky-blue lampas and pink flowers like the canopy. The bed is not entirely covered; the pillow is seen, trimmed with lace, and bearing an embroidered E surmounted with the imperial crown. The dressing-room, also furnished by Marie Antoinette, is wholly covered with mirrors, even overhead. At the places where the mirrors meet are painted little Cupids holding garlands of flowers.

The chamber of the Emperor is hung with violet velvet, sprinkled with golden bees. The Emperor's cabinet is the same in which Napoleon I. signed his abdication. The famous table is found there, marked with the knife-thrust which the impatient Emperor left on the mahogany as a testimony of his anger. There are also seen the mahogany consoles inlaid with wrought copper in the style of the First Emperor; and the little causeuse à dossier, high on one side and low on the other, which served as the couch of Napoleon I. It is on this causeuse that he is seated in the picture of Gros, with the King of Rome lying at his feet.

The favorite drawing-room of the court is the Chinese saloon, where are found all sorts of brilliant curiosities brought from the Celestial empire. The company assembles there for a moment before dinner, which takes place at half past seven, in the Diana Gallery. After dinner the Emperor often goes down to walk, and sometimes wanders into the part of the garden left open to the public. He smokes his cigar and talks to a few officers. The population of Fontainebleau, for the most part very elegant and stylish, regard the sovereign with respect mingled with warm sympathy. Every body at Fontainebleau considers himself in some sort as one of the Emperor's friends.

The society of the Faubourg St. Germain is saddened at this moment by two scandals happily very rare in the great world. Two young ladies, both greatly admired, and bearing historic names—Mesdames de G. B. and de M.—have suddenly quitted their husbands and families for motives which are not interpreted in their favor. In these stories are implicated the names of a young tenor and an elegant auditor in the Council of State. The affair is in every one's mouth.

A recent misfortune of another kind is the death of the only daughter of the Duke of La Rochefoucauld; a young girl, only twenty, with the brightest hopes for the future, possessed of every gift and every advantage; snatched away from all these in the course of a few hours.

ELIANE DE MARSY.

THE QUEEN OF TEN DAYS.

THE accompanying graphic illustration represents Lady Jane Grey, the ill-starred Queen whose reign lasted but ten short days, gazing from her prison window in the gloomy Tower of London at the body of her husband, just beheaded, and whom she was to follow immediately to the scaffold. "Oh! Guilford, Guilford!" cried the doomed woman as the cart passed under her window bearing the partially shrouded form, "the antepast is not so bitter that thou hast tasted, and which I shall soon taste, as to make my flesh tremble; it is nothing compared to the feast we shall partake this day in heaven."

There are few episodes in history so tragic as the fate of this ill-starred pair, who had greatness thrust upon them by the ambition of others, only that they might speedily pay the penalty with their lives. A parallel case is that of Maximilian and Carlotta; though the latter is even more painful, for while Lady Jane Grey and Guilford Dudley suffered together, or very nearly so, the Emperor of Mexico met his fate alone, and his unhappy consort suffers a living death, far worse than that shed by Mexican bullets.

Lady Jane Grey, unfortunately for her, was the great-grand-daughter of Henry VII. of England. Mary, the second daughter of that king, after being left a widow by Louis XII. of France, married Charles Brandon, Duke of Suffolk, by whom she had a daughter, who married Henry Grey, Marquis of Dorset. From this union sprung three daughters, the eldest of whom was Lady Jane Grey, who was born in 1537. At an early age she was distinguished for her talents, and under the tuition of the learned Roger Ascham had thoroughly mastered Latin, Greek, French, and Italian, and was conversant with Hebrew, Chaldee, and Arabic. In this enlightened nineteenth century a woman possessing such knowledge would be regarded as a marvel of erudition; but it may be new to some of our readers to know that such examples were not rare in the sixteenth century. At that epoch the lives of the nobility and gentry of England, with the exception of such as were employed in offices of the State or attached to Court, were chiefly passed on their estates, in a state of grandeur almost resembling petty princes; and while the young men devoted themselves to hunting and warlike exercises, the ladies occupied themselves both in their household cares and in the study of literature. A wide field lay open to them in the rich collection of books and manuscripts that were hoarded in the monasteries, and the learned doctors, poor in worldly gear, who were received into the houses of the great, and who instructed their children, found more willing pupils in the docile young girls than in the spirited youths, who regarded war as their sole ambition. Little distinction then existed between the education of the sexes, which was directed by masters alone, governesses being unknown.

At seventeen Lady Jane Grey married Lord Guilford Dudley, the son of the Duke of Northumberland, to whom she was fondly attached, and for a year the happy pair led a quiet, restful life, their last on earth, devoted to their books and each other. Then the sickly Edward VI., when he found his end approaching, was persuaded by the ambitious Duke of Northumberland to pass over his own sisters, Mary and Elizabeth, and bequeath to Lady Jane Grey and her husband the succession to the English throne. The King died, and Queen Jane was noisily proclaimed in the streets of London, while she was musing, unconscious of the new dignity, in Sion Hall. When the news was brought to her she fainted, and, on regaining her senses, refused the crown, which she said belonged to Mary. Her remonstrances were overruled, and she at last consented, and took leave of her books, her happiness, and her life.

In ten days the dream had vanished, the victorious Mary was crowned Queen, and Lady Jane Grey and her husband, with the Duke of Northumberland and the other leaders of the insurrection, were thrown into the Tower, where Northumberland suffered death, while his wretched victims were left to drag out a year of suffering. Wyatt's insurrection precipitated their fate, and on February 12, 1554, Lady Jane Grey and her husband met their doom. The sad story has been so often told and sung that it will scarce bear repetition; how Mary, rescinding the merciful sentence that condemned them to be executed together, ordered Lord Guilford Dudley to be beheaded alone, in the early morning, on Tower Hill, and his wife to suffer later in the day, within the walls of the Tower, in the fear that the doom of one so young and innocent might rouse the people to insurrection. What must have been the agony of the poor young Queen, after this brief taste of royalty, during the awful hours in which she awaited her fate, with the memory of the ghastly sight of her husband's headless trunk before her eyes! The account of her end is very touching. "She prayed fervently," says Hollingshed, "and then stood up and gave to Mistress Ellen, her maid, her gloves and handkerchief, and her book to Master Bridges, the Lieutenant's brother, and so untied her gown. The Lieutenant pressed to help her off with it; but she desired him to let her alone, and turned toward her two gentlewomen, who helped her off therewith, and with her other attire, and gave her a fair, white handkerchief to put about her eyes. Then the executioner knelt down and asked her forgiveness, which she gave most willingly. Then he willed her to stand upon the straw; which done, she saw the block; and then she said, 'I pray you dispatch me quickly.' Then she knelt down, saying, 'Will you take it off before I lay me down?' Whereunto the executioner answered, 'No, Madam.' Then tied she the handkerchief about her eyes, and, feeling for the block, she asked, 'Where is it? Where is it?' One of the standers-by guided her thereunto, and she laid down her head upon the block, and then stretched forth her body, and said, 'Lord, into thy hands I commend my spirit,' and so finished her life, her head being struck off by a single blow."

On the wall of the Beauchamp Prison Tower the single word Jane may still be seen, cut by the hand of the unfortunate Queen of Ten Days.

ORNAMENTAL LEATHER-WORK.

THIS work, which has been in high favor for some years past, is one of the most beautiful and useful varieties of ornamental fancy-work undertaken by ladies. By this art the closest imitations of carved wood may be produced, and the plainest and barest pieces of furniture may be converted into attractive and elegant articles for the parlor. Looking-glass and picture frames, tables, side-boards, brackets, hanging shelves, cornices for window-curtains, book-racks, etc., may be elaborately ornamented in durable and tasteful style, at a very trifling cost either of time or material.

In the various printed rules that have heretofore been given for making leather-work the beginner is required, first, to purchase a skin of thick leather, costing at this time probably six or eight dollars; then a thinner sort, worth perhaps two or three more. To these are added a formidable list of tools and brushes, for veining, moulding, varnishing, etc., which swells the amount at once to such a figure as to discourage an economical person from attempting the business.

In order to avoid this evil, and bring it within the most moderate means, we recommend the purchase of a bundle of scraps and cuttings from a saddler, and another from a book-binder. The leather employed in the trade of the former is thicker than that used by the latter, and both will be useful. Quite a large bundle of nice scraps may be had for twenty-five or fifty cents; and if some are unfit for use, the greater part will be just as good for this purpose as if cut from a new and perfect skin. As a general thing, use thick leather in preference to the thin skiver quality, and so that it be smooth and not coarse-grained, it matters not whether it be calf, horse, or sheep skin. Some of the most beautiful work is made from horse-skin, as the grain is so smooth.

Patterns of the leaves intended for your design may be copied from the natural leaves, and cut out of card-board, to be kept for future use in seasons when there are no natural ones at hand.

Lay the card-board pattern upon the leather, and mark around the edges with a black-lead pencil; then cut it out with a pen-knife or scissors, allowing a small portion for a stem. By laying the patterns closely together there need not be much waste of the material. See Fig. 1.

IVY LEAF.

When a number of leaves are cut out they may be steeped in water for a few moments, and then dried by pressing in a towel. A veining tool may now be used for making the veins, or a pair of sharp-pointed scissors will be a very good substitute, being held firmly with the points parted just enough to show parallel lines when drawn across the surface. Lay the leaf that is to be veined upon a table or board, the smooth side of the leather being up; then, fixing the scissors with points very slightly parted, draw them firmly down the centre of the leaf, forming a double line or vein, always remembering to start from the edge of the leaf and end at the stem, and to let the mark be deeper toward the stem, as is the case with the natural leaf. The side veins may be drawn in like manner from the outer edges toward the central vein, always causing them to curve gracefully, rather than form stiff straight lines. When this is done the proper shape is given to the leaf by holding it firmly with the thumb and forefinger of the left hand, by the base or stem, while with the same fingers of the right hand it is pulled into shape, the points or ends of the veins being pinched and curved to look as nearly as possible like the natural-shaped leaf. If the leather becomes dry before it is pulled into a satisfactory shape it may be dipped again into water, as nothing can be done with it when dry.

When finished they can be laid in the sun or near a fire until perfectly dry, when they will be found firm and stiff, and will retain the shape intended. Some directions given in books prescribe a coat of shellac to stiffen them still more, but we write from our own experience, and pronounce it altogether unnecessary if the leather is thick enough for the purpose we are considering.

Grapes may be made in several ways, but the best and firmest ones are formed by using either small marbles, bullets, grape-shot, or peas, and covering them with very thin leather, or, better still, old glove kid. Wet the gloves or leather thoroughly, and then draw it tightly around the mould; tie it firmly with strong thread, cutting off the superfluous edges, and leaving only enough to allow of its being tacked on to the wood. Do not let a seam of the glove or any worn or rough place come upon the top of a grape.

When enough are covered for a proper-sized cluster they may be tacked in the place intended with gimp tacks. Arrange them around in somewhat of an oval shape, the grapes being on the outward edge, and the tacks on the inside. When this row is on another inner one may be placed on in the same way, so as to entirely conceal the fastenings of the first row. This will almost fill up the space, and the remaining centre may be completed by gluing in enough grapes to fill it up, the ends, of course, being pressed downward into the glue, which should be thick. Liquid glue, such as is recommended by some, is not reliable when heavy and substantial work is aimed at; for, although it may hold them in place for a short time, yet they will not bear the brushing and dusting they are required to sustain, and nothing is more annoying than to find grapes, leaves, and flowers continually falling off, and exhibiting bare spaces in the midst of one's boasted specimens. By the use of an old-fashioned glue-pot and a few trusty tacks they will stand the test of years.

For stems, cut thin leather into strips, wet them, and roll carefully; and if a very stiff one be required, let a wire be rolled inside. The curling tendrils of the grape-vine are easily made by twining the wet stem (without wire) tightly around a stiff piece of wire or an awl, tying the ends so as to keep them in place until dry. For ornamenting the edges of a table or bracket there is no prettier design than vine leaves, grapes, and tendrils, and no flowers should be allowed to mingle with them, as the effect would be spoiled.

The size of the leaves and grapes should always agree. If the object to be embellished is small, let the whole be done in miniature, to correspond; but if a large article, such as a cornice for a window, is wanted, let the leaves and grapes be of the natural size, and distance will insure the proper effect.

In placing the ornaments upon the wooden surface to be covered, always lay the leaves, etc., on first, so as to calculate spaces and the quantity required; then tack them on, putting a tack first at the stem, and afterward in the corners, or wherever one seems to be needed for keeping it securely in place. Leave places for the clusters and sprays, and let the stems always be concealed by the overlying leaf or cluster.

When all are put on a coat of staining should be applied, to give it the color of walnut or rose-wood. For this purpose use Vandyke brown mixed in turpentine, or, if more convenient, black varnish, to be had at drug or paint stores, and thinned considerably with turpentine; apply with a soft brush, being careful to touch every crack, and the under portion of the leaves wherever they may be seen. If the table or bracket be made of white wood, it is better to give it a coat before beginning to put on the leather-work, lest a portion may escape the brush afterward, and be seen through the crevices. After the staining, a coat of copal varnish, or, if a high polish is required, two coats may be given to the whole, and thus the work will be completed.

Another pretty design may be formed with oak leaves and acorns, using natural acorns, and leaving the leather in its natural color, with no other heightening than is given by the varnish. This will represent very nearly the color of the oak leaves at the time the acorns are ripe.

Leather flowers are made in this manner: For a rose, cut two patterns as in Fig. 2, the dotted line showing the smaller one; then one or two smaller or larger ones, the sizes of all being regularly graded. When all are cut in leather take each piece separately, and having wet, and dried them in the towel, begin to roll the scalloped edges with the finger, turning the smooth side over all around. Then make a deep vein between the scallops to the centre, and a hole through the centre of each piece with an awl.

For the stamens, take a piece of leather shaped somewhat like the drawing, Fig. 3, and slit it with the scissors as shown. Wet it well, and take each little shred and roll it as well as you can with the finger and thumb, so as to give it a rounded look; then roll up the whole, with the smooth side out. This will furnish a bunch of stamens, which, for a rose, should be about half an inch long, with a stem two inches beyond. Now put the stem through the hole in the smallest piece, drawing the stamens down closely to meet it, and having the right side of the leather uppermost. Hold it firmly by the stem under the piece, and pinch and pull it into shape, so as to look as much as possible like five separate petals. Next thread the second-sized piece, and proceed to shape it also, afterward placing it close up under the first, so as to let the petals alternate, and not be piled one on top of the other. The whole are to be put on in this way, and, of course, the size and fullness of the flower can be regulated according to the taste and requirements of the artist. When all are in place they may be kept firm by threading a little round piece of leather wet with glue, which, when drawn up closely, will prevent their slipping down. The stamens should then be spread or crushed down, so as to fill up the centre, and, when dry, all will be stiff and firm. This method of inserting the stems will be found much better than any plan of putting them in after the flower is made, as they are not liable to loosen or come out, being held securely by the other parts of the flower.

Single roses can be produced by using only one or two layers of pieces, and when put on in bunches or groups they look well, and fill up spaces in less conspicuous parts.

Camellias are made in precisely the same way as roses, except that the central scalloped piece must be pinched up so as to inclose the stamens entirely, and of course the outside, in that instance, should be the smooth side of the leather. The pattern for a camellia given in the cut, Fig. 4, should have only four scallops, instead of five, as in the rose, and requires at least five layers of pieces to make it full enough.

Fig. 4.
CAMELLIA.

FUSCHIAS.—Nine stamens one inch long are called for in this flower, and the thinner leather will be best for these. The corolla of the flower is the purple centre, which is always seen folded around the stamens, the four outer red petals being the calyx. Fig. 5 shows the corolla pattern. Wet the leather corolla pieces when cut, and roll the edges slightly, as in the rose; then thread the stem, with stamens attached, through the hole in the centre, and fold the petals of the corolla around them as in the natural flower, letting the stamens extend well beyond. Of course the smooth side of the leather must be outward. Then cut the calyx as seen in Fig. 6.

Fig. 5.
FUSCHIA COROLLA.

While wet it may be moulded with a pin, such as is used for wax flowers (or a large-headed shawl-pin will answer as well). Thread the piece, and fold down firmly over the corolla, and then wrap a thread tightly around the top, so as to compress it, and at the same time form the little ball or knob at the top of the flower. Let this remain on until perfectly dry, when it can be removed.

Fig. 6.
CALYX.

For buds, make the points of the calyx fit closely together, and put a little glue inside to hold them; then cut off the stamens, so as not to let them appear.

For dahlias, Fig. 7 shows the pattern veined. Cut ten pieces, two of them about three inches in diameter, two half an inch less, and so on down to the centre one. After wetting them the edges of the scallops must be slightly rolled, as for a rose, and then the centres rolled up with the fingers, as shown in Fig. 8, thus forming quilled petals. A bunch of short, thick stamens, well crushed down, may form the centre, and the prepared pieces should then be threaded on, as in other double flowers, beginning with the smallest piece, and arranging them so as to alternate throughout.

Fig. 7.
DAHLIA.

As the backs of the leather flowers are never seen, it is hardly worth while to spend the time in finishing them so accurately. A little piece of leather and glue, at the base of the back, to hold it firm, will answer every useful purpose, and be entirely concealed when fixed in position on the object to be ornamented.

The convolvulus vine, with its leaves, buds, and flowers, is very pretty in leather. Cut a circle of the leather about the size of an old-fashioned copper cent, wet it thoroughly, and wipe with a towel; then use a bottle with a round-edged mouth, about the size of a large thimble. Place the piece of leather, right side up, over the centre of the bottle's mouth; hold it firm, and with a rounded stick, lead-pencil end, or some such thing, press the centre down into the bottle, at the same time curling the outside over the round edge until the shape is satisfactory. Make an awl-hole in the centre, and draw a stem through, leaving a short, thick bunch of stamens in the centre of the flower. Let it dry without any further handling.

To make a bud, cut the pattern for a fuchsia calyx; then cut a bunch of stamens with a stem, roll up the stamens, and thread the piece of leather, with smooth side down. Now fold the points up around the stamens, and twist them firmly around while the leather is wet; then put on the calyx (Fig. 9), and fasten with a touch of glue.

The leaves are heart-shaped, as in Fig. 10. For the jasmine (Fig. 14), a little bunch of stamens, very short, is drawn down into the centre of a star of leather, veined in the centre of each point, and pulled into graceful shape with the fingers (Fig. 13). But if the side is to show, a narrow strip of thin smooth leather of the proper length may be folded around the stem, which should have a wire passed through it. A small pointed calyx, similar to that of the convolvulus bud, can be put on last at the base of the tube, and fastened with glue.

Ivy leaves are very beautiful, and simple practice for a beginner; the natural leaves will afford the best patterns, both for shapes and veining, and, with the flower examples already given, there need be no difficulty in learning others from analogy.

In fastening the leaves and flowers upon the objects you intend to ornament, always endeavor to conceal the fastening as much as possible, using gimp tacks for the leaves, tendrils, etc. When a flower is to be put on, use a brad or nail without a head, and drive it down through the centre of the flower among the stamens; this plan will insure the most entire satisfaction and durability, as it will be impossible for dampness or other causes to loosen them from their places.

For a pair of brackets we would recommend that one should be ornamented with a design of oak leaves and acorns, and the other with ivy leaves and berries, or a convolvulus wreath. For cornices there is nothing more effective than grape leaves, clusters, and tendrils, and, if preferred, the whole design may be finished in black and gilt, the leaves being well varnished first with black japan, and, when dry, the grapes and tendrils first coated with shellac, then, when this is dry, with gold size, applied with a camel's-hair brush; then, when just dry enough to be sticky, the gold-leaf should be laid on with a gilder's tip. A coat of mastic varnish over all will preserve the gilding and give a fine polish.

A pretty effect may be given to a wreath of oak leaves by coloring it to represent autumnal tints. The colors are to be used sparingly, first painting with green, and then touching in with vermilion, and shading with sienna; either oil-colors in tubes, or powder-colors mixed with a little gum-arabic or white of egg, will answer.

Always endeavor to suit the size of your design to the dimensions of the article in hand. A grape design the size of nature would look very coarse on a small bracket or book-rack; so a neat and miniature design would be lost on a cornice, or other large or elevated piece of furniture.

THE SILVER TOKEN.

"THERE, Tina!"

Mr. Bruce Medway triumphantly held up two semicircles of silver in the air, so that they might be sure to make a sufficient impression on Ernestine Cady's blue eyes, and smiled with the exultant satisfaction of one who feels that he has accomplished his mission!

He was a bright, earnest-looking young fellow, with gray-brown eyes and a square, firm mouth—not handsome, but very manly; and as he sat there on the green wood-land bank, with the hair thrown back from his broad forehead, and the sunshine mirrored in his eyes, you felt instinctively that he was one who would make his way in the world, no matter what obstacles might intervene.

Ernestine Cady stood leaning against the gnarled, mossy trunk of an immense chestnut-tree, with her little feet half buried in plumes of nodding, fragrant ferns—a rural picture in blue muslin and fluttering azure ribbons. She was very pretty, with the delicate bloom and freshness of a flower—a flower that winds and frosts have never touched.

"Didn't I tell you I should do it, Tina?"

Ernestine took up the little file that lay on the bank.

"I thought it an impossible task with such an implement as that!"

"Nothing is impossible," returned Bruce, sentimentally, as he passed a bit of narrow blue ribbon through a hole in the broken piece of silver. "Will you let me tie it round your neck, Tina?"

"What for?" But she stooped her pretty head as she spoke, and let him tie the knot beneath a cataract of pale gold curls.

"And I shall wear the other next my heart. They are amulets, Tina—charms, if you choose so to phrase it! That silver piece carries my allegiance with it. Tina, if ever any cloud comes between us—if ever we are separated—"

"Bruce!"

"Such things have happened, dearest; but, nevertheless, in any event, this broken coin shall be a token and a summons to me, wherever I may be—whatever Fate may have in store. Don't look so grave, my little bluebird. Is it so very wrong to mingle a bit of romance in our everyday life? Where are your flowers?—it is time we were returning."

Through the green shifting shadows of the woods, with blood-red streams of sunset light rippling along at their feet, and delicious odors of moss and fern and hidden flowers rising up around, the two lovers walked homeward. Bruce Medway never forgot the brightness of that drowsy August afternoon.

"She will come—I am sure she will come!"

The dew lay like a rain of diamonds on grass and shrub, as Bruce walked up and down the little pathway by the hidden spring, watching the round red shield of the rising sun hanging above the eastern horizon. And then he looked at his watch.

"The train will be due in nine minutes. Surely Tina will not let me leave her without one reconciling word! If we could but live the last week over again! Hush! that must be her footstep on the moss."

He stepped forward, with a glad, flushed face, and then the chill whiteness of despair blanched every feature, as the bright-eyed little squirrel, whose tiny tread over leaves and acorn-cups had deceived him, glided swiftly across the belt of sunshine into emerald shadow. Bruce Medway stood an instant with his brow contracted, and his arms folded on his breast. Was he bidding farewell to the bright summer that was past?

And the shriek of the coming train sounded through the blue purity of the air, and the last, little faint sparkle of hope in the lover's breast died out.

Tina had not come—Tina had forgotten him. Well, so let it be!

And what was Tina Cady doing in the fresh morning brightness?

She was very rosy and pretty in her trim calico dress, with pink ribbons at her throat, and a pink verberna hanging low in her golden coils of hair—very picturesque as she reached up her hand to break off a spray of spicy honey-suckle.

"I wonder if Mr. Bruce Medway has come to his senses yet," thought Tina, with a toss of her head. "I shan't measure my actions by the rule and plummet of his lordly will, I can assure him. If I want to flirt with Pierce Marbury I shall do it!"

"So you're up, eh, Tina? And as fresh as a rose, I declare!"

Tina put her red lips up to kiss her bluff old father in an abstracted sort of way. She hardly saw him as he stood there.

"Oh, by-the-way, Tina, I forgot to give you this note last night—it was left by the hotel porter. Really, I believe my memory isn't quite as good as it was."

Tina caught the note from her father's hand, and broke it open in fevered haste.

"The train leaves at seven!" She saw the words as vividly as if they had been written in characters of jagged fire, and as she read them the old clock half-way up the wide, old-fashioned staircase struck eight.

It was too late—too late!

The sharp thrill of agony at her heart was succeeded by a passionate feeling of resentment.

"Let him go!" she said to herself, while the red pennons fluttered on her cheek. "I would not lift a finger to keep him here!"

So, when Bruce Medway's earnest appealing letter came a day or two afterward Ernestine folded it quietly within a blank envelope, without breaking the seal, and sent it back.

Verily women are strange enigmas, even to themselves! Ernestine herself could scarcely have told why she kept the broken silver coin—but she kept it.

The short threatening October day was drawing to a close; the fiery belt across the western sky was flaming sullenly athwart the skeleton woods, and shedding a sort of aureole round Ernestine Cady's slender figure as she hurried on through the yellow, rustling drifts of fallen leaves, carrying the heavy basket on her arm.

Just as pretty as the rosy Tina of two years since, but paler, graver, and more sedate. Trouble had besieged the family, since their migration to the grand domains of the Far West. Tina had learned the serious part of life's lesson, and she had learned it well.

She lifted the latch of the rudely constructed log-house and entered, with assumed cheerfulness on her face.

"How are you now, father?"

"Better, I think. Come to the fire, Tina—you must be cold!"

"Not a bit. Has mother come back?"

"No; it's very strange she stays so long. I suppose Mrs. Ebbetts has a great deal to say, though. I don't wonder your mother is glad to get away from a sick-room for a while."

He spoke a little bitterly, and Tina winced as she listened, knowing that her mother had made an excuse of some neighborly errand to dispose in the nearest village of such poor little odds and ends of gold chains, pins, and rings as yet remained to their diminished estate. Was there any thing wrong in this pious fraud? Tina almost felt as if there was!

It was not pleasant to be poor!

"She will be home soon, father," said Tina. "Only see what a basketful of cranberries I have gathered out in the swamps! This will make the barrelful, and Mr. Signet has promised to send it to New York with his. Don't they look like red jewels, father? And the money will buy you a new coat."

He smiled faintly.

"I think it had better buy my little girl a new dress. Shall I help you to pick them over?"

"I had rather do it by myself, father, and you must try to sleep a while."

Half an hour later Tina came through the room, with a scarlet shawl thrown over her head, and a wistful, scared look in her eyes.

"You are not going out again, my child?"

"Only up to the cranberry swamp, father; it isn't dark yet; I—I have lost something."

"A ribbon or a collar, I suppose," said Mr. Cady to himself, as he lay watching the crimson glare of the October sunset; while Tina, putting aside low tangled bushes, and searching bits of rank, swampy grass, was repeating to herself, in quick nervous words,

"How could I lose it? Oh, how could I be so careless!"

But the search was all in vain; and the chill twilight sent her home, dispirited and unsuccessful. And Ernestine Cady cried herself to sleep that night, just because she had lost the broken silver coin!

"You'll be sure to come, Mr. Medway? I want to introduce the successful author to my friends. You are to be my lion. You will come?"

"Yes, I will come, if you wish it!"

Bruce Medway went dreamily on his way, and Mrs. Lyman whispered to one of her fashionable friends that "she was quite sure Mr. Medway had been crossed in love—he was so deliciously melancholy!"

The table was superbly spread—Mrs. Lyman's dinners were always comme il faut—and, through the sparkle of cut glass and translucent glow of painted china, you saw baskets and épergnes and pyramidal bouquets of magnificent hot-house flowers. As one of the Beau Brummels of the day had said, "It was like looking at a beautiful picture to dine with Mrs. Lyman."

The dessert was in its first stages, when the pretty hostess leaned coaxingly across to Mr. Medway.

"Do try some of these little cranberry pâtés, Mr. Medway; I have just received a barrel of the most delightful cranberries from my dear old Uncle Signet, in Iowa."

Bruce was idly striking his fork into the little crimson circlets, quite unconscious of what he was eating.

"Yes, they are very nice," he said, mechanically. And then he bent down to see what bit of extraneous white element was glimmering through the ruby translucency.

Only a broken silver coin!

He took it out and looked at it, the familiar date and die, all unconscious of the buzz of voices and ring of idle laughter all round him—looked at it with a vague superstitious thrill stealing over all his nature—and he could almost hear his pulses beat under the soft pressure of the other half of this silver piece, for he still wore it next his heart!

"From Iowa, did you say, Mrs. Lyman?"

"From my uncle, Squire Signet, who lives in the Far West."

"What part of Iowa is it that—that produces such a harvest of cranberries?"

"Datersville, I believe, near the Owascas River."

And then the conversation branched off into some different channel. Bruce Medway had found out all that he wished to ascertain on that one occasion.

"A token and a summons to him, wherever he might be!" Bruce remembered the words he had spoken two years ago, and his loyal heart gave a great leap as the memory flooded it with warmth and brightness.

"Cranberries?—yes—I remember 'em," said old Squire Signet, biting the end of his cedar pencil. "Crop was uncommon good this fall; old Cady's darter brought 'em here to sell by the peck."

To sell! Bruce began for the first time to appreciate the tides of trouble that had eddied round the serene little islet of Ernestine's heart.

"Where do they live—Mr. Cady's family, I mean?"

"See that ar' old blasted pine down in the hollow? Well, just beyond there a road leads down past Cady's. Won't stop a little longer? Well, good-evenin', Squire!"

And Bruce Medway walked down through the orange twilight to where the skeleton arm of the blasted pine seemed to point to the light in a far-off window—walked to meet the dearest treasure of his heart!

Through the uncurtained panes he could see the tiny room all bright and ruddy with cheery fire-light; the slender drooping figure sitting alone on the hearth-stone with its golden shine of hair and the thoughtful bend of its neck. And he opened the door softly and went in.

"Tina!"

She put back her hair with both hands, and looked at him as if she fancied herself under the delusion of some spell.

"You summoned me, and I have come. Tina, my love, shall the old times return to us once more? Shall we be all the world to each other once again?"

It was full nine o'clock by the silver-studded time-piece of the stars before Bruce Medway rose to take his departure.

"But tell me one thing, Bruce," said Ernestine, laying her hand lightly on his, as they stood protracting their lover-like adieux on the doorstep in the frigid moonlight, "what did you mean when you said I had summoned you?"

He drew a little box from his breast-pocket, and smilingly held up a bit of silver.

"And I wear its mate close to my heart, Tina!"

"Bruce—surely that is not my half of the coin?"

"It was your half, Tina."

"And where did you find it?"

"One of these days I will tell you, dear—not in a very romantic juxtaposition, however. You remember what I said to you when we divided the silver piece between us?"

As if Tina had forgotten one word or syllable of those old days!

The iron hand of time has swept away all those tokens of bald syne now. Mr. Medway is a middle-aged, bald-headed member of society, and Mrs. Medway has white hairs mixed in the golden brightness of her braids; but she keeps the worn bit of silver and its sweet associations still, and believes most firmly in true-love and romance.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

THE Fourth of July forces every body to think about fire-works whether they will or not. It is wonderful what an immense amount of torpedoes, fire-crackers, rockets, Roman candles, fire-showers, and the like—to say nothing of complicated exhibition-pieces—are every year consumed in this country. The manufacture and sale of fire-works in America has quadrupled within the past ten years, and probably exceeds that in all the European States. It is said that the largest manufactories in the world are in the vicinity of New York city. In Williamsburg, Jersey City, and Greenville there are three great manufactories, whose agencies are located in New York—those of Mr. Hadfield, the Messrs. Edge, and Mr. Lilliendahl. Mr. Hadfield long ago gained great celebrity, and now carries on an immense business, which at present is chiefly confined to the production of general fire-works.

It is stated that for the present season his sale of torpedoes has been between seventy and eighty thousand boxes, each box containing one thousand separate pellets; and over twenty thousand boxes of fire-crackers, each box containing forty packages! How much these figures may be increased before Young America has exhausted all its patriotism on the glorious Fourth it is quite impossible to tell. The manufacture of exhibition-pieces is a specialty of the Messrs. Edge; and although these often appear to be exceedingly complicated, the principles upon which they are constructed are very simple. A visit to the laboratory where these fire novelties are made is exceedingly interesting and wonderful. The manufactory of Mr. Lilliendahl is also mostly devoted to the fabrication of stock exhibition-pieces.

A very touching incident recently occurred in a street car in Chicago. The car was crowded. Many were standing; among them an old man of perhaps seventy, whose appearance indicated great weariness. There were strong men sitting on either side; there were young men and boys; but no one offered the old man a seat. Presently a young and beautiful woman rose, and, with a winning smile, offered him her seat. He seemed bewildered, and refused; but she insisted with so much earnestness that he finally settled himself into her seat while she took the place where he had stood. This proceeding created such a sensation that the conductor pulled the bell and kindly inquired if any body wanted to get out. A fat old gentleman, whose eyesight was rather dim, deliberately took out his spectacles, and having wiped them carefully, put them on his nose, and said: "Wonderful! wonderful! wonderful!" No less than four gentlemen sprang from their seats at the same moment, and offered them to the lady; but she politely declined. After the lady had left the car one gentleman remarked that he had never seen the like in his life, and that in all probability she was insane. Another said she was no doubt a stranger in Chicago. The conductor was interrogated as to whether she was a frequent passenger in the cars. He replied that she was not—that nothing of the kind had ever before occurred in the course of his experience as a conductor. A youthful dandy, who had a seat next the lady, said, with a twirl of his mustache, that it was "an awkward position for a man to be placed in," but he has spent his time since the event in riding up and down in the same car, and has offered his seat to no less than fifty-four elderly gentlemen. He has likewise invoked the muses in a poetical effusion of seventy-two stanzas "to the beautiful young woman," which he proposes to publish.

If you propose going any where with a trunk this season be wise betimes, and get the strongest you can purchase, and have it well corded or strapped. Otherwise you may be overwhelmed with grief at the sight of your beautiful Saratoga smashed to splinters, and your delicate wardrobe crushed and ruined and exposed to the merciless gaze of a railroad station crowd. Baggage-men, expressmen, hackmen, and all who have any thing to do with a traveling trunk seem to take a horrible delight in throwing, dropping, dragging, and smashing in a general way every piece of baggage which has the misfortune to fall into their hands. All in vain your anxious looks, and even entreaties are useless, the banging sounds fall painfully upon your ear; and if by any unfortunate chance your last "love of a bonnet" is in the vicinity of your bottle of hair oil you may be sure they will come into most destructive contact.

An account is given in the Paris Figaro of a trick which is played on ladies by a certain shop-keeper. The sidewalk in front of the shop is narrow; suddenly the passing lady hears her dress tear—rip! rip! She does not know it, but those nails have been placed all along the street on purpose. At once a young shop-girl rushes out—pities the distressed lady, and offers to mend the tear if she will step in. She steps in, and while waiting they open twenty boxes—flowers—ribbons—bonnets. There is a great fuss made, while a voice keeps crying aloud: "Don't forget that Madame the Countess expects her head-dress this evening. Has any body carried her hat to the Princess?" In short, the victim is overwhelmed, the dress is sewed up, and she buys a bonnet.

In certain sections of England the authorities have decided, though somewhat unwillingly, that women have a right to vote. It appears that an act has been discovered for shortening the language used in acts of Parliament, which provides that, "in all acts, words importing the masculine gender shall be deemed and taken to include females, unless the contrary as to gender is expressly provided." It is asserted that in jurisprudence and in statute law, the word "man" means human being without reference to sex; and that the new act, in describing those to whom it gives the franchise, uses the words "any man," instead of "every male person." Therefore a claim has been made on this ground, and moreover the petition in favor of woman suffrage has received a large number of signatures, many of which are of ladies of high social position.

A sprightly journal discusses the grave question whether women shall be employed as telegraph operators, and comes to the conclusion that, inasmuch as women are employed on many lines and in considerable numbers; as these numbers are increasing; as it is notoriously difficult to drive women out of any business where they have ever effected a lodgment; as telegraph companies will employ women, and as it has been found impossible to persuade all the men practicing the profession to unite in a strike against the women—it is the best, on the whole, for men to give up the battle, and try to out women by working better than they do.

During this delightful summer weather croquet is flourishing in London, and pretty nearly every day there are parties in many of the London squares. The arrangements on these occasions are that the games go on from about four to seven in the afternoon, and that in the house of the giver of the entertainment light refreshments, such as tea, coffee, claret, strawberries and cream, ices, bread and butter, and cakes, are laid out in the dining-room, so that those who like may go in and partake of them. It is astonishing what a number of afternoon parties are given every day now in London. At some of them the guests are treated to a little good music, but most of them are mere receptions, where people are continually coming and going, with nothing but each other's society to amuse them, and only tea and ices by way of refreshments.

The Empress Eugénie had two interesting private audiences at the Tuileries, a few days previous to her trip to Rouen, one with Madame de Miramon, the widow of the General who was shot by Maximilian's side at Queretaro. The Empress's reception of the unfortunate lady was full of kindness and sympathy. When Madame de Miramon had left her, the Empress assigned her a pension of six thousand francs from her private purse. The Empress's next visitor was a very small one, a little Arab girl, named Aisha, who, during the late famine and horrible distress in Algeria, was found abandoned and dying of hunger on a road by a French lieutenant, who brought her to Paris, where she has been adopted by the young officer's family. Aisha has not only found a home, but has marched straight into the hearts of her new relations. The Empress had heard her story, and asked to see her; so she made her entry at the Tuileries, and the Empress was delighted with her. The child sang some little Arab songs, and before she left the palace had won a new protectress.

Writing is a curious art as practiced by the Hindoos. They may be often seen walking along their native streets writing a letter. An iron style and a palm leaf are the implements. In writing neither chair nor table is needed, the leaf being supported on the middle finger of the left hand and kept steady with the thumb and forefinger. The right hand does not, as with us, move along the surface, but, after finishing a few words, the writer fixes the point of the iron in the last letter, and pushes the leaf from right to left, so that he may finish the line. The characters are rendered legible by besmearing the leaf with an ink-like fluid. A letter is generally finished on a single leaf, which is then enveloped in a second, whereupon is the address.

DEATH OF RAPHAEL.—[SEE PAGE 602.]

THE DEATH OF RAPHAEL.

WE give on page 601 a fine illustration of the death of Raphael Sanzio, the world-renowned artist, which is best described by the graphic letter which an eye-witness of the scene, the Cardinal Bibbiena, the Papal Legate to France in the time of François I., wrote to his niece, Maria di Bibbiena, to whom Raphael was betrothed, immediately after the mournful event. Raphael died on Good Friday, April 7, 1520, at the early age of thirty-seven. By a somewhat singular coincidence, he was also born on Good Friday, March 28, 1483. In these few years he had filled Europe with marvels of painting, and won for himself undying fame. His most celebrated works are his cartoons and his marvelous Madonnas, chief among which ranks the Madonna di San Sisto, now in the Dresden Gallery.

"As I entered," says Cardinal Bibbiena, "he held in his hand a few spring flowers, which he let fall as I handed him the rosary. He pressed the cross to his lips, and whispered 'Maria.' His voice had a peculiar sound, clear, but so low as to be scarcely audible. In the sick-room I found Count Baldassare Castiglione, the good fathers Antonio and Domenico, the painter Giulio, and others. They had moved his couch to the window, which stood wide open. Was it the effect of the softening light or of the near triumph? Raphael had never appeared more beautiful. His complexion was more roseate, and his thoughtful, brown artist-eyes larger and more luminous than usual.

"I told him what his Holiness had requested me to say. 'And so, dear Raphael,' I concluded, 'may the sympathy which the highest as well as the lowest feels for you have power to keep you long with us!'

"He smiled sadly. 'You will! you must!' broke in Castiglione. 'Think what a longing for art your attainments have awakened in us. Think of your favorite plan to rebuild classical Rome, with its marble palaces and temples, its triumphal arches and picture-galleries!'

"Yes, I desired it," replied he; "and if God had granted me longer life I should have succeeded."

"Do you still speak," said I, with light reproach, "as if you would never recover?"

"Oh, father," said he, "the separation is not easy for me. If I could describe to you the longing which I have to retain the departing day! How my heart cherished the last ray of the sun that lingered on the hill! How beautiful is the world, how beautiful the faces of men! And now to take leave of them forever—to sleep without hope of seeing the morrow!"

"Beloved," said I, "do not forget that to-day the Saviour died, that we might throw off this mortal life and put on immortality."

"How could I forget Him from whom I have every thing?" he answered, softly. "But even this mortal life was beautiful."

"There was a moment's silence. Castiglione had taken Raphael's hand. Raphael was looking through the open window at the distant hills that were lit up with the soft glow of the setting sun. Then his glance wandered, evidently in the direction of his thoughts, to the blue heavens, where the evening-star looked down quietly like a messenger from the other world.

"I shall see Dante," he said, suddenly.

"At this moment one of those present took the cover from Raphael's last picture, which hung on the wall opposite the couch. It is, as you know, an altar-piece—the 'Transfiguration.' The sight of the immortal work, the dying master, the subject of the picture, and all the remembrances associated therewith, overpowered us, and we wept aloud.

"His features began to change quickly; he spoke still, but wearily and without connection, though in significant phrases. Twice we heard those words of Plato: 'Great is the hope and beautiful the prize!' He mentioned your name, too, and begged that you would lay your hand on his head. . . . The painter Giulio threw himself on the couch, and wept in agony. I asked the others to kneel with me and to pray for the dying.

"Once again Raphael revived, and, supported by two friends, arose and looked around with wide-open eyes. 'Whence comes the sunshine?' murmured he.

"Raphael," cried I, and extended both hands toward him, "do you recognize me?"

"For a moment it seemed as if he had not heard me, then he spoke again, and the holy calm of his expression, in spite of the death-struggle, bore testimony to his words, 'Happy. . . .'

"He did not speak again, but it was full night when a voice broke through the long stillness: 'Raphael is dead!'

FRUIT.

I THINK the morning is the best time for fruit; I am not quite sure, though. The afternoon is good. But I don't recommend fruit with the dew on it. Let the fruit get its own breakfast before you eat it yourself. It breakfasts on early sunshine and dew. It takes these good things in, and smiles upon itself and the world, just as you do half an hour after a pleasant breakfast. Eat it while it is in this humor, by no means in the raw and early morning; thus you have the young freshness and virgin flavor of the fruit. It has another character later in the day, when it is filled with sunshine; then, I think, it is sweeter. It does not express, perhaps, the same exquisite accuracy of characteristic flavor, but its capacity for richness is then at its fullest stretch. Its pulp is not less juicy, though it is more general than special in its character; and, moreover, it impresses you with a sense of the contrast between the dry, weary air of the day and the reserve of freshness latent in the hanging plum.

DOLORES DYING.

WHEN all these hours, oh love, of ours,
Their fragrant memories shedding,
Live only so—and into flowers,
Beneath your sombre treading,
Many a time my dust has burst,
Still some cheer round you spreading—
When at the end, your lips, athirst,
Old words are fondly shredding—
One spirit then o'er heaven's far wall
Shall wait the vital thrill,
Lean, lean to hear rise sphere o'er sphere
—Dear Heart, I love you still!

Though high the choirs should strike their lyres,
Though holy wings came flocking,
My song would lose its solemn fires,
My heart make heaven seem rocking,
Were I within the eternal gate,
And you without were knocking—
Nor could I for the angel wait,
But be myself unloving.
How may I know if it be you?
What makes me start and thrill?
Clear shall I hear from sphere o'er sphere
—Dear Heart, I love you still!

My own, be sure that you endure
Through all the years' besetting!
Oh Time, be powerless to allure;
Oh Fate, prevent forgetting!
Beneath your length of days, dear, keep
One tender, sweet regretting:
And sometimes let a wild pulse leap,
And all my way be setting,
So when the last breath leaves your lips,
I wait, I bend, I thrill,
Clear let me hear from sphere o'er sphere
—Dear Heart, I love you still!

POLLY'S ONE OFFER.

IN SIX CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER I.

"I'M not wishing to complain; but it is a hard life to be left a widow with children, and nothing certain to bring 'em up to. I hope my girls will never marry to be left as I was. Poor James didn't expect it; and I'm sure I looked for something very different, or I should have thought twice before I'd plunged into such troubles. A family comes before you've time to turn round, and nobody would believe the wear and tear of boys but them that have them—not that girls are not a terrible anxiety too. And it isn't so much when they're little—when they're little, after you've put 'em to bed, you know they are safe and out of mischief, and there is peace in the house; it is when they're getting up your real troubles begin. Jack is no sooner off my hands than there's Polly to think of—poor little Polly that was seventeen yesterday; and was only a baby when her father died—there she sits!" and as she concluded, Mrs. Curtis raised her right hand and let it drop heavily into her lap again, and groaned as if Polly were engaged in the commission of some moral enormity past expression in words.

The stout old lady, Mrs. Sanders, to whom the widow was pouring out her injuries at the hands of Providence, groaned responsive, and looked at Polly with a slow shake of the head, which seemed to imply that her case was bad as bad could be. "Thank the Lord, I never had no children," said she, with solemn gratitude; "they'd have killed me outright. Sanders is quite enough by himself! Nobody knows but them that has 'em to put up with the cur'ous ways of men. Take warning by your mother and me, Polly, and never you go to marry, to be dragged to death with children, and made a slave of by a husband as won't let you have a sixpence in your pocket, and him that extravagant with his clubs, and his committees, and his nonsense, that I should never be surprised if we was in the Gazette next week."

Polly's rosy little dewy face laughed all over, and she cried, gaily: "That I won't, Mrs. Sanders; you and my mother are a perfect antidote to the romance of family affection. If ever I feel tempted to fall in love, I'll remember you, and be saved the folly."

"Folly, indeed, and worse than folly!" ejaculated Mrs. Curtis, and stared wearily into the fire.

She deserved to be weary. Mrs. Sanders had come in at three o'clock out of the November fog; it was now five and quite dusk in the little drawing-room, and not one cheerful word had either attempted to say to the other. Polly would have run out of hearing of their monotonous long since, but there was no other fire to escape to except Biddy's in the kitchen, which was not "redd up" till tea-time; so she had fallen back on the patience of a contented heart and sweet temper, and her precious faculty of mental abstraction, which she had cultivated to a high degree in her mother's society. And a very wise measure, too, for though Mrs. Curtis bemoaned her widowed lot without ceasing, Polly well knew that her griefs were fictitious now, and that she enjoyed nothing so much as a good, uninterrupted wail with vulgar old Mrs. Sanders. In fact, all her real cares had been taken off her shoulders by other people as fast as they arose, and on this particular November afternoon she was so much at a loss for a grievance that she could only recur to the event of seventeen years ago, when a beneficent Providence had relieved her of a husband, of whom, during his lifetime, she had never spoken save as a "trying" man. Jane, the eldest daughter, and the eldest of the family, had assumed its headship immediately on her father's vacating it, and had, by her teaching of music and singing, earned its daily bread since she was as young as Polly was now. Uncle Walter had taken James and Tom from the grammar-school successively, after helping to maintain them there until they were of an age to go into training for physic and divinity, the expense of which training he bore with the assistance of Uncle Everard; then Uncle Everard's wife, who had no girls of her own, had adopted Lily, the second daughter, from quite a little thing, and had brought her up with every luxury and indulgence of a rich man's child; and, lastly, Uncle Robert, who was a civil engineer, had just taken Jack into his house and office, with the understanding that he would provide for him entirely if his conduct was satisfactory. The worst of this was, as Jane said, that they could never be one house again; but her mother, who had no sentiment, protested that it did not matter if they were in the way of promotion in the world: large families must scatter, and all she wanted was to see them get on, and be independent, and not subject to poverty as she had been. Jane acquiesced in the necessity for the boys, and only hoped they might keep little Polly at home, for little Polly was her pet, her heart's darling and delight from the day of her birth until now that she was a sweet, blooming, blushing little woman.

But little Polly, for a wonder, had a fancy for getting away from the dull suburban cottage whence the boys were now all gone for good, and had lately proclaimed her own intention to go out as a governess, and not continue a burden on Jane.

"A burden!" echoed Jane. "Why, Polly, you are my only joy."

"But you will not have to work so hard when I can help mother from my salary, and I don't at all dislike the idea of going out as some girls do. I'm not afraid," said Polly, with the brightest brave look on her bonnie face.

"But I dislike the idea for you," said Jane, and did not drop her opposition even when Mrs. Curtis interposed with the remark that Polly was very sensible, and, for any thing she should do to hinder it, might have her own way. She had much better go for a governess than stop at home to be picked up and married by somebody who would die and leave her with a dozen children to fend for, and nothing to put in their mouths.

Polly laughed. "Don't be anxious, mammy dear; catch me marrying after listening to you and Mrs. Sanders for all these years! I should as soon think of jumping into the canal!"

"Hush, Polly; don't be silly," said Jane. "What do you know about it? All men don't die like papa, and all women are not such bad wives as Mrs. Sanders—yes, I call her a bad wife—always speaking ill of her husband, who is no worse than other people's."

"Then how disagreeable other people's must be!" retorted Polly, naughtily.

Jane shook her head at her reprovingly, and the subject dropped for the moment. But it was to this whim of Polly's that Mrs. Curtis was referring when she told her favorite gossip that no sooner was Jack off her hands than there was Polly to think of—as if the anxiety would be hers. She was not an unkind mother, but she had no desire to keep her children at home, and it was her evident willingness to part with Polly, who had never given her a day's pain since she was born, that had most to do with Polly's determination to go. She was a clever little creature, and had been well educated; kisses, caresses, indulgences, had never been in her way, and she felt no need of them. The atmosphere of home was too cold for the development of affectionateness. Jane had wisely ordained that she should be trained to be servicable, but she had not intended that her pet sister should work like herself while she could work for her; and she was thoroughly dismayed when she heard the little thing declare that she meant to use the weapons of independence that had been put into her hands, to keep herself, and help her mother. Jane had never been otherwise than rather plain, and when, at twenty, Dr. Shore proposed to her, her mother and every body else had said that it was so clearly her duty to stay at home and assist in bringing up the younger children, that she had abandoned all hope of having a life of her own, and had applied herself to extending and strengthening her musical connection, which was already yielding her a nice little income. We may suppose that her affections had not been very deeply engaged, though often afterward, when tired and jaded with a long day's work, she used to think that if the fates had been propitious she could have been very happy as Dr. Shore's wife. He had married then, and there was no place of repentance left her, and she kept her regrets to herself; but it was one of her chief pleasures of imagination to throne Polly in some good man's love, and bless them with children to whom she was to be a fairy godmother and special providence; for Polly was very sweet and pretty, a round, rosy, soft, dimpled little creature, whom it was quite a temptation to kind people to fondle and be tender to.

But Polly, too sensible, too practical mite that she was, did not care for their fondling, and made a mock at their tenderness. She prided herself on her strength of mind and her capability, and was quite in earnest to prove them. As for being pretty, and having eyes like golden sirup and a complexion of milk and roses, what did it matter? She had brains, too, and would make quite as good a governess as ugly girls; and she would a great deal rather be Jane with money of her own, and free and independent, than be dragged to death with children like her mother, or have shillings doled out to her one by one for housekeeping, like Mrs. Sanders. As for falling in love, people didn't all fall in love, and she was not going to fall in love! Jane might trust her for that—she was not an idiot; and she should take good care to nip any sentiment of that sort in the bud.

While Polly was still at home her mother had shown her that process of nipping sentiment in the bud; and though Polly spoke of it thus airily when she wanted to reassure Jane, she had manifested some temper at the time of the actual occurrence. It was on this wise: A school-fellow of her brother Tom, who had been at Heidelberg University for a couple of years, came back to Norminster and called on Mrs. Curtis. Tom had left home then, but Walter Scott nevertheless called again, and after the second visit, when he had seen Polly, and heard her and Jane sing, he sent some German music that he had copied with his own hand, and a nice little note addressed to Polly. Mrs. Curtis pursed up her mouth as Polly's expanded in a pleased and rosy smile, and said: "That music must be returned, Polly."

Polly's countenance was solemnized in a moment, and her clear brown eyes sparkled as she asked, briefly, "Why?"

"Because I say so. I know what I am about and what I mean, Polly."

"Wait till Jane comes in; it is nothing to make a fuss about."

"Do what I bid you, and do it at once. Tie up the music again, and write a civil note to say that you never accept presents."

"This music has not cost him sixpence—only his trouble," said Polly, still reluctant. "Jane will be vexed."

Mrs. Curtis frowned a brief repetition of her command (she did not want for will, and usually had her own way), and then Polly obeyed—presenting "her compliments and thanks to Mr. Walter Scott; but her mother did not allow her to accept presents."

Jane fulfilled Polly's prediction of being vexed. She said sending poor Walter's music back was making much ado about nothing; musical people always gave each other music, and she would have liked to see it herself if it was new. She never did see it, however; for Walter took his rebuff seriously, and called no more on Mrs. Curtis and her daughters. It was after this incident that Polly mooted her longing for liberty; and though nobody suggested any connection between the two circumstances, they were connected. If young men had been all roaring lions and fiery dragons Mrs. Curtis could not have more obstinately shut her doors against them, or preached severer warnings of the danger of them to Polly in private. Two results ensued. Polly learned to think of young men as vanity and vexation, and of home as dull and cheerless; and then the idea occurred to her that if other girls worked, why should not she? "Why should not she?" echoed her mother; and after a very little discussion, her idea matured into a positive wish and desire to go out as a governess. Jane resisted until she saw that resistance was fruitless; then she gave in; and while Polly began to prepare her modest wardrobe for a start in the world, Jane inquired among the parents of her pupils for a suitable place where she might earn her first experiences mildly.

"I must have my evenings to improve myself, and I don't want to be treated as 'one of the family'—I'd rather not," Polly announced, full of her coming independence, and contemptuous of all half measures by which the change might be made easy to her. Jane bade her not expect to have every thing just as she liked in other people's houses; she must prepare to conform to their ways, and not expect them to conform one tittle to hers.

But Polly would take no discouragement; she was quite gay and valiant in her fashion of looking the world in the face, and she felt glad, absolutely glad, as if some great good fortune had befallen her, when, just before Christmas, after a long negotiation on paper and a personal interview, she was engaged as governess to the three children of Captain and Mrs. Stapylton, at a salary of twenty pounds the first year, rising five the second and third. The stipulation for evening leisure was agreed to, and Jane and every body else allowed that, since she would go out, it was as nice a beginning as she could have. Captain Stapylton was a military officer on half-pay, and warden of the royal forest of Lanswood; his wife was of a Norminster family, and if Polly staid with them three years (not less than three years), and used her opportunities as she ought, she would then be equal to a higher situation and a handsome salary—so, at least, reasoned Miss Mill, who, having been a governess and about in the world nearly half a century, of course knew all about it; and little Polly, listening to her delighted, felt her responsibility and assumed grave airs of being about a hundred years old, which tickled the fancy of some foolish people so excessively that they were more than ever inclined to treat her with affectionate disrespect. Jane said to Miss Mill that she was not cut out for a governess, and Miss Mill replied that any body could see that; but Polly had a lofty sense of her own dignity, and not the remotest idea of the temptation she was to silly kind folks; and thus she started on her career with clear-eyed, happy-hearted confidence, brave and safe as Una with the lion, all the aim of her life being personal independence and ability to save Jane and help her mother.

CHAPTER II.

POLLY CURTIS was blessed in a dear school friend, three months her elder in experience of the world, with whom she kept up a brisk correspondence, nobody but themselves being able to imagine what they found to say in their long and frequent letters. To Margaret Livingstone, with all appropriate seriousness, she had confided every step in her progress toward liberty, and immediately her engagement with Mrs. Stapylton was concluded she wrote off to her a solemn statement of its conditions, winding up with the expression of a hope that she might be strengthened to do her duty in the station of life to which it had pleased Providence to call her, and a brief moral essay thereupon:

"You know, dear Maggie, I am not like you—a bird of the air, a lily of the field, created neither to toil nor spin—I am a brown working bee, and, thank God, I don't care for pomps and vanities. Rich girls can afford to dream of love and lovers, but I have pruned the wings of my fancy, for they are as far from me as the mountains in the moon. All my ambition is to be a good governess, and if I can ever work myself up to a salary of a hundred a year, I shall be the proudest and happiest of women. Don't talk to me of marrying; it is not in my way; my mother never lets a day pass without warning me of its perils and disappointments. She prevented Jane marrying, and she would prevent me, if I wished it ever so; but I shall be safe from temptation in my school-room at the Warden House. If Lanswood is only eight miles from your home, could you not ride over and see me some day when the days are longer? I am busy getting my things ready, and I go the first week in February. There is something inspiring in the thought that henceforth I shall be my own mistress, winning the bread I eat, and depending on no one. But I'll confess it to you (I would not for the world confess it to Jane) that now and then suddenly, when I think of it, my heart gives a spasm as if it were going to turn coward; but my head is not afraid, not a bit. We must make the most of our time in writing before I go, for I do not expect to have very much leisure when teaching begins. You will often think of me, dear Maggie, I know; but don't be sorry and pitiful over me. I am a tough little subject, and is not the back made for the burden? Besides, it is the will of God, etc., etc., etc."

At this point of Polly's letter, Maggie, who was a big-boned tall creature, with a great tender heart, broke down and began to cry. She could not bear to think of the pretty clever little darling she loved and worshiped so having to work, for work and self-dependence were unintelligible ideas to Maggie's indolent dreamy temper. She could not understand her dear Polly slaving like the teachers she had known; it seemed like setting a lark to plow. Boisterously in on her tears broke Bob, her brother, the man of the house, and heard all her complaint, and laughed at it, and then, to comfort her, suggested that Polly should be invited for a week to Blackthorn Grange before she went to Lanswood.

"Would you like her to come, Bob?" Maggie inquired, with eager wistfulness, as if a thought had sprung up in her mind full-grown.

"Yes, if she is pretty," said Bob, coolly. "She is as pretty as pretty can be. But perhaps mother won't; she could not endure Laura's friend," sighed Maggie, and desponded again. She was, however, the youngest daughter of three, and, being fresh from school, some indulgence was due to her; and when her grief and its reason why were explained, Mrs. Livingstone consented to Polly's being asked for a week—not for longer—until she saw for herself what sort of a little body she was. Maggie wrote in exuberant joy and haste, putting the invitation into the most cordial glad words, and making every thing (with Bob's assistance) so smooth and easy on the way to the Grange and forward to the Warden House afterward, that there was no room for doubt or discussion, only for a plain Yes or No. Jane obtained that it should be Yes, and Polly dispatched the reply, in which her smiles and dimples and delight were soberly reflected, as became a young woman about to begin the world on her own account. Bob was permitted to read this letter of Polly's as a reward for his goodness; but by the time it came, it is sad to record that he was growing rather tired of her praises, which Maggie sang in the ears of the household all day.

"Plague take your Polly Curtis; you can talk of nothing else," cried Laura, whose friend had proved a failure, and this on the very morning of the day when Polly was to arrive; and Fanny, the other sister, who was very good-natured as a general thing, went so far as to add that she should not be sorry when Maggie's "governess friend" had been and gone.

And about half past four in the soft gray January twilight Polly came. Mrs. Livingstone, mindful of all courtesies, all hospitalities, met her in the porch, and brought her in with a kiss, and Laura and Fanny were very polite, notwithstanding their previous bit of temper; and Maggie, after turning her round ecstatically, and looking at her by fire-light and window-light, declared that she was just like herself, and her own dear darling little mite of a Polly, and what a horrid shame it was to make her a stupid old cross-patch of a governess!

"Maggie!" interposed her mother, with a world of rebuke in her voice.

"Polly does not care what I say, does she?" murmured Maggie, turning her round affectionately and peeping under her bonnet—girls wore cottage-bonnets in those days, which were like eaves over their modest faces.

"I like it," said Polly, and glanced round at the assembly with ineffable patronage and self-possession. She felt inexpressibly important; was she not here on an independent visit, previous to entering on an independent career of praiseworthy labor?

"Oh, you wee bit solemn goosey, come up stairs!" cried Maggie, and bore her off, dignity and all, to the room they were to share; and the mother and sisters left behind laughed gently, and said there was something very odd about the little creature, but she seemed nice—not much like a governess, however.

Polly's box had been carried up stairs before her, and Maggie watched the opening of it with much interest and curiosity.

"I want you to look your very bonniest," said she. "My mother takes the queerest fancies for and against people, and I want her to take a fancy to you. She could not bear Laura's friend, Maria Spinks, and she won't have her here again. She took to you at first sight from the way she kissed you—I know she did, and I'm so glad."

"I am pleased, too—I like to be liked," said Polly. "She is a very grand old lady, Maggie, you never told me."

"Bob is like her—the only one of us that is —he hasn't come home yet; he is out with the hounds to-day—the meet was at Ellerston Gap this morning, and—here is your old pink frock; put it on, Polly; you can't help looking bonnie in your pink."

"Must I? It was my last summer's best. It is too smart a color for me, now that I am a governess, but Jane said I might wear it out of evenings in the school-room. I have a new brown French merino for Sundays, and this old violet I traveled in for every day; and Jane gave me a new white muslin—not that there is any chance of my wanting such a thing, but she would insist on my having it—and white satin ribbon. I can wear all white, you know. Do you think it is prettily made, Maggie?"

"Oh, you sweet little witch, it's beautiful, and you'll be a fairy in it! You shall wear it to-night, and every body shall fall in love with you!" cried Maggie. But Polly, with intense decision, folded it up, and said that, indeed, she was not going to make a show of herself, not even to please her stupid old jewel of a Maggie.

"You never had any sense of the fitness of things, you precious old dear!" said she. "Picture me in white muslin and all the rest of you in thick dresses—this is only for a party or a concert, you know. I had better put on my new brown merino."

"I won't have you in brown—brown has nothing to do with my wee little rosy daisy," cried Maggie, and grown suddenly impatient of Polly's grave airs, she seized her, shook her, kissed her, never deranging her dignity, however, a hair's-breadth. Polly tolerated her caressing patiently and sweetly, it was Maggie's way; and when there was nobody to see, she did not object to her petting and spoiling—it pleased Maggie and did not hurt her—so she said with her admirable coolness, which Maggie was much too humble and adoring ever to resent.

Finally, Polly was arrayed in the pink dress with tucker and cuffs of fine lace, and her glossy brown hair tied round with a pink ribbon—as dainty a little lady as had ever stepped down the stairs of Blackthorn Grange in all the three hundred years since it had been built. It was a farmhouse which the Livingstones had tenanted for three generations; but the old beauty of it, with its walled garden and mossy orchard, was still cherished, and the Livingstones, by virtue of descent, connection, and a small entailed estate in the family, ranked with the minor gentry and the clergy of their neighborhood. Polly, as she tripped along the hall, said she liked the house, and if she was Maggie, she should feel quite romantic, and proud of living in such a fine ancient place.

The parlor door was ajar, and Mrs. Livingstone overheard the cheerful young voice expressing a sentiment that pleased her. She held out a hand to welcome Polly again, and said: "So I thought when I arrived here after my marriage."

"The window on the stairs was a picture as we went up, with the moon rising and the red bars of sunset behind the great bare trees in the garden; what time of the year did you come?" said Polly, whose sympathy was very quick.

"It was a September evening, and the sky all aglow with scarlet and fire. I remember resting in that window-seat, my first rest in my new home; there was a fir-tree standing then that is gone now; but you are cold, child; sit here on this low stool and get warmed. Maggie, you should not have kept her up stairs so long."

"I never felt the cold until I saw the fire," said Polly, pleasantly, and deposited herself in the corner between Mrs. Livingstone and the fender, on the low stool as she was bidden, and then looked calmly about at the room and its occupants.

It was a large room, low, and with the beams of the ceiling visible; the wide window was crimson-curtained, and all the furniture was old and substantial, but there was neither decoration nor taste any where. The three sisters had not an ounce of taste among them, and when lilacs, gillyflowers, and roses were over in the garden, the big china bowl on the centre table stood empty, or served as a receptacle for waifs and strays escaped from careless hands and pockets. The sisters were in perfect accord with their unadorned surroundings; large, honest, healthy young women with a good and well-grounded opinion of themselves, and Maggie with just glimmering enough of sentiment besides to feel the charm of a friend like Polly, who was instinct with life and spirit, and a perfect contrast to herself. The inclination to protect and caress her little guest had evidently taken hold of Mrs. Livingstone as it did of so many other warm-hearted people; for twice or thrice, as Polly sat toasting in her corner, the house-mother took up one of her small hands and chafed it gently between her own, and Polly looked at her as she never had occasion to look at her own poor shrewish mother at home. Polly loved her mother, but mothers lose a great deal who keep their children at a distance: so thought Polly, thus introduced into the bosom of a family, all the members of which were fond of each other, and not afraid to show it.

They were talking rather noisily, and several of them together, when there was a bustle in the hall, a loud voice, a loud step, and then the opening of the door, at which appeared a tall young man in a scarlet coat and velvet cap who asked: "Well, hasn't she come?" not seeing the little figure in the corner half-hidden by his mother.

"Yes!" cried Maggie, "she is here; stand up, Polly, and say how d'ye do to Bob!"

Polly rose with extreme circumspection, and executed the frigid manoeuvre that she had been laboriously instructed to perform when a gentleman was introduced, only she blushed with it, which was not in the dancing-school order. Bob brought his spurred heels together with a click, and imitated the bow preposterously—the blush was beyond him; but Polly's eyes were downcast, and she was spared the anguish of seeing her grave airs made fun of by this disrespectful person, whose mother admonished him to go away and make haste for dinner: it was late. Bob obeyed, with a comical grimace at Maggie, which she replied to with a half-laugh—rude, very rude; but there was something about that queer little Polly, turned precisian, that provoked it, and her utter unconsciousness of the effect she produced increased the humor of the joke.

When Bob came back to the parlor the servant was just announcing dinner, and the young man stepped briskly across the room to Polly, and bending unnecessarily low, offered her his arm with an exaggerated affectation of courtesy that wakened Maggie's alarm, and made her long to box his ears. But Polly took it with beautiful serenity, and kept step with him composedly, until he placed her by himself at table in the full light of the lamp—the loveliest little thing that had ever sat there since he was master, as he thought, glancing down at her with more serious approval. And it was capital to hear her talk. How he had expected to hear her talk goodness knows; but when she used the right words about a fox-hunt, and asked if they had had a good run to-day, and if he was in at the death, and who won the brush, it is impossible to say whether he was most amazed or enchanted by her wonderful cleverness—all the more wonderful in a creature so bewilderingly pretty and sweet.

She was new, too, quite new. Bob had never seen any body in the least like her. Girls usually pretended to be shy of him, partly from liking and a desire to attract, and partly from the reputation he had of being wild. Polly knew nothing about wildness. His mother and sisters adored him, the maid-servant smiled when he spoke, the dogs lay at his feet and were happy. He was no beauty, but he was a fine manly young fellow, and very popular in his neighborhood. To Polly he seemed a rather mature person—he was not far from thirty—and after the first blush the sense of her highly responsible position came to her aid, and re-established her in perfect calm. It was delicious to Bob to be looked innocently in the face by those soft brown eyes, and talked to without any sham airs and graces. A strain of jocular compliment was all that was usually required of him when he had a pretty girl at his elbow; but Polly was as good as a lesson in manners; she did not expect compliments, and he had the wit to see she would not like them. So he adopted her tone of conversation with seriousness, only relapsing into his original frame of mind twice or thrice for a moment, when her assumption of sageness and duty became too much for his sense of the ridiculous.

The formality and propriety of the party held out through dinner, but the instant Maggie got Polly into the parlor she seized her by the waist and whirled her round in a waltz. "Don't, Maggie," said Polly, but entered into the spirit of it all the same; and more, when Fanny good-naturedly opened the piano and offered to play for them, the music brought Bob, who composed himself in his arm-chair and looked on, until Maggie popped her partner down breathless on the sofa and herself by her.

"That will do; what a dust you have made!" said he, and Polly started and felt abashed at her inappropriate behavior. Yet a few minutes after Bob was making a dust himself, and learning the new step of Polly, which he knew perfectly; if his sisters had not worshiped him with fear, they would have told her that he was only doing it to tease her and amuse himself. He managed to be most skillfully stupid; a dozen times, at least, did Polly "put his feet in the way of it," as she said, and a dozen times did he fail to do it correctly. He suggested that perhaps if he did it with her he might succeed in keeping time; but Polly said, "No, let him try it with Maggie; she has a better height for him." He, however, did it worst of all with Maggie; and Polly, for the honor of her teaching, was prevailed on to take him in nand herself.

"But I don't expect you will be able to do it," said she, despairingly.

Fanny at the piano glanced over her shoulder laughing, and even Mrs. Livingstone watched with an amused smile while Bob redeemed his character. He knew how to hold his partner at all events, Polly thought at the start, and it was astonishing how fast he improved with her to keep him in step. In fact, he caught it up directly, though when Polly wished him to try it again with Maggie his awkwardness was, if possible, more conspicuous than before.

"This is very discouraging; of course I don't mean that you can help it," said Polly, in the most admirable tone of a patient teacher dealing with a dull but willing pupil.

The inconvenient Maggie burst out in a long-suppressed merry peal of laughter: "Oh, you dear little comical darling, Bob is only making fun; he can dance as well as any of us!" cried she.

Polly gazed up for half a minute with blank dismay at Bob, then joined in the laugh against herself, and said, "If you are that sort of a person, I shall take care how I give you a dancing-lesson again!"

VISITATIONS.

THE mind's great doors are opened wide sometimes, And grand processions enter silent there, Mount to the council chambers swept out fair From all defilements and unholy slimes; Then on the silence break ecstatic chimes Which fill the soul with music! Earthly care Shrinks pale and shriveled in the ether rare, But dies not—waiting for less lustrous times. Alas! too soon returns life's fitful hour When the soul's grandeur fades, its music rests; And yet the echoes vibrate—and a dower Of fragrance, lingering incense-like, attests The vanished glory, telling of the power Of those Anointed Lords who were the guests.

THE EDUCATION OF WOMEN.

THROUGH the whole of the many bitter and unjust attacks made by a weekly contemporary upon the women of the period, a vein of assumption runs, which, at first sight, seems to belong to the question at issue, but in reality is quite distinct, and capable of being argued upon without referring to the original subject. This, by the present time, has become nauseating, and is properly dismissed to the limbo of all malignant acidities, where it is to be hoped the writer will follow his monstrous creations with all convenient speed. Leaving out of the question all such matters, we can, however, fairly accept as a point for discussion the assumption above alluded to—this is, that women are not only inferior to men on all intellectual points, but are incapable of being materially improved upon. That in general knowledge women are inferior to men is an undoubted fact which no one can dispute; but the question as to whether this is owing to their mental incapacity for acquiring knowledge, or whether it is because no pains have been bestowed upon their education, has not been fairly discussed. In ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, in a family where there are boys and girls, it will be found that the boys absorb the entire care of the head of the family, who only bestows an occasional thought upon the education of his daughters. They are consequently left to the superintending care of their mother, who has herself been trained in a narrow school, and of course is unable to look higher. What is the result? The education of the boys becomes a progressive affair. They are steadily pushed onward until there is no limit to their acquirements, except that of their mental powers. As a general principle it may be assumed that boys grow up in the possession of an immense quantity of general knowledge, picked up partly unconsciously and partly by hard study, but on the whole of a broad and comprehensive character. Nor is this all. Their minds are enlarged, they see that the walls of their school do not comprehend the whole intellectual universe, and the doings of the outer world often strike responsive chords in even the busy hum and bustle of a public school-room. On leaving this arena a boy's mind is ready trained to receive fresh knowledge, and often the most useful studies are commenced after the school doors have been shut behind him forever. Thus academical training has had the effect not only to excite his curiosity and desire for fresh acquirements, but has actually specially developed his intellectual powers so that he can gratify these desires. Whether he gets much or little familiarity with his subjects is hardly material, but at least he becomes aware that his school studies are but stepping-stones to vast store-houses of human learning. Of history, natural science, art, mechanical forces, languages, politics, and kindred questions he at least knows the names, and often with ease attains proficiency in one or more of them. What is most important of all he sees that each of these studies is only valuable in reference to other subjects, and that all branches of knowledge are more or less closely interwoven and connected. Let us compare this with the process gone through by, perhaps, the sister of the same boy. To be taught reading, writing, dancing, the piano-forte, a little French and German, with perhaps a faint idea of drawing, is the entire extent of the supposed requirements of the feminine mind. The great problems of humanity are practically ignored as unnecessary, and a moderate proficiency, in all or some of the above, considered all that is required. The remaining energies of her instructors are concentrated upon teaching her to walk upright, turn her toes out, and conduct herself generally in a frigidly decorous manner. She is at last dismissed from school an accomplished young lady. She can generally write a good hand, and is tolerably free from mistakes in composition and spelling. Her playing the piano-forte is pretty good, though her pieces have about the same amount of expression as her scales. Her French is sufficient for a short conversation, and she can perhaps read in German. Her dancing is very good, and her drawing very bad. In history she is rather shaky. With this stock of knowledge, to which is added a liberal investment in Sir Walter Scott's works and the novels of the day, with good manners and a slight taste for domestic employment, a young lady is supposed to be in proper intellectual state, and to be a credit to her instructors.

Perhaps, considering how little her instructors know themselves as a rule, this result is even more than might have been expected. The standard set up by self-appointed instructors of feminine youth is essentially false and imperfect. Those subjected to their guidance are led to form exaggerated views as to the importance of some subjects, and to totally ignore a vast number of other questions, some of which are of paramount importance to the mental well-being of all. The instructors themselves are perfectly unequal to the task of teaching even what they profess to make special studies of; and the result is, that when a girl is really well-educated she must be looked upon as a marvel of intelligence, who has successfully struggled with numerous obstacles, rather than as one for whom all things have been made easy of attainment. Good teachers must be properly trained before pupils can learn from them, and of these good teachers we fear, judging by the results, there are very few. Girls as a rule are far quicker of comprehension than boys, until the deadening influences of the education of the one, and the regular system of development of the other, reverses their positions. As a measure of simple justice and expediency, it is necessary that feminine education should be remodeled in a manner that will enable women to take that intellectual position to which they are entitled, and for which in every way they are mentally qualified.

A NOONDAY MELODY.

EVERY thing goes to its rest;
The hills are asleep in the noon;
And life is as still in its nest
As the moon when she looks on a moon
In the depths of a calm river's breast
As it steals through a midnight in June.

The streams have forgotten the sea
In the dream of their musical sound;
The sunlight is thick on the tree,
And the shadows lie warm on the ground—
So still, you may watch them and see
Every breath that awakens around.

The church-yard lies still in the heat,
With its handful of mouldering bone;
As still as the long stalk of wheat
In the shadow that sits by the stone,
As still as the grass at my feet
When I walk in the meadows alone.

The waves are asleep on the main,
And the ships are asleep on the wave;
And the thoughts are as still in my brain
As the echo that sleeps in the cave;
All rest from their labor and pain—
Then why should not I in my grave?

CROQUET-CHILDREN.

IF the children, when their game was done, had put all the croquet away carefully in the box and shut the cover down, then probably what happened would not have happened. But they left the balls and mallets all out under the trees, and the blue ball and the green ball lay at some distance from the rest, in the grass. At midnight, when the moon was gone down, these two rolled together and began to talk.

"What a fine game we have had to-day, and how bright the sun shone!" said the green ball. "I felt like laughing right out when I reached the stake first of all!"

"And I came next," said the blue ball; "but the others were dreadfully put out, and the black ball gave me a knock that pushed me over when he rolled up and missed the stake."

"Speaking of knocks," said the green ball, "I wish our mallets would not hit us quite so hard. I believe they do it out of spite."

"Oh! they are not so spiteful as the balls," said the other; "they only try to keep us in order; but have you ever noticed how the black ball hates me? He is always glad of a chance to croquet me off into the bushes. I only wish I could be one of the people that play for a little while. I would soon teach him to behave himself!"

"I should like that too," answered the green one; "and then, for once, we should have the satisfaction of seeing the game well played."

"Don't talk so loud," whispered the blue ball; "the green mallet is looking at you. It is lucky he don't know how to roll. Hush! I have an idea! Let us for once join in the game to-morrow. It will be such fun. No one but our mallets will recognize us, and they are so helpless they can't say a word."

"Yes; but if they get a chance to give us a knock, then every one will see that we are only balls," said the green one, laughing.

"We can shut them up in the box," said the blue ball, looking over her shoulder to be sure that the blue mallet was not within hearing; "say, shall we try it?"

"I'm ready for any thing," replied the green ball. "So am I," echoed the blue. And then they rolled away together a little farther from the box.

And so the next morning, when the sun shone bright, and Tom and Kitty and the Baby came out in the garden to play croquet, the blue ball and the green ball were nowhere to be found, though all the rest were scattered about in plain sight.

"Never mind," said Kitty, "we don't want but two to play with. Come, Tom."

"Father won't like it if they're lost," said Tom, his small round face looking very sober. "He made me promise to put them away in the box every night; and I couldn't wait last evening for fear the strawberries would be all eaten up." So he went about treading in all the grass and peeping under the bushes; but the balls could not be found, though the green and blue mallets were lying still and straight under different trees.

"Bah—bah—bah!" said Baby, rolling over and picking a red clover-blossom.

"There, hear Baby!" said Kitty; "she's asking for balls to play with. I'm going to give them to her to roll about, all but two for you and me. Do hurry, Tom; we can look for them by-and-by. I want to play as many games as I can before dinner, for this afternoon Lou's ladies and gentlemen are coming, and they won't let us play with them."

"Lou won't like it if those balls are lost," said Tom, ruefully; but he came up to the starting-stake and took the black mallet, all ready to begin as soon as Kitty had tied her shoe.

Just at that moment there was a rustling in the lilac-bushes behind them, and with a merry laugh two children came running out hand in hand, and went right up to Tom and Kitty in the pleasantest manner possible. They were short, plump, happy-looking children, so round and chubby, and with dimples in their cheeks. The little girl had on a white dress, with a broad blue sash, and the little boy wore a white suit, with a wide green belt.

"Why, where did you come from?" exclaimed Kitty, opening her brown eyes in surprise, for she knew these were none of the neighbors' children, and she had never seen them before. They could not have come from very far, for neither wore a hat, and there was not a speck of dust on their shoes.

"Why, we live close by," said the little girl, laughing. "I see our house now." And she looked over one side among the trees.

"I don't see any house," said Tom, following her glance, "nothing but our croquet-box and the trees. I suppose you mean you live over in the woods. I never saw you before!"

"But we have seen you," replied the little boy. "We have seen you, oh, a great many times. May we play croquet?"

"Oh, may we?" echoed the little girl.

"Yes, that'll be splendid," cried Kitty; "four make such a nice game, a great deal nicer than two. Here, take these mallets, and I'll get the red and yellow balls away from Baby. We'll have to leave out the blue one, because it's lost, and the green one, too; but we don't need them."

"Bah—bah—bah!" gurgled Baby, seizing the two balls that were left her.

"My name is Tom, and hers is Kitty. What's your name?" asked Tom of the new playmates as they drew round the stake. The children hesitated, the little girl spoke first.

"My name," she said, slowly, "my name—is—is—Bluebell."

"Oh, what a pretty name!" exclaimed Kitty.

"And your eyes are so blue, too. What's your name?" turning to the little boy, whose fat hands were pulling nervously at his green belt.

"No, indeed, he won't!" said Bluebell, with gleaming eyes, and sending her ball through the first two arches with a force that carried her a rod beyond them, she took her mallet's length, and then dealing a strong, well-aimed blow she made her ball fairly leap through the air plump against Kitty's, which responded with the unmistakable click of a croquet. Kitty shouted as her new friend, with marvelous power and precision, achieved a roquet-croquet that sent both balls whizzing over the grass together, landing Kitty's in position before the second arch, and her own before the third.

"Well, I never saw any thing like that in all my life!" exclaimed Tom in a thunder-struck manner, as Bluebell paused for breath. Evergreen turned pale, for he saw her glance with relentless triumph at his partner's black ball.

Sure enough she rolled her ball through its arch, and in a moment more croqueted the black one. Then adopting Evergreen's mode of play, she helped herself by means of it through arch after arch; but she always seemed to use the black ball more harshly than was necessary, kicking it with her plump little foot when it rolled out of place, hitting it with the sharp edge of the mallet, and once she stamped upon it.

"There, how do you like that!" Tom heard

"NEVER MIND," SAID KITTY, "WE DON'T WANT BUT TWO TO PLAY WITH. COME, TOM."

"My name," he said, "is—is—" and there he stopped short.

Bluebell laughed. "You must excuse him," she said, politely; "his name is Evergreen."

"Evergreen! I never heard of a boy with such a name! Well, Evergreen, I play first, then Kitty, then you, and then Bluebell."

So the game began. Tom and Kitty were pretty good players; but from the very first their new friends took the lead—"beat them all to nothing!" Tom said afterward. Tom's ball at the beginning went through two arches, took a mallet's length, missed the side arch, but lay in good position. Kitty's went through the first arch, missed the second, and in a moment more was croqueted by Evergreen, and was sent spinning along out of position, just where he could croquet it again after taking his partner with himself through the side arch. He sent his ball through arch after arch, croqueting, ricocheting, forcing Kitty's poor ball along with him, till at last, after hitting the opposite stake, he seemed to disdain its help any farther, and with one knock he croqueted it off to a terrible distance; then gently brought his own into position, and resting upon his laurels, gave Bluebell a chance to play.

"Evergreen is way ahead. He'll beat us, won't he?" whispered her distressed little partner Kitty, whose ball lay so far off that it was almost out of sight.

her say in a low, exulting voice. He felt a little hurt, for he almost thought Bluebell had taken a dislike to him, or she could not treat his ball so. But her round, good-natured face was all dimpled with smiles as she turned to him and said, "All's fair in war; you know!"

Her play was not yet finished; she hit the opposite stake, and then croqueted her poor victim black ball on several rods out of the course. Then she hit Evergreen's ball and sent that ahead of her to help her on as she passed under one arch after another. Evergreen looked very gloomy; he thought she ought to stop and give him a chance; but no, Bluebell was too excited with triumph; she sent her ball on and on till the last arch was passed; then croqueting Evergreen's ball off into the bushes, she rolled her own neatly up to the stake, hit it, and then stopped breathless. She had won the game.

Kitty and Tom stood in open-mouthed wonder. They had never heard of such playing before. The Baby crowed with delight, and put three clover heads in her mouth at once.

"I'm tired!" said the plump little Bluebell, dropping down on the grass in a round heap.

"Tom! Tom! Kitty! Kitty!" called the children's mother from the window, "come in with your little friends and get some luncheon!"

So Tom seized Evergreen's hand, and Kitty took Bluebell's, and away they all ran together to the house. They went up the steps, across the veranda, and Mrs. Graham met them in the broad, sunny hall and gave each child a piece of plum-cake and a tumbler of milk. She felt quite curious to know who the little strangers were: for now that she looked at them closely, she did not remember ever seeing them before, and she thought she knew every child in the neighborhood. Still she did not like to ask very many questions for fear they might, on going home, give their parents the idea that she was a prying sort of person. Then she thought she would find out all she could indirectly.

So first she looked to see if the nurse had gone to take care of Baby, and then she smoothed Kitty's tangled curls, and then said to the little strange girl:

"What is your name, my dear?"

"Bluebell," said the child.

"Ah, a pet name!" thought Mrs. Graham; and then she tried the boy.

"What is your name, my dear?" she asked.

"Ever-Ever-green," he answered between two bites of plum-cake.

"Green," murmured Mrs. Graham. "Ah! some new family by the name of Green, no doubt." And she determined to ask her husband when he came home to dinner. She thought she had never seen such round, fat, healthy-looking children in her life before.

"Now let's go play croquet some more," said Tommy, finishing the last raisin. And down the steps he ran and Kitty after him, all eagerness. But as Evergreen and Bluebell hurried to catch up with them they must have tripped somehow on the upper step, for they stumbled headlong and went rolling together over and over down the eight veranda steps clear to the ground. They went over and over like two balls, thump, thump; and Mrs. Graham could hardly believe her eyes when she saw them jump up laughing at the bottom of the steps just as if nothing had happened.

"Oh, my dears!" she cried; "you must be more careful. I thought you had certainly broken your necks."

But they only laughed, and, indeed, there did not seem to be a single bruise on their fair round faces and chubby shoulders. They took hold of hands and ran after Kitty and Tom to the croquet-ground. Mrs. Graham watched them a few moments in a sort of wondering perplexity, and then went back to her work.

The children did not seem to begin their croquet again very readily. They got into a frolic over the balls and mallets, tossing them up in the air with shouts and laughter, and then Tom, boy like, hid himself behind a lilac-bush, and said it was his fort. The three others besieged him and threatened him, made onslaughts on the weak points of the fort, and rolled balls at him. At last, getting hard pressed, he seized a mallet in each hand and rushed out furiously upon his shouting foes. In one hand he held the blue mallet, and in the other the green one.

"It is destiny!" murmured Bluebell to Evergreen, growing white to the very lips; and they started to run away from Tom in a mortal terror.

He ran after them, shouting with triumph, and gained at every step. The end of the garden was like a little hill, descending, and at the bottom a brook flowed. They had almost reached the brow of this hill, when Tom, with a gleeful cry, came near enough to just touch them lightly with the mallets, when, oh horror! he did not know but he had killed them; for down they went headlong, rolling over and over down the slope, a round mass of blue and white and green, seeming every moment to grow smaller, when just as Kitty came up, crying, "Oh, you have pushed down my beautiful Bluebell!" she and Tom began to rub their eyes in bewilderment; for there were no Bluebell and Evergreen at all, but their own old blue ball and green ball lying at the bottom of the slope as if they had just rolled down.

The children looked at each other solemnly for a moment.

"The balls were not there when I was hunting for them; that is certain," said Tom, "for I looked in that very spot."

"Let us go down and get them," said Kitty, softly.

Once at the bottom of the slope they glanced in every direction, and called loudly the names of Bluebell and Evergreen; but nobody replied, and there was no possible hiding-place near. Kitty began to cry.

"Don't cry," said Tom, stoutly; "let's go home again."

And he picked up the green ball, rather carefully it must be confessed, carrying it at arm's-length. But Kitty pressed the blue ball to her little loving heart, and clasped her hands closely upon it.

"Where are your little friends?" asked Mrs. Graham, as her children entered the house in a quiet, subdued way some time after.

"Why, mamma," said Tom, soberly, "we were all playing together and running about, when, just as we got by the little hill, Bluebell and Evergreen fell and rolled right down. And when Kitty and I went to help them up they were not there at all; only the two balls were there that were lost this morning."

"Oh, well," said Mrs. Graham, carelessly, "I guess they were tired and ran home. What funny, fat little tots they were! I must ask your father if any Greens have moved into the neighborhood."

"It is very well, Master Tom, that you found those two balls," said Lou, a pretty, sprightly young lady, who sat at her embroidery; "for seven of my friends are coming to play croquet this afternoon, and if any of them had been missing we should have swung you up into the top of the beech-tree."

That night, when Kitty was put to bed, she said to her mother:

"Mamma, do you suppose it could possibly be that Bluebell was changed into that blue ball?"

"Oh no, no—nonsense!" said Mrs. Graham, lightly; "she'll come again to-morrow."

But she did not come. And when Mrs. Graham made inquiries among her friends she could not hear of any new neighbors, nor of any such children at all. People said she must be mistaken. So she left off talking about it, and would not let Tom or Kitty talk about it either.

Lou, who was afraid the balls would get lost, put them up carefully each night, and locked the box. Things went on in the old channel, and Bluebell and Evergreen came no more to play croquet. Now wasn't it strange, the whole of it?

THE HOUSEHOLD ANGEL.

By FITZ HUGH LUDLOW.

CHAPTER VIII.

At length—after Cuthbert had so improved by his leisure that he hardly knew himself in the glass; when Derrick, in prosecution of his now double work, had been away from home for three days, and had written that business might detain him a week longer; while Mrs. Kearney was still slightly ailing, but well enough to have discharged her nurse—at length there came a day more memorable than any of the others, not only for a lifetime but for all eternity.

It was another such day as the one, a little more than a year ago, on which we made our first acquaintance with the Dalmager demesne.

"What so rare as a day in June?
Then, if ever, come perfect days;
Then Heaven tries the earth if it be in tune,
And over it softly her warm ear lays."

And Heaven had found the time so sweet that from morning till night she lingered with her cheek close enough to the grass and the running water for Cuthbert and Lily to feel it pressed against their own like a mother's, and drink her fragrant breath wherever they wandered. They had taken their dinner in a basket, and gone out right after breakfast to spend the entire day outdoors. They had explored the brook toward its source, as far as Cuthbert dared to let the little girl's feet carry her; and Dr. Livingstone or Sir Samuel Baker never followed the windings of the Nile or the Zambesi with such keen, delightful sense of penetrating unknown mysteries as Lily felt at every new fence her father helped her over—every dark wood or deep glen which she now entered for the first time. So many flowers that she had never seen before to be brought to her father for their names; so many beautiful birds with such fascinating voices and manners; little field-mice; strange insects; lithe red-squirrels trilling their sharp watchman's rattle as they chased each other, or the big cowardly grays over whom they tyrannize, from bough to bough of the shapely smooth pecan-tree; flying squirrels that peered at her between the forks of some lofty branch till she came close enough to look straight up into their eyes, then spread their curious white-lined parachutes and slid down the air to their nests with as smooth a slant as if they ran, fastened by eye-lets, on some invisible wire; curious spotted snakes, now and then, that shot away through the grass like living arrows; the harmless puff-adder, flattening his ugly head and putting on a great fictitious rage to make-believe that he was formidable; tortoises waddling clumsily over the meadows, and clapping to the door of their sentry-boxes with a hiss when she sought their closer acquaintance; a broad, quiet expanse of the stream, where a careful little summer duck was leading the gayly-painted flotilla of her newly-hatched brood on their trial-trip; water-washed agates from the brook-bed; a pair of eagles, the first she had ever had an opportunity of comparing with their effigies on the coins in her savings-bank, floating motionlessly high up under the very sun. Oh what a surfeit of delight was Lily's all that livelong day! What a torrent of questions had Cuthbert to answer, and how amply did the power to answer so many of them repay him for every hour of close reading which had made his head ache in school or college since he first acquired the name of a hard student! When the sun had passed the meridian the happy comrades spread their napkins on a flat rock, and set out their sweet bread and golden butter; their cold broiled chicken and snowy cottage cheese; their dewy strawberries, picked in the meadows as they came along; their dishes, which Lily had plaited of tulip-tree leaves; cream brought in a bottle, and sugar from a paper sugar-bowl—they had such a feast as a Sybarite might envy in vain! When Lily found a spring, cold as ice-water, trickling out of a great mossy rock between the gnarled roots of an overhanging oak on the brook-side her delight knew no bounds; she had discovered it "all by herself," and felt like a successful Ponce de Leon. A delicious draught from it washed down the banquet. Then the glad pair crossed the brook on a great tree-trunk, which seemed so charmingly dangerous, and came home along the other bank. Lily had never been so happy in her life; the woods and fields had seemed as vast as the world, and every moment brought its fresh surprise of knowledge and delight. Cuthbert himself had been magnetized into her mood; the years between them had been canceled by sympathy, and he looked at the earth and sky, which had so long been a wearisome old story to him, with her eyes, to which every thing was ravishingly astonishing and new.

Oh, if those eyes could only be spared to us for our lifetime, who would ever seek in stimulants the sense of pleasure and well-being? The child is forever in that state of elasticity, ecstasy, and brightness which our potent liquors but feebly imitate—a state of healthy intoxication, to which our feverish adult joys answer only as Anteros to Eros. Whatever temptation exists in the condition whose pluperfect and grosser tense men call "drunk" is due to its simulation of the feeling which, when we see our children, we remember was once our own. For this every man—from Wordsworth over his "Ode to Immortality," down to Hodge over his mug of punch—yearns with a regret that is sometimes agony. Oh Baby, Baby! why can't we look forever out of your eyes? Show us how to keep them after we get the down on our cheeks, and there'll be no more need of Temperance meetings—we will thank no man for the most exhilarating nectar that was ever brewed of hemp or poppies, grapes or grain!

Not since he left New England had Cuthbert felt such a spring in his sinews, such a joyous self-sufficiency, such content in the mere fact of living, as he felt this afternoon; and when his little girl asked him, according to her wont when she wanted an especial treat, "to tell her something out of a book," he answered that he would repeat to her what a very lovely poet, who lived not far from the place where they used to, had said about just such a day as this. Then, as they crossed the last meadow hand in hand, he poured forth out of a full heart those exquisite lines, which seemed almost written to express it:

"Now is the high tide of the year,
And whatever of life hath ebbed away
Comes flooding back with a rippling cheer
Into every bare inlet and creek and bay;
Now the heart is so full that a drop overfills it.
We are happy now because God so wills it;
No matter how barren the past may have been,
'Tis enough for us that the leaves are green—"

"Oh, papa! We are so happy now, aren't we?" whispered Lily, tenderly laying her sweet cheek against his, as he put his arms around her to help her down from the last stone-wall into the road which led to their gate.

"Happier than tongue can tell, thank God and my own little angel!" answered Cuthbert, clasping her to his breast with fervent kisses.

"Oh, how I wish mamma were along!" said Lily.

"So do I, dear," her father replied; and in this loving, grateful mood they reached home. No sooner had they entered the door, once more a half-hidden opening in a fragrant wall of roses, as we saw it first, than Lily ran to tell her mother of the happy day they had spent, and their longing that she might have shared it. Not finding her in the large sitting-room, she bounded up the stairs like a deer, her father following more sedately, but returned and met him just as he reached the top, with a disappointed face, and the information that Mrs. Kearney was not on that floor either. Going from room to room he verified the statement for himself, and supposing that his wife was giving directions to the servants, sought her in their part of the house. Kledda and Perro were both in the kitchen with the cook, but none of them had seen her for hours. He accordingly returned to the saloon, and with Lily wondering asking questions on an ottoman at his feet, sat down in their favorite rose-canopied window, to read her "The Lady of the Lake," and wait tea for Mrs. Kearney, whom he now concluded to have felt better, and imitated his example by going out for a stroll about the estate.

He had completed an entire canto when a servant came in to ask if he would have tea. He looked at his watch; and found that the long June afternoon had deceived him. He must have been reading more than an hour, and though the light was still abundant it was nearly eight o'clock.

"Seen any thing of Mrs. Kearney, Betsy?" he asked.

"Nuffin since de mornin', Sah," she replied.

"Why—really—that's very strange. Well, never mind tea for the present. We'll wait for her half an hour or so—I'll ring when I want it."

He tried to read again, but his mind wandered from the page, and casting a glance at Lily's face he saw depicted there the same wistful anxiety which he had been feeling since Betsy retired. Finding a visible shape ready made for it increased the feeling. He shut the book, and began wandering restlessly up and down the room, stopping occasionally to look out of the windows.

"Papa," said Lily, presently, "where do you think mamma's gone?"

"Gone!" answered Cuthbert, for the first time in his life speaking to her almost sharply; "why, she's out walking about the place somewhere, I suppose, don't you?"

"Can't we go out and look—go and meet her. I mean, and walk back all together."

"Yes, dear," Cuthbert replied, with a face of increased solicitude. "Of course she can't have gone far, but then she's been so unwell that she may have got faint and stopped to rest somewhere. Get her blue shawl, Baby; we'll take it along; the dew's beginning to fall, and I'm afraid she'll feel the change after staying in the house so long. Oh, how imprudent in her! Aren't you too tired to walk any more when your little legs have done so much to-day?"

Those tiny members disproved their fatigue by scampering away to the closet where the shawls were kept and being back again before Cuthbert could get his hat and cane; then further corroborated their witness by keeping up with his anxious strides until they had visited every corner of the garden, the orchard, and the lawn, where there was any likelihood of a lady just off the sick-list to have extended her stroll. All the servants were dancing to Perro's banjo in the open air as they passed the negro quarters, but stopped to "make their manners" when they saw their idol and her papa, so that Cuthbert had an opportunity to ask news of his wife from every quarter of the estate. Neither house nor field hands had any other answer than Kledda's—"Didn't neber seen nuffin of the missus sence mornin'."

Cuthbert concealed his feelings till he got out of their hearing, and then groaned aloud.

"Oh, my darling! my darling! I'm so anxious for your dear mamma!"

"Papa dear, could she have gone down toward the village, and got faint on the road, and sat down in the woods and fainted dead away? Could there be any gipsies here to take people off? I've got a book that tells how they stole a beautiful little daughter. Do they ever steal beautiful mammas, too, like mine, dear papa?"

Cuthbert caught at the thought of her having gone to Owlville, though her riding there without the knowledge of a groom was impossible, and what freak short of insanity could have induced a feeble woman, on the first day of convalescence, to walk there, with a stable full of horses at her call, was beyond his comprehension. Still, any thing was better than hopeless sitting down, and instantly, on Lily's suggestion, he shouted an order back to the quarters that one of the men should bring a horse and buggy to the door as quickly as possible; then took Lily on his shoulders and ran to the house with her as fast as he could, that he might jolt the devouring anxiety out of his mind, and create a vent, by muscular exertion, for a nervousness which, had he sat still, would almost have made him scream. After Lily's active day he feared to tax her further; but she pleaded so earnestly not to be left behind, and so cogently urged that if she were put to bed she couldn't sleep a wink till mamma came, that Cuthbert yielded to his own no less than her inclination, and, putting an extra cloak into the buggy, took her along with him. The night was a fitting sequel to the day as regards the outer world; but what a contrast in the inner one! The lovely, undulating meadows and the wood-crowned hills were dreaming in a silver flood; the full moon, upward bound from the horizon moorings, whence it had cleared an hour before, was sailing placidly into a cloudless sky; the air was bland as oil, and just rippled enough to keep the season's youngest leaves dancing to the music of the brook beside the road; but instead of bringing Nature close to the two loving hearts that rode through it, this luxury of every sense, unlike the golden beauty of the day just gone, put her far away from them, seeming a cruel lack of sympathy, like some rich voice singing once loved barcaroles while you weep at a funeral. Even the glad morning and afternoon, in retrospect, seemed only a providential tonic to brace their spirits for the better tolerance of the evening's sorrow, and while Cuthbert acknowledged the mercy of such a preparative, he could not but feel bitterly that he would never again be able to enjoy any such excess of gladness for fear that it was meant only as a preparative. Still, for his darling's sake, he tried to talk of the outer world cheerfully as he drove, and would not even by a sigh betray the cruel disappointment which deepened in his heart as he peered eagerly into every vehicle which met them, to find nothing in it like the one dear face and figure which he sought.

It was nearly ten o'clock when he got to Owlville. The Roost was tightly locked and barred; but a black janitress, who came half asleep to answer his ring, had seen nothing of Mrs. Kearney, and had no news of any kind except that a planter from the other end of the county had that day called to say that Massa Derrick might not return for a week. He found the Rev. Mr. Pulpiduster just managing to keep awake over a sermon which on the next Sunday should even more imperfectly succeed in doing that for his congregation; the store-keeper, with whom the family did its "trading," was still behind his counter; and the principal gossips of the place, lawyers, merchants, and gentlemen of leisure who lived by hiring out half a dozen "niggers," and propped the sunny sides of public buildings, with tobacco-pools in front of them, during the day, were enjoying their liveliest hour in the twenty-four about a bar platoon with "straight whiskies" in the popular tavern. The minister had not seen Mrs. Kearney, and Cuthbert hastened away from him before his pallid face and the lateness of his call could be "improved" by the good man as a favorable occasion for spiritual consolation. It was shame and misery to the poor fellow to make his wife a subject of conversation with the other gentry, who were likely to be repositories of all the latest intelligence of Owlville; but husbandly solicitude was too strong for husbandly reserve, and he delicately pushed his inquiries with as plausible a show as he could of making them casually, only, alas! to come away utterly baffled from both store and tavern.

"I guess she's got home by this time, hasn't she, papa?" asked Lily cheerily, as he turned the horse's head toward home.

"Oh yes; of course, dear; not the least doubt," exclaimed Cuthbert, and, clinging to that manufactured certainty with a desperate purpose of belief which made him sing funny songs and tell funny stories, till Lily laughed as if she would split her little sides, rattled off at a three-minutes' pace to Garnet Run.

"HE BROKE THE SEAL WITH NERVOUS FINGERS—HELD THE LETTER CLOSE TO THE CANDLE, AND READ."

Perro was waiting in the moonlight to open the gate for them.

"Well, Perro, old fellow!" said Cuthbert, in a voice whose eager tremulousness contrasted strangely with its loudness and tone of confident hilarity. "How long after I started did your mistress get home? Is she well? Has she had her tea yet? What kept her?"

Not only voice but body shook like an agued man's while he shot forth these questions—pell-mell as if he did not dare to stop—as if at any expense he must keep up his confident illusion and avoid the risk of an answer.

Perro turned a face of sorrowful surprise to Cuthbert, and said, "You no seen her, massa?"

"If? Why no! Did she pass me on the road? Did she say she did? What do you say? How long has she been back?"

"We no seen de missus here neider, Massa Kearney."

"O God!" groined Cuthbert, turning even in that white moonlight ashen pale, and the reins almost dropping from his cold, nerveless fingers.

"Oh, papa—darling papa! is she dead? is my mamma dead?"

"Lead the horse to the house," said Cuthbert, mechanically; "I can't drive."

Perro put his finger in the bit-ring and walked the vehicle home, while Cuthbert, cowering in one corner of the seat, pressed Lily against his breast; and the two lay frozen thus in a dream of horror, speechless, till they reached the portico.

There, for her sake, he roused himself. "Come, darling!" said he, with a blank, stony face and a hoarse level voice that had no expression in it, "time to go to bed now. My Lily's very tired. I'll put her to sleep in my big bed so she shan't be afraid, then I'll sit up—no, I'll lie down—by her side and wait for mamma."

"Will mamma come home to-night?" said Lily, with a great sob, catching so quick at the hope in her father's words that her horror broke up in a blessed flood of tears.

"Yes, Lily! she'll come home; she was always a good mamma, wasn't she, dear? she'll come—oh yes, she'll come. Oh, if your Uncle Derrick were only here now, what a comfort he'd be! My God; and if—if— No, no, no! I won't think of it! At the worst that could happen; if she were to be sick or any thing and he away—dear, dear Derrick away; what should I do without him?"

Overpowered by fatigue, and relying in the heavenly faith of childhood on her father's word that her mother would come back and he would watch for her, Lily let him undress her and put her on his bed. Then Cuthbert sent away the servant, and seeing God's merciful sleep wash clear the last trace of sorrow from that innocent face, sat down by the bedside to pass the night alone with a man's most terrible anguish, and listen for every sound that might mean news of her, like a prisoner with his ear strained for the footstep which may bring him some vainly-dreamed reprieve, wearing through the hours that spin toward his gibbet.

One hour, two, three passed by, and his agony grew more unendurable with every clock-stroke. At length he rose, took his candle, and descended the stairs. An icy shudder ran through him as he passed the door through whose crevice he once thought he saw that horrible vision. "Oh, darling—wronged, cruelly wronged darling! Oh, Derrick, wickedly-bellied friend, would to God!" he groined—"would to God I had you here for one moment—if only to ask your forgiveness for the injustice of that mad delirium—to hear you pardon me—to know you, my darling, were safe, even if I never might see you after! Oh, Derrick!—oh, my brother! would to God you were here in this dreadful time to tell me where to turn!"

But though he remembered the delirium, he did not remember the devil that had caused it. He went to the dining-room, opened the side-board, took from it a decanter, poured out a full tumbler of whisky, and drank it at one fiery gulp, then carried the decanter with him to his room and sat down again by the bedside.

The fumes of the liquor mounted at once to his brain. He had been so long without the stimulus that, in his exhausted state, it yielded him its most generous influence. It lifted him forthwith out of his abyss of nerveless despair; showed him a possible future; cut instantly short his self-drowning meditations, and hurled him point-blank upon executive action. What? should he sit here, doing nothing, when, if his wife did not return by morning, he should have placards up on every tree in the county, advertisements in every paper in the State, offering rewards of any conceivable liberality for her recovery, living or dead? His whole scheme of action, under the wand of that potent magician he had just evoked, lay crystal clear before his eyes. Again he rose, and going on tip-toe to his desk, opened it to get writing materials and prepare the advertisements.

What? Lying conspicuously on the top of his neatly-folded papers, a new letter that he had never seen before—directed in his wife's hand to Cuthbert Kearney! He had not been absent from her long enough to have any correspondence with her since they were married till he moved to Kentucky—and the growingly meagre little notes which had come to him while away on Derrick's business were all sacredly filed and put away in the strong-box, where every tiniest love-letter of their courtship lay cherished in rosy swathings of ribbon, along with withered flowers and golden curls which had made him beside himself in the day of their getting, and could thrill him as deeply to this hour whenever he took them in his reverent fingers. A letter from her! He laughed aloud. This would explain all the mystery. To think that he should have suffered thus all these hours, when she had taken the pains to tell him why she had been called suddenly away—the little rogue! But why couldn't she have put it on the bureau? Her delicacy no doubt! Some stranger might get at it—but he must scold her when she got back for the fright she'd given him. Not even trust Perro and Kledda! He kissed the tremulous traces of her little dimpled hand—he broke the seal with nervous fingers—held the letter close to the candle, and read. Read for a moment—rubbed his eyes with his knuckles—looked vaguely round the room like a man assuring himself of his whereabouts by sight of some familiar object—read again—and relaxing his grasp of the sheet, finger by finger, with a heart-rending groan dropped lifeless on his face.

Instantly awakened, Lily leaped up and ran to him—cried to him—tugged to raise him with her tiny strength—then, finding all effort vain, rushed to the head of the stairs and roused the household with her cries:

"Papa is dead—papa is dead!"

LOVE-LOCKS.

IN Arcady's fair groves there dwells
A wizard, and 'tis there he sells
All sorts of cunning beauty spells,
From snow-white skins to blushes:
For pretty girls are scented toys;
Young men can buy pomade Hongroise;
There's hair-dye for the gay old boys,
And ivory-backed brushes.

There beauty's tresses are unfurled,
There sweldom's blonde mustache is twirled,
And darlings who have curls are curled,
While those who've none buy plenty:
The wizard keeps the key, 'tis true,
To turn gray locks to raven hue,
And makes bald coots of eighty-two Become smart youths of twenty.

My hair is getting thin, and so
To Arcady I sometimes go
In search of "balm," for you must know
I hold "Dum spiro, spero."
Though washes of all sorts I've tried,
And countless ointments have applied,
Old Time has made my parting wide,
And sunk my hopes to zero.

The other day it came to pass,
As I sat down before the glass,
I saw reflected there, alas,
A face grown old and jaded:
That face was scored by lines of care,
The forehead was quite high and bare;
For, strange to say, the thick black hair
Of other days had faded!

Ah, how that face has changed since times
Long past away, when at "The Limes"
My laughter rang with midnight chimes—
My song was gay and early!
Then hearts were hearts, and blue were skies,
And tender were sweet Lucy's eyes;
When I believed in woman's sighs,
My locks were thick and curly!

As Mr. Wizard snips and snips
I think of Lucy's laughing lips,
And while he just "takes off the tips"
I muse on by-gone pleasures:
At home I have a tiny tress
Of soft brown hair; I must confess,
Although it caused me much distress,
'Tis treasured mid my treasures.

Ah, would that night come back again
When she took from her châtelaine
Her scissors!—it was not in vain.
I hear her laugh the while her
Soft white dainty fingers thrill,
As youthful locks she cuts with skill,
While I, like Samson, but sit still
And smile on sweet Delilah.

When black and brown locks interlace,
Or scented tresses sweep your face,
While laughter unto sighs gives place,
And pouting lips are present;
Or meek gray eyes droop still more meek,
And dimples play at hide and seek,
There's but one language lips can speak—
'Tis brief, but rather pleasant!

* * * * *
In place of Lucy's hand I feel
The chilly touch of wizard's steel,
Who brings me back from the ideal,
By talk of lime-juice water;
And beauty's fingers no more hold
My locks—they're by the barber sold
To stuff arm-chairs; sometimes, I'm told,
They're used to mix with mortar!

My early love has proved a myth;
Fair Lucy wedded Mr. Smith,
Whom people say she's happy with—
Indeed, I do not doubt them.
'Tis hard to steer among the rocks
Of life without some awkward knocks;
They say that "Love laughs loud at locks"—
He howls at those without them!

THE BLOOD-STONE AND THE OPAL.

CONCERNING the blood-stone, or heliotrope, there is a curious tradition: "At the Crucifixion the blood which followed the spear-thrust fell upon a dark green jasper lying at the foot of the cross, and from this circumstance sprang the variety. In the Middle Ages the red specks alluded to were supposed to represent the blood of Christ, and this stone to possess the same medicinal and magical virtues as the jasper."

The opal, beyond doubt the most beautiful of all gems, is also the only one which can not be imitated. It is impossible to value it, since the price depends solely upon the play of color. A fine specimen will fetch a thousand pounds: but fifty times that sum has been refused in the case of the Vienna opal. The hydrophane, or Mexican opal, loses its beauty when exposed to water; and Sir Walter Scott has alluded to this fact in "Anne of Geierstein," although, in that romance, he ascribes it to supernatural agency. Strange to say, after the publication of the novel, the belief that opals were unlucky obtained such currency that they quickly went out of fashion.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

T. P.—None of the serial stories, originally published in the Bazar, have been issued in a separate form. Any desired numbers, or even complete sets of the paper, can still be procured from the publishers, on personal application or by mail.

SUBSCRIBER.—Several riding habits, with practical patterns and descriptions, will be given in the next number and Supplement of Harper's Bazar.

YOUNG MATRON.—Broiled bones are easily prepared. Pepper and salt the bones well, place them on the gridiron over a clear fire, and turn them occasionally till done. Before serving moisten with a little butter. For deviled kidney split the kidneys open lengthwise without dividing them, strip off the skin and fat, score them and rub in mustard and Cayenne pepper. Run a fine skewer through the points and across the back of the kidneys, to keep them flat while broiling, and lay them over a brisk fire with the cut sides toward it. Turn them in four or five minutes, and in as many more dish and serve quickly.

HOUSEKEEPER.—The waiter should always serve every one at table on the left. There is a story told of a negro servant of Washington, who, not being able to distinguish between the right and left, was instructed to serve the guests on the side where he saw the buttons, which it was then customary to wear in a single row on the left breast of the coat. With this guide Pompey found it plain sailing until there came a guest freshly arrived from France with the new fashion of a double row of buttons. Pompey looked first at the one side and then at the other, and was for a moment terribly perplexed. He, however, soon came to the wise conclusion that the gentleman, having two sets of buttons, was entitled to be waited upon all around, and accordingly grasping the plate with two hands thrust it over the guest's head with a grin of triumph.

FILIVS.—You ask us a nice question, which we prefer to leave to the decision of your own conscience.

X. Y. Z.—Your inquiry about the wholesomeness of the artificial mineral waters, now so much in vogue, is not easy to answer. You might as well ask whether the contents of an apothecary's shop are wholesome. A healthy person had better not have any thing to do with either, and the sick must take the advice of their doctor in regard to their use.

SUFFERER.—Since the article on the foot you allude to, published in the Bazar, two remedies for that painful affection of the toe-nail growing into the flesh have been recommended by the French Academy. These are perchloride of iron and nitrate of lead to be applied directly to the part affected.

MRS. C. B. ALLEN.—Make your dress with but one skirt, as you are short and stout. If you have material enough, put a flounce round the skirt, cut bias, eight inches wide, with one-third of the length extra for fullness. If you have not enough for this put two cross-cut bands about a quarter of a yard from the edge of the skirt, with a row of cord fringe beneath. Make the wrap the shape of the "Undine" given in Harper's Bazar. It may be worn with a belt or without, and is especially suited to short figures.

AN ADMIRER.—Valenciennes lace is being very much used abroad for trimming silks. Cluny lace was never in good taste for lining silk, and is now entirely out of fashion. Why not trim your chameleon with satin bands the shade of the blue of your dress, and pipe it with white satin? An edging of white or of black blonde on both sides of the band will be in good taste. You need not object to ruffles because they are so common, as there is really nothing newer. A wide flounce at the bottom of the dress relieves it of the stiffness that always accompanies the sloped skirts.

A LOVER OF LACE.—Fastidious people object to lama lace because it is a woven lace, and consequently an imitation. The Princesse lace is of the same class. A fichu of plain tulle may be made for seven dollars, which is less than half the price of a lama fichu.

ANNIE.—You can order a Spanish veil from a New York milliner, and attach it yourself to the bonnet. If made of embroidered tulle, and edged with real thread, the price is about eight dollars. They are the most select style of the season, and are becoming to every style of face.

SALLIE.—Make the breadths less sloping toward the top, in order to give them more fullness. The skirt should be gathered—slightly in the front breadths, and very full at the back. Both organdy and ribbon sashes are used. Organdy sashes are ruffled or bordered with lace. Sometimes the trimming only extends across the end and a quarter of a yard up each side. If the material is solid colored, a bunch of tucks at the end of the sash is very pretty.

READER.—In these lines of Tennyson—

And seems to lift the form, and glow
In azure orbits heavenly wise,
And over those ethereal eyes,
The bar of Michael Angelo—

The bar of Michael Angelo alludes to the meeting of the eyebrows, which was a marked feature in the face of the great painter. "The union of the two eyebrows," says the author of "Woman's Beauty," in Harper's Magazine, "was esteemed by the Romans a beauty. They admired the air of severe dignity it gives to the face."

A. B. WIFE, WOMAN'S RIGHTS, R. S. K., ETC.—The following opinion of "Our Counselor" in regard to the legal rights of women will, we hope, be a satisfactory answer to your numerous inquiries. Under the English law, which prevailed in this State until recently, and was the effect of the old feudal system, which placed the wife, in the language of the lawyers, sub potestate viri. A wife could make no will of her separate property. In order to provide against this hindrance, ante-nuptial settlements and the creation of trusts were resorted to, in default of which, however, upon the decease of the wife, all her personal estate descended to the husband by right of marriage; and with respect to the real estate, the possession of it went to him for life, provided there was a child born alive, and upon his death the issue took as heirs at law. Our Legislature, since 1848, has made radical changes in this old feudal doctrine and law.

Now, however, any woman, married or single, of full age, can dispose of her real property, by deed or will, without the consent of her husband, and can dispose of her personal property by will even at the age of sixteen; a married woman now can be an executrix or administratrix of an estate, or a guardian of a minor. She can also be a witness for or against her husband in all matters except in criminal actions or proceedings, or in cases of bigamy or divorce. This, by the old law, was not permitted. By the old law, even in cases of separation and living apart, a wife's personal property and earnings became the property of the husband, subject to his sole disposition. We have changed all that, and now a wife, trading alone, is protected against the debts, improvidence, or misfortunes of the husband, and safe from his creditors.

As an illustration of the effect of the old prohibitory law, and a case not of unfrequent occurrence: A wife, restrained from disposing of her property, died leaving one child; the husband, entitled to the income for life, took possession, and the child having died, the husband took the entire estate as heir at law, and thus the inheritance passed entirely to strangers—a grievance deplored from time immemorial, and alluded to in the Old Testament.

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly-invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by News-dealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

WHAT I SAW.

I saw ladies stick their fingers through gold rings, and very nimble at the piano, but who could not cook dinner! I saw men in the pulpit who looked very devout and humble, but who acted like devils in their own families! I saw men strutting in rich apparel on Broadway who would starve if their mothers forsook the wash-tub! I saw people pay hundreds of dollars for poison in the shape of pills, powders, or tonics, and grow weaker daily, when it would not cost them a cent to try WOLCOTT'S PAIN PAINT, at 170 Chatham Square, New York, and get relief or be cured at one application.

LOVE OR MARRIAGE? A Novel. By WILLIAM BLACK. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

An interesting plot, honest, earnest thought, and graceful language.—London Review.

The composition of a cultivated mind; it is full of thought, of careful writing, of pithy, of pungent, of epigrammatical remarks, and it is eloquent in suggestiveness.—London Leader.

The tale is simple enough, but well told, and in that lies its chief charm.—Athenaeum. This novel is one of great power... It is certainly the production of an imagination—we may almost say of a genius—which we should conceive fully capable of works of art that might live.—Spectator.

THE GREAT NEW ENGLAND REMEDY.

DR. J. W. POLAND'S WHITE PINE COMPOUND

Is now offered to the afflicted throughout the country, after having been proved by the test of twelve years in the New England States, where its merits have become as well known as the tree from which, in part, it derives its virtues.

THE WHITE PINE COMPOUND

Sore Throat, Colds, Coughs, Diphtheria, Bronchitis, Spitting of Blood, and Pulmonary Affections generally. It is a remarkable Remedy for Kidney Complaints.

This medicine is free from any thing deleterious, pleasant to the taste, safe, yet sure and effective in its action.

From the Boston Journal.

Boston, January 20, 1866.

POLAND'S WHITE PINE COMPOUND.—After having given it a thorough trial, we can confidently recommend Poland's White Pine Compound as a very valuable article for the cure of colds, coughs, and pulmonary complaints generally. In several cases we have known it to give prompt relief when all other remedies which had been tried had failed. It is an article which, in a climate so promotive of sudden and severe colds as is that of New England, ought to be in every family; and we are sure that those who once obtain it and give it a fair trial will not thereafter be willing to be without it.

A VALUABLE MEDICINE.—Dr. Poland's White Pine Compound, advertised in our columns, is a successful attempt to combine and apply the medicinal virtues of the White Pine bark. It has been thoroughly tested by people in this city and vicinity, and the proprietor has testimonials to its value from persons well known to our citizens. We recommend its trial in all those cases of disease to which it is adapted. It is for sale by all our druggists.—Independent.

The White Pine Compound is now sold in every part of the United States and British Provinces.

DESIGN AFTER NATURE—THE DOVE STYLE.

YOUNG LADIES WHO AFFECT THE SHORT SKIRT NOW IN VOGUE ARE CAUTIONED AGAINST THE WITCHING HOUR OF SUNSET.

FACETIÆ.

"How old is your mamma?" asked a love-smitten old bachelor of the daughter of the widow who had enchanted him. "I don't know, Sir; ma's age varies from about forty-three to twenty-five," was the artless reply; and the bachelor was disenchanted.

An observing individual, in a very healthy village, seeing the sexton at work in a hole in the ground, inquired what he was about. "Digging a grave, Sir." "Digging a grave! Why, I thought people didn't die often here—do they?" "Oh, no, Sir; they never die but once."

"You are very pressing," as the filberts said to the nut-crackers.

A young man sent his father in the country his photograph, stating that he was poor and required money. The father refused, stating that he could not be very poor to be living surrounded by marble vases, rosewood furniture, and choice flowers, as his photograph represented him.

AN AGRICULTURAL CONUNDRUM.—Why should a man never tell his secrets in a corn-field?—Because it has so many ears.

A lady, whose son was eaten by cannibals, pleasantly remarked that he was killed and buried the same hour.

A BIRD OF PASSAGE—Matilda Heron.

AN ENERGETIC CROQUET PARTY MEET TO PREPARE THEIR GROUND.

CROQUET MANIAC (a trifle jealous, perhaps). "Well, if Ellen does not mean to Help us, she need not make Major Mallet Idle, too!"

WHAT MARRIAGE IS LIKE. —Marriage is like a silk purse, most agreeable to bear when there is plenty of money in it. Marriage is like a mouse-trap—once get into it and you are in for it, with a very slim chance for getting out. Marriage is like a roast leg of mutton on Sunday, served up on Monday, ditto, with pickles, on Tuesday, and hashed up on Wednesday.

A stump-speaker exclaimed, "I know no north, no south, no east, no west, fellow-citizens!" "Then," exclaimed an old farmer in the crowd, "it's time you went to school and larnt jography."

The latest invention is said to be ink made from India rubber. It has been suggested that writers inclined to "stretch a story" will make use of the article.

Be temperate in diet. Our first parents ate themselves out of house and home.

It is proposed to take down the sign-boards "Look out for the Engine" on the Erie Railroad, and substitute for them, "Prepare to meet your God."

"I say, Mr. Pilot, ain't you going to start soon?" said a nervous traveler on a steamboat lying to during a fog. "As soon as the fog clears up," replied the captain. "Well, it's starlight now overhead," said the man. "Oh, yes; but we are not going that way."

TO BOTANISTS.—Has Patmos any affinity with Irish moss?

ITINERANT VENDOR (to Mary the Housemaid). "Wouldn't yer Lady like a Pretty Cap or Two? Yer might want to give one of the Servants a Little Present."

[We are but human, and Mary makes an extensive purchase on the spot.]

M'FOODLE. "Aw, Yes; that's the Last I had done, and it's considered an awfully Good Photo; Aw!"

SWEETEST OF HER SEX (most innocently?). "Yes, it's a Capital Photograph, but it doesn't make a Pretty Picture."

[The more M'Foodle thinks it over in his mind the more evident it becomes to him that the fact of its being a Good Photograph precludes the possibility of its being a Pretty Picture, and he rejoices accordingly.]

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1868, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

Embroidered Work-Bag.

THIS work-bag is of cloth, with application figures, and is especially designed for holding netted guipure work and the square frames which are requisite for it. The original is eight inches in width by seven in height, and is made of scarlet cloth, which is ornamented with application embroidery. The inside is lined with a thin layer of batting, covered with light green satin, and quilted in diamonds. The outer edge is bordered with black and white silk cord. The handle is also formed of the same cord, and the upper corners finished with colored silk tassels in the manner shown in the illustration. The flap is buttoned down by means of button-hole-stitch loops, corresponding in size to the buttons. For making the pocket cut of scarlet cloth, green satin, and a thin layer of cotton batting a piece eight inches in width by eighteen inches in length for the front and back of the pocket, and the wide flap, which is four inches wide. Begin by quilting together the satin and wadding in diamonds, then lay this on the cloth, which has previously been embroidered in application, according to the design given by Fig. 60 of the Supplement. This design, however, serves only for the front and back of the pocket, while the illustration shows the design for the flap. The application figures are of black and white cloth—the black composing the application border on the front and back of the pocket and the flap, and also the large central figures; the remaining figures are of white cloth. All the figures are sewed on with colored sewing-silk, care being taken to closely follow the pattern. This done, run the edges together, overcast the back and front fast on both sides where the material is turned over, and set on the cord, tassels, button-hole-stitch loops, and small green satin buttons in the manner shown in the illustration.

EMBROIDERED WORK-BAG.—REDUCED SIZE.
For pattern see Supplement, No. XXII, Fig. 60.

last few years. The East India cotton, which has been to a large extent substituted for the American since the beginning of the late civil war, being of inferior quality, renders the fabric less durable and coarser; and many housekeepers, on buying brands which have long enjoyed a high and well-deserved fame, have been disappointed at finding them wretched—the result of a mixture of two-thirds East Indian and one-third American cotton.

Our home products may be qualified as good. They are carefully and strongly woven, and the printing is fine. The great lack is in variety and happy combination of colors. This branch of manufacture is comparatively young in America, and it would be impossible in so short a time successfully to rival European manufacture.

The dyeing, printing, washing, and stiffening are of the highest importance in calico manufacture. Black dyes are in general destructive to both cotton and woolen threads. Thus far no chemical substance has been generally known or used exempt from this defect. A few dyeing establishments possess the secret of a non-corrosive dye which does not disproportionately increase the weight of the material, but these keep the secret carefully concealed. Perfection in the latter point is very seldom obtained, as the earthy and mineral substances generally employed adhere strongly, and fill up the interstices of the fabric.

Greens, if obtained from vegetable extracts, whether bark or juice, are harmless, and not apt to fade. The most beautiful shades, however, are dangerous and almost deadly to the wearer; Paris green is employed in all of them, and we warn our readers not to be dazzled by their beauty, for they are the cause of many an unexplained headache and attack of nervousness.

Yellow is the best and most lasting dye.

Light blue and brown are also to be commended. Dark brown is corrosive, and renders the goods heavy. Crimson, carmine—in a word, red, in all its combinations with other colors, is harmless and durable.

As a rule, we may say that all neutral colors do not weaken the thread, and are not liable to fade from washing or exposure to the light. Bright and positive colors fade quickly, and are usually corrosive. All bright colors attract and absorb a greater quantity of oxygen from the atmosphere, and this it is that makes them fade, or rather burn away.

The dressing of calicoes is a dangerous trap in which many of our readers have often been caught, and will be again. Goods are offered them of the most promising appearance, with a silky gloss, clear print, and brilliant colors, but, alas! of the stuff that dreams are made of; a little wearing, a little washing, and only a flimsy rag remains. All the low-priced cotton prints are highly stiffened by means of strong solutions of gum-arabic and starch. These substances, being soluble in water, carry off the color and leave the thread bare. This is easily proved. Take a piece of calico, ascertain its exact weight, lay it in water for an hour or two, wring it dry, and weigh it again; one-fifth of the whole weight will be gone, and the colors will be either blurred together or entirely washed off.

It is a curious thing to observe the different tastes all over the world. Patterns that are in the greatest favor in one place are valueless in another. A slight shade in the tint of brown, or red, or violet, is the delight of one country, and is abhorred every where else. Neutral colors such as gray, brown, black, violet, lilac, etc., in all their shades, and small patterns, representing flowers, wreaths, square, and various geometrical figures and lines, are those most called for by the most civilized modern nations. Bright colors, in large and conspicuous patterns, are, or were, most in favor among the negroes of the South, though it is said that they are already beginning to eschew them as connected in some way with their former slavery, and to desire nothing but small, neat figures in quiet, neutral tints. In the West Indies stripes are most in demand; in Mexico, bright red and yellow, large flowers, figures, etc.

We will say, in conclusion:—In buying calicoes choose colors that will not fade; see that the interstices between the threads are not filled up, but can easily be seen through, that the thread is even, and the goods not disproportionately heavy, and you will most likely buy something that will be durable, and will look well as long as it lasts.

CALICO MANUFACTURE.

NOTWITHSTANDING England commands the cotton trade all over the world, and furnishes two-thirds of the goods consumed, we can not give her calicoes the first place in respect to quality. In clear and tasteful printing, firm texture, and strong and even thread, the French calicoes are incontestably superior to all others. With respect to price they are always three or four cents a yard dearer than the English goods. Great knowledge and skill preside over the French printing-works; the substances employed for dyes are carefully selected and prepared, and no strong or corroding chemicals are employed. A vast amount of labor is required in the manufacture, eight or nine different impressions being necessary to obtain the various colors and designs.

In the Mulhouse or Colman factories the use of more innocent substances than those employed in the general use of the English mills has greatly contributed to the success which they have enjoyed during the last few years. The goods manufactured there may be easily recognized by the brightness of the color, the clearness of the printing, and the excellent quality of the texture.

The print of the English calicoes is generally good, but is less clear and careful than the French. The art of giving an attractive appearance to an inferior quality of goods by stiffening and mangling is largely practiced in the Lancashire mills. The strong-looking, bright, and seemingly well-dyed calico, which promises to wear for years to come, often fades out and becomes flimsy on the first washing. English calicoes have deteriorated greatly within the

OUT OF THE SHADOW.

WELCOME her back to the board and the hearth!
Long hath she languished in sorrow and pain;
Sad was the household and hushed was the mirth—
Let the house ring with sweet laughter again.
Long hath the death-angel hung o'er thy home:
Now he hath fled let the joy spirits come;
Sunshine and music shall brighten thy track;
Home shall be home again—welcome her back.

Soon shall the pallid cheek flush like the rose;
Soon will the languid heart strengthen and thrill;
Soon shall the crimson tide, melting the snows,
Rush through the veins till they darken and fill.
She will be hopeful and cheerful ere long;
Daily her step will grow steady and strong;
Out from the clouds of death, gloomy and black,
Welcome her back again—welcome her back.

Out of the shadow into the sun;
Out of the sunshine into the shade;
Thus doth the life-stream of destiny run;
Happy are they who are never afraid.
Strong is the hand that hath guided thy bark
Into the sun again out of the dark;
Music and laughter shall brighten thy track;
Home shall be home again—welcome her back.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

OUTSIDE SHOW.

THE Americans, like most other people, are worshipers of success, but none equal them in the eagerness to demonstrate it. Those who have worldly prosperity take care to exhibit it by every possible outward manifestation. Thus they construct large and ornate mansions in the most frequented and fashionable thoroughfares, fill their show-rooms with the most gorgeous and expensive furniture, which neither utility nor taste can justify, and set up equipages covered with costly gingerbread-work, and drawn by horses at a cost of thousands of dollars.

Those who have wealth must needs spend it; but it would be well if they were guided in its expenditure more by a regard to taste and the refined enjoyment of life, than by a desire to prove their possession of riches by the outward display of them. They might thus become, by showing others the right use of money, public benefactors, instead of, as they too often are, dangerous exemplars of its waste. If they were less demonstrative of their costly splendor, they would have fewer imitators among those, with less means, who follow them to their ruin.

The rich throw the glitter of their wealth so profusely into the eyes, and sound the jingle of their dollars so loudly into the ears of the multitude, that, dazzled and confused, it loses its sight and hearing for aught else. The comparatively poor thus, even if they have not the wealth or the dollars, must have the glitter and the jingle.

An outward manifestation of wealth is so associated with the idea of prosperity and respectability that without it these are hardly supposed to be possessed. Wives are probably greatly responsible for the prevalence of this false and dangerous notion. Husbands, it might be supposed, would have a sufficient gauge of their success and respectability in their bank accounts and the consideration of their fellow-traders. The big house, the gorgeous furniture, and the costly pair of horses, would not surely in Wall Street or Broadway be placed to the merchant's credit. They would rather be written on the opposite side of the ledger.

To the wife, however, these showy symbols of riches are essential to establish and keep up her respectability. And what does this respectability do for her? It fills her visiting-list with a hundred names of fashionables, ninety-nine of whom probably are playing, with big houses, gorgeous furniture, and gay equipage, the same game of sham as herself. It secures her the patronage of Mr. Brown, or some other equally authorized arbitrator elegantiarum, who sends her twelve invitations to balls and parties every six days of the week, and supplies her twice or three times each season with an unknown throng of white-gloved male and female boobies, to stamp out the flowers of her Aubusson carpet, and eat oysters and drink Champagne at her expense.

This is all that she can possibly estimate as a gain to herself from that kind of respectability. The expenditure of money, the dissipation of body and mind, the neglect of all household duty, the ruin of her husband, and the destruction of her children make up the sum of certain and probable loss.

BATHING.

THE whole body should be washed with water at least once a day. This is a necessity which is enjoined upon every human being by the peculiar structure and functions of his skin. Keep as free as we may from all external sources of dirt, there will be a daily accumulation of it on the surface of the body requiring removal.

The skin itself, in the performance of its natural functions, throws out a quantity of impurities, which, if not washed away almost as soon as deposited, will not only obstruct the healthy action of the integument, but of all other parts of the body. This natural dirt, which is, however, none the less dirt of the dirtiest kind, is composed of the cast-off scales, the oily secretions, and various matters of the perspiration of the skin. These, if allowed to remain, become massed together, and hardened into a crust of filth, which clogs the pores, and hinders the performance of their functions, so important to health and life. If the skin thus fails, from want of cleanliness, to perform its duties, the internal organs are forced to assume them, and being overtasked, become weakened and diseased from the excess of labor. Consumption and dyspepsia, with various other diseases of the lungs, liver, and stomach, are the frequent results. The skin itself too becomes, from the irritation of its accumulated dirt, the seat of ugly eruptions, and a ready recipient of every infectious and contagious disorder.

The obvious skin purifier is water; and this, we repeat, should be applied to all parts of the body at least once in every twenty-four hours. It is astonishing how little of it is required to do the necessary washing of the habitually cleanly. Miss Nightingale says that no one who can command a tea-cup of cold water has any excuse for neglecting to bathe the whole person daily.

The moistened sponge, the bathing-tub, and the shower-bath are the ordinary modes of performing the daily ablution. In beginning the practice the water should be tepid, but when once well established it may be of the lowest temperature. The great point in bathing is to make sure of what is called the reaction; that is, a glow of warmth immediately following the chill produced by the contact of cold water with the surface of the body. This reaction is felt generally by every vigorous person, and may be secured by the weakly if proper precautions are taken. No person should take his bath immediately after a full meal, and it especially behooves the feeble to obey this rule, whose diminished nervous power will be so taken up with the labor of digestion that there will be no force to spare for any fresh effort. Those who are not strong had better confine themselves to the wet sponge, as by this the ablution of the body can be performed by degrees, and the intensity of the cold shock proportionately diminished.

There should be always two towels used, one for the drying, and the other, of a coarser texture, for the rubbing of the body. To this may be added, in cases of excessive torpidity, the hair glove or flesh-brush. Rapidity of action is of great moment. The water, whatever may be the mode of using it, should be briskly applied, and the drying, rubbing, and all other subsequent processes be performed with equal dispatch. The apartment where the bath is taken should be of a warm temperature, and the under-clothing to be put on ought to be previously heated at the fire. The feeblest, with such precautions, can take their cold baths in the coldest weather.

The shower-bath ought always to be adapted to the sensations of the bather; the fall and temperature of the water should be no greater and lower than is agreeable. Any one who finds it uncomfortable must not persist in it with the idea that, however painful its application, it may be useful. The shower-bath, tempered to suit the sensations, may always be taken with advantage, except by persons in advanced life with an evident tendency to fullness of the head.

Sea-bathing has the especial advantage over any other kind of producing, by means of the salt-water, an irritation of the surface of the body, and thus securing with greater certainty the desirable reaction.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

A Letter to Belinda.

MY DEAR BELINDA,—How little you supposed that one of the old gentlemen who sat not far from you in the Mall at the Central Park last Saturday, listening to the music, and—such was the loudness of your voice—to your little gossip with your companion was the very subject of your criticism and censure. My friend was Mr. Peter Paul Pry, who was so troubled, not so much by what you said as by the fact that he overheard it, that his old fashioned sense of honor persuaded him that he ought to come to you at once, and say, “Madame, my companion is Mr. Bachelor. We have most inadvertently heard every word you were saying about him, and we most humbly beg your pardon.”

What would you have said if he had done so? But I restrained him. I told him that his instinctive wish to speak with you was most honorable, but that—such were the differences of manners in these extraordinary days—you might think yourself insulted by being addressed in a public place by a gentleman whom you did not know, and call upon the Park police for protection. Peter Paul Pry looked at me in amazement.

“Well,” he said at length, “times do change and manners. Why, Bachelor, manners upon the road or in the Park were different in my grandmother's time. She was sitting one summer evening—how many years ago!—breathing the fresh air upon the Battery in the days when it was not an emigrant dépôt, and talking with a friend she said that she had always heard that Aaron Burr was really an old man, and very ugly. Just as she spoke a gentleman, who was passing with a friend, suddenly turned and said, “Excuse me, Madame, I could not help hearing. But I assure you that Mr. Burr is not forty-five, and that he is no worse looking than your humble servant!” He bowed with great courtesy, and my grandmother, with mingled dignity and sweetness—for I remember her manner well—replied, “Thank you, Sir.” She partly raised herself, and bowed. The unknown gentleman lifted his hat and returned her salutation, then passed on. It turned out that the gentleman was Aaron Burr himself!

I suppose, dear Belinda, that you think such an incident is only possible in an age of minuets and high heels. Perhaps so; but I observed on Sunday that your heels are as high as Queen Elizabeth's, and as for minuets, if we are to have waists under the arm-pits, as you ladies seem resolved that we shall, why should not minuets return? My sister Smith has a miniature of me taken when I was just thirty, dressed in a coat with a collar so enormously high behind that my head is positively projected forward, and that preposterous collar seems to wink at me on both sides of my blooming young face, and whispers to me, “Hold on, my hearty; we shall all come round again.”

Now I certainly am not anxious to see the return of any stupid old fashions or manners of the stately Spanish school. I do not want to see duennas, nor do I wish that you girls should be incarcerated in convents, beyond all knowledge of men and manners, and of the world in which you are to live, and then taken out to be introduced to Monsieur le Comte Vaurien, your future husband. But is there no middle ground between the minuet, we will say, danced by Spanish grandees of both sexes and the can-can danced by the demi-monde? Must mankind make their choice between Irving's prim Miss Hannah with her verjuice aspect, who gave her word to Christy the huntsman, and Gérôme's Almé? Pooh, pooh, Belinda! I happen to know Mrs. Margery Honeysuckle, and therefore I know better. When I see you and your girl friends going with Diamond, Turquoise, and the rest to see the Grande Duchesse, and then repairing with those gentlemen to Delmonico's to sup and to discuss whether La Grande Duchesse is a proper or an improper performance, I am transfixed. I put down my spoonful of Roman punch, and I say to myself, “If I had a daughter, and she were to do this thing, could I saunter as complacently along the Avenue in the moonlight as I propose to do when I have consumed my light refreshment?”

Do you suppose that men do not discriminate? I don't mean philosophers upon high moral principles, but the Rubies and Turquoises and their kind, by instinct? You know what I overheard in the Mall. You were saying:

“That dreary old Mr. Bachelor evidently doesn't want us girls to have any fun. I suppose he'd like to have us all wear sackcloth and read ‘Baxter's Call,’ and tend hospitals or our own nurseries all our lives. Why doesn't he understand that girls will be girls, and not advise us to mope and disfigure ourselves? I should like to see him and his sex practice a little upon the fine advice they are all the time giving us.”

This was what you said, and what Peter Paul Pry wanted to inform you that we had heard. But my feeling was that we ought to spare you the mortification of knowing that we had accidentally overheard you. When I said this earnestly to my companion he replied, with a shake of his head:

“I am not so sure, after what you tell me the papers say of the ‘girl of the period,’ that she would be mortified. I rather think she might tranquilly look at me and say, ‘Listeners never hear any good of themselves.’”

Now, Belinda, have I ever said or suggested any thing so hard of you as this, which fell naturally from the lips of that pink of old-fashioned courtesy, Mr. Pry? I protest that you do yourself and me the greatest wrong when you say that my little strictures tend to cynicism and mortification and dullness and gloom. Why, my dear, look at my cravats, and worn, too, at my years—do they look ascetic? Do I go clad in the sombre suit of black which is said to be the only proper costume for an elderly man, as if he were to be draped in mourning for his dead youth, or for his approaching demise altogether? Do I fly the face of youthful man and woman, meditate with Hervey among the tombs, and turn elegiac verses? Inasmuch as Peter Paul Pry and I had been complimenting to each other the neat and graceful and lovely attire of Emily Agnus, who passed us in the Mall—only just before your unhappy remark—and as we daily walk and view the pretty sights of the city and comment gayly thereupon, and enjoy to the utmost the spectacle of freshness and youth wherever we meet it—when I had restrained his ardent desire to tell you that we had heard what you said, we both reflected upon it for a moment, and simultaneously turning to each other—

“How are you, Timon?” said Pry.

“How are you, Stylites?” said I.

Then we both laughed, and he told me by—and-by the story of his grandmother and Aaron Burr.

Belinda, my dear, I can put my whole philosophy of this matter in one simple little question—isn't a blush-rose more beautiful to you than a peony? In a cluster upon the lawn, against a dark evergreen border, I do not deny that the peony may be more impressive; but for your own hand, for the glass upon your table, for your hair? Now, what I advise is, hostility to extremes in manner and in dress. Last Saturday I was invited to dine with Mrs. Clover, to meet Mrs. Margery Honeysuckle; and you may be very sure that I put on my freshest white cravat and white waistcoat, and was very punctual at six o'clock. Just as I was going into the drawing-room, Mrs. Margery arrived. Her hair was simply, not elaborately arranged, but in the mode of the moment, and a moss-rosebud was twisted in it. Her dress was a white muslin, exquisitely made, with a blue ribbon around the waist, gathered in the most ample and luxuriant bow behind, the long ends streaming down over the skirt. She wore a turquoise necklace and bracelet, and she carried a pretty fan. She was entirely in the fashion.

By-and-by Mrs. Montgomery de Rohan, the bride, entered. She is younger than Mrs. Margery; but her dress was a marvel and a bewilderment. It was all of colored silks, furbelowed, and looped, and festooned, and covered with the costliest lace, and caught with pearls. She was heavy with gems. The bosom of her dress was crusted with them. She rattled and rustled as she moved. It was the frantic excess of every present extravagance of fashion. De Rohan, the Frenchman who married her for her money, looked quite indifferent. Mrs. De Rohan herself was evidently painfully conscious of her fine clothes, and as I looked at her and reflected that she was positively of no more use and of a great deal more harm in the world, from her expensive uselessness, than the splendid butterfly that floated by you in the Mall as you satirized me the other day, I could not help resolving to preach my little sermon louder than ever, that a woman, however rich she may be, while she yields to the changing fashion, should avoid its wild excesses. The moment a woman is evidently nervously conscious of her dress, the moment it is plain that her life is a study of her clothes—and if it be so, the most artful can not conceal it—all is over. It is an appetite, as the love of whisky is. She will dress more and more, as a man drinks more and more, until she becomes such a spectacle as old Mrs. Periwinkle. That woman wears the bonnets of nineteen—and she is a great-grandmother!

I said that men discriminate instinctively, and I said so, not because the favor of men should be the motive of your conduct, but because it so often is the motive. The pleasant fellows who sup with you at Delmonico's, and discuss the propriety of the Grande Duchesse, are often doomed by you and your friends to celibacy. Do you think they wish to marry girls whom you teach them not quite to respect? Do you think they can afford to marry girls whose extravagance you prove to them? No, no, Belinda; it is not that I am no friend of flowers, as you suppose, but I prefer the real blossoms to the most elaborate artificial work. For true enjoyment I would not exchange this white rose in the glass beside me for all that remarkable wreath of muslin roses upon your bonnet.

Your young friend,
AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

TRAVELING TRUNKS.

IN selecting a trunk for the journeys that almost every one contemplates at this season, the purchaser finds a variety from which to choose. The Bazar advises its readers not to buy a cheap trunk, for an essential requisite to the enjoyment of a tour is the knowledge that the baggage is secure; and anxiety about a lady's wardrobe has been known to detract even from the pleasures of a bridal tour. It is absolutely necessary that the casket to which so many beautiful and valuable things are consigned should be a most substantial one. It must also be ample; no matter how regardless of dress one may be, a liberal outfit is a comfortable thing in the present state of the thermometer.

Trunks, then, must be secure and strong in order to endure the rough usage of the baggage-men; and commodious, so that the clothing may not be crushed. It is a mooted question among purchasers whether it is best to have many or few compartments in a trunk. Manufacturers differ also about this matter. At one house you are told that every partition between the various boxes monopolizes space that should be given for clothing, while the next salesman, with a bureau trunk to sell, will remind you how convenient it is to have a special drawer for every thing. Economy of space seems to us a desirable thing. There are advantages and disadvantages in both the bureau trunks and the chests with trays. Ladies object to the last because the trays are heavy to lift, and when expanded by moisture are difficult to remove from the frame. The drawers of bureau trunks are also liable to swell in damp weather. We will merely tell our readers the merits claimed for the different kinds shown us.

THE RISTORI TRUNK.

The last trunk for which a patent has been is—ned is called the Ristori. It was designed by the firm that originated the well-known "Saratoga" trunk, on which it is a decided improvement. Every inch of space is judiciously appropriated. In the lid are compartments for a bonnet, gloves, and gaiters, and two at the ends for small articles of lingerie. The bonnet-box in the centre is so arranged that when only the bonnet is wanted, it may be obtained without letting down the whole upper part of the lid. If other articles are required, and the whole lid is lowered, the bonnet is accessible from the inner side also. In order to economize space, a collar-box is placed inside the bonnet, assisting at the same time to hold the bonnet in position. The tray is divided into a parasol-box and other compartments. Beneath the tray is ample room for dresses and skirts. This is one of the most convenient and simply arranged trunks that we have seen. It is made in four different sizes, the largest of which is worth $30. The frame is iron; the box wood, covered with split leather. The patent rotary lock is called the Excelsior. It is of American design, but is now largely used in Europe, and is acknowledged to be the best trunk-lock known.

The Saratoga trunk has become a standard article in the market. It is made in several different sizes. A very neat and compactly arranged trunk, similar to the Saratoga, is sold at from $12 to $15.

The most expensive trunk shown us is a family affair marked $100. It is of solid sole-leather, and forty inches long. The commodious inside has two trays, in one of which is a box that may be made small enough for a lady's bonnet, or large enough for a gentleman's beaver. It has an Excelsior lock near each end, to which there are separate keys for husband and wife.

THE "GEM."

At another establishment we saw a convenient trunk called the "Gem," which has the advantage of having no trays to be lifted in and out. It is divided into three parts. The two upper divisions contain receptacles for all the small articles of the toilette, and are raised and lowered by a wrought patent hinge that obviates the necessity of a stay welt at the sides. The lower part is appropriated to heavy clothing. It is bound with heavy iron bands secured with clenched nails. The price ranges from $25 to $30, according to the size, which varies from twenty-eight to thirty-four inches.

BUREAU TRUNKS.

A trunk lately patented called the "Upright" has quite the appearance of a bureau when opened. The front half of the lid is folded back, disclosing the whole upper part divided into drawers and shelves, with abundant room below for skirts. This trunk need not be drawn away from the wall when opened, for which it is to be specially commended. The chief objection is, that skirts and dresses must be packed as if beneath a shelf.

The "Baden-Baden" is similarly arranged. The lid opens diagonally, showing drawers with sundry boxes at the top. There is a separate place designated for every thing.

The state-room trunk is a mere wooden box covered with linen. It is, however, very convenient, as it is only fifteen inches high and will slide under the berth in a state-room.

A square bonnet trunk of bridle leather is desirable for short excursions, as it will hold many other things besides the bonnet. Price $8.

THE WATER-PROOF TRUNK.

A water-proof trunk, eagerly sought after by timid travelers, is at once a trunk and a life-preserver. It is constructed of sole-leather, on a metallic frame, and is guaranteed to float on water. Manufacturers say that this trunk has been kept in water six weeks without a drop thereof penetrating to the inside. Six of these trunks, we are told, were once fastened together with poles, forming a raft on which twenty persons embarked and enjoyed a novel sail. The fact that they are perfectly air-tight makes them invaluable for the preservation of furs.

Speaking of furs reminds us of the excellent cedar chests lined with camphor-wood, in which the winter clothing is kept secure from moths. These may be had in large sizes for $20. A large chest imported from China is of solid camphor-wood. Price $25.

GENTLEMEN'S VALISES.

We were shown a variety of valises and portmanteaus for gentlemen. The turn-over trunk is of sole-leather covered with duck. It opens in the middle. There is a tray for shirts in the centre, with deep compartments on either side for hat, boots, and clothing. It has handles that render it easily portable, and is sufficiently strong to bear any amount of hard usage. Besides this there are neat valises and portmanteaus that may be expanded sufficiently to contain clothing for a week's use, or made small enough to hold only the few articles necessary for a day.

TRAVELING BAGS.

We saw also smaller traveling bags to be carried in the hand by ladies, or attached to shoulder-straps for gentlemen. They are made with wide mouths and square bottoms which render them very ample.

It is poor economy to buy a cheap leather bag, as they are soon defaced. Those called by many dealers French morocco are the coarsest sheep-skin enameled. Moisture turns them brown, and soon makes them too shabby for a lady to use. Grained leather or cowhide finished in imitation of morocco will wear well and retain its color. Genuine morocco is goat-skin. It has a hard grain, and is made into handsome bags of a russet color. The real Russian leather and Turkey morocco bags are far more expensive than those of American leather; but it is economy to buy them as they wear for a lifetime. The leather and the frames are imported and put together here. These are then sold at from $12 to $18. Some bags that are really no better but are made in Russia or in Vienna are shown at $25.

NECESSARIES AND TOURISTS' BAGS.

Necessaries, or toilette cases, of Vienna leather, are fitted up with many small articles that are indispensable in traveling. A valuable one, easily portable, contains every thing necessary for sewing, writing, and the toilette. The brushes and hand-glass have ebony backs, and the perfume bottles and inkstands are of cut glass. There are handles on the outside, and a lock and key. Lunch bags and baskets are furnished with knife and fork, spoon, napkin, plates, etc.

Tourists' cases in small rolls, or flat, compact boxes, are provided with pen, paper, ink, pencils, paper-knife, scissors, sealing-wax, and taper. Linen bags, for gentlemen, are worn strapped over the shoulder, and are secured with lock and key. Water-proof bags, made of fine ropes, are convenient at the sea-side for carrying wet bathing dresses. Straps of bridle leather are arranged with buckles for transporting heavy traveling shawls.

TOURISTS' UMBRELLAS.

Large umbrellas are shown for artists and tourists, and for croquet players. They are of pongee or gingham, lined with that dark shade of green so comfortable to the eye. The handles are of bamboo, and the frames are very light.

Morocco parasols are used by ladies when traveling or driving in the country. They are not injured by dust or rain. A pretty one is of light brown morocco, lined with blue, and embroidered in self-color to represent whips, horse-shoes, and jockey-caps. The handle is covered with morocco, and a whip is pendent from the top instead of a tassel.

A mosquito and fly net, to cover the face and neck, is used when going into the woods. It is made over rattans, is large enough to cover a gentleman's hat, and may be compressed into a very small compass. An umbrella-net is arranged over steel bars or standards for the protection of sleepers when camping out. It may be folded quite small, and is easily adjusted.

LIFE-PRESERVERS.

Life-preservers of India rubber are preferable to those made of cork, because the air may be excluded so that they occupy but little room. In case of emergency they are easily inflated. The most simple ones are mere belts about the waist. Others are pillows for the chest and back, strapped over the shoulders. They are provided with a tube long enough to reach the mouth of the person wearing them, so that he can replenish the air should it become exhausted. The price varies from $3 to $6.

RUBBER PILLOWS, CUPS, ETC.

Rubber cushions and pillows add considerably to the comfort of travelers and invalids. When not in use the air is exhausted, and the pillow monopolizes a small corner in the satchel.

The telescopic drinking cup is of highly polished rubber. It consists of several rings, each smaller than the one above it—which may be pushed within each other when not in use. It is neat and compact.

Game-bags for hunters, sponge-bags, and bathing-caps, are also made of rubber. Rubber gloves for boating and gardening were shown us, and long traveling boots for wading into the water.

A convenience for travelers is a brass bracket affixed by a rubber suction-plate to any non-porous substance. It is conveniently small, and perfectly efficient. A lady may affix it to the window-pane of a railway car for a bonnet-peg.

A useful novelty in the summer is the rubber bath-tub. People who are staying at farm-houses, where bathing conveniences are not always accessible, provide them for their bedrooms. A tub three feet in diameter when inflated can be compressed into a compass small enough to be carried in a lady's satchel. Price from $10 to $24. There are four different sizes.

A rubber bath-brush, perfumed to destroy the disagreeable odor that sometimes attaches to rubber, is commended by physicians as a cure of rheumatism. It is a non-conductor of electricity, cleanses the skin readily, and imparts a delicacy to it.

SUMMER GAMES.

A new style of croquet has just been patented, which is intended to simplify the game. Only two colors are used on the balls, red and black, and the balls are striped numerically, so that their number can be ascertained at a glance. The mallets are striped to correspond with the balls. The colors on the stake are not used.

As a field-game martelle is preferred by many to croquet. The gay guidons of martelle, and its bright centre-piece and pins, present a very pretty picture on a green lawn. The players are kept constantly on the alert, and the interest of the play is all-absorbing. Some of the most attractive features of ten-pins, billiards, and croquet are combined in martelle.

Planchette is the most amusing mystery of the season. Every one asks what it is, and no one finds out positively. The incredulous pooh-pooh it, and believers talk learnedly of animal magnetism, the galvanic fluid, and spiritualism. We have no theory to offer, and can only say that it serves to while away a summer's afternoon in harmless pastime. Planchette is a small heart-shaped board on rollers. A pencil is thrust through the board on a sheet of white paper placed beneath it. Two persons sit at the table and place the fingers lightly upon Planchette. When one's patience is almost exhausted with waiting the board begins to move, oscillating backward and forward, whereupon you ask any question you like; the board begins to move anew, and you are supposed to find an answer to your query in hieroglyphics that are not always intelligible.

PERSONAL.

Miss A. B. EDWARDS is said to be the author of the very unwomanly "Girl of the Period" articles, published in the London Saturday Review.

The Rev. Mr. PUNSHON, who to his marked power as a pulpit orator adds the finest poetical talent, has become a resident of Toronto, Canada.

Several American ladies at Copenhagen recently desired to be introduced to the Queen of Denmark. The Queen at once sent them word to call upon her at Castle Christiansborg whenever it suited them. The ladies, upon being admitted to her Majesty, were not a little astonished to see that she wore a cheap dress, and that, on rising to receive them, she laid on her working-table a cotton stocking on which she had been knitting.

Commodore VANDERBILT recently buried a daughter who had long been an invalid. Her remains were placed in the family vault in a little secluded burying-ground at New Dorp, Staten Island, where the Commodore expects to be buried, and to have all his family gradually gathered around him. It is understood that the bulk of his $60,000,000 will be left to his son WILLIAM, who is at present President of the Harlem Railroad. The latter was a farmer for many years on Staten Island, until he proceeded to New York not long since to enter upon a more active life. He still retains his farm of two hundred acres at New Dorp, inherits all his father's industry and love of horse-flesh, and is generally liked by all with whom he is thrown in contact. The Commodore looks to and relies upon him to conserve and perpetuate his vast possessions. The Commodore has shown much interest in his relatives, particularly young men, and has put many of them, in moderate or poor circumstances, on the high-road to wealth and prosperity.

ELLIOTT, the artist, was never in finer brush than now, and never so constantly and profitably employed. Nothing less than $500 for the simplest portrait; from that up to $5000 for a full length. A little anecdote, quite characteristic of him, is told in this wise: He was painting some clergyman, who felt it incumbent upon him to give the painter a moral lecture during one of his sittings. Somewhat in awe of the artist, he began rather nervously; but as ELLIOTT painted away without any sign of annoyance, he gathered courage as he proceeded, and finally administered a pretty good sermon. He paused for a reply, when the artist, with the urbane but positive authority of his profession, merely said, "Turn your head a little to the right, and shut your mouth."

Washington is just now honored by the presence of several artists and literary people. LEUTZE is looking out for a studio. KELLOGG ditto. FISHER is painting some very clever landscapes. LANMAN has laid down his pallet for the present, and is at work on a new edition of his "Dictionary of Congress." Mrs. LIPINCOTT (Grace Greenwood) has taken up her abode on Capitol Hill. JAMES HARCOURT is writing a series of biographical sketches of our leading public men, which are to be published in London, with portraits. The Marquis of CHAMBRONNE, a descendant of LAFAYETTE, is contributing to Paris journals and periodicals. Mr. G. W. GREENE has been obtaining materials in the archives of the State Department for the third volume of the Life of General GREENE.

No literary man from the United States was ever accorded such a reception as has been given to LONGFELLOW by the culture and aristocracy of England. The concluding words of his reply to an address of the Literary Society of Carlisle are very neatly put together: "Coming here a stranger, this welcome makes me feel that I am not a stranger; for how can a man be a stranger in a country where he finds all doors and all hearts open to him? Besides, I myself am a Cumberland man—I was born in the County of Cumberland, in the State of Maine, three thousand miles from here; and you all know that the familiar name of a town or country has a homelike sound to all ears. And yet there is much strangeness in this now, when I come to the land of my fathers and find in it no trace of my family or name. If I am to find them at all, it will not be in the streets of towns or on the outside of the houses of the living, but in the graveyards and on the doors of the dead."

Notwithstanding the great beauty and high position of the French Empress, she is said to lack certain qualifications, without which a crown is sadly dimmed of its brilliancy. Some years ago she made efforts to attract the cleverest young authors of France to her soirées; but they never went more than three or four times. EDMOND ABOUT gives the reason. "You see," he said, "at the third or fourth soirée to which Her Majesty invited me, she asked me very bluntly to dedicate my next volume to her. As I could not do that, you know why, I preferred to stay away from the Tuileries." The reason why ABOUT could not do it was, first, because such a dedication would be looked upon as a proof of servility; and, secondly, because, in literary circles, it is well known that Her Majesty is a woman of no brains, and utterly destitute of literary taste. If a BALZAC could study her and watch her when she is off her guard, he could lay before the world an endless sketch of follies and stupidities. NAPOLEON, as any habitué at Court can tell you, is often-times terribly embarrassed by her childish doings.

Baron HAUSSMAN, who has charge of laying out all the new streets and squares of Paris, and who, in that department, exercises almost despotic power, is said to be a stout, broad-faced, pleasant-looking gentleman, with no pretensions to manly beauty, nor with an especially intelligent style of phiz; looks like a rather easy-going, affable, dinner-loving Frenchman of the indolent sort. But his black eye is bright and keen, and "looks like business;" he is on the sunny side of fifty, having dark brown hair and whiskers under his chin, and but few wrinkles. He is descended from a member of the Convention of 1792, who was then a fierce revolutionist, and talked loudly about having Louis CAPET's head. His father, son of the Conventionist, was editor of the Temps, and a revolutionist, too, in 1830; and now, the old gentleman, having subsided into a devotee of the second empire, is one of the editors of the official military journal, the Moniteur de l'Armée. The old Conventionist, grandfather of the Prefect, was originally a dry-goods merchant of Versailles, so the descent is not very illustrious; the Prefect having won the baronial title himself. The fact of the ancestor's having been a dry-goods merchant has given rise to the saying in Paris that "the Baron cuts through the streets of Paris as his ancestor did through his linen."

—HEBER C. KIMBALL, the great Mormon functionary, is said to have made more wives widows than any other man of the time. As ARTEMUS WARD used to say, he was very much married, and left sixty-seven poor females in widow's tears and widow's attire.

—A wealthy Japanese gentleman, whose income is put at $30,000,000, is said to be coming westward for a wife. The Boston Post thinks it would be a blessing if we could only get him here—and tax him!

—Mr. E. L. DAVENPORT, now playing a very successful engagement in California, is a very quiet, refined, proper person in private life. A gentleman who was passenger with him on the California steamer gives the following incident: "On Sunday evening I noticed a most impressive and novel ceremony in the saloon. It had previously been announced that Divine services would be held at eight o'clock, and hundreds of persons assembled there at the hour named. Who should walk into the pulpit but Mr. E. L. DAVENPORT, the celebrated tragedian. He read a chapter from the Bible, and then made the sweetest prayer I ever heard. If all preachers would pray as fervently as he did the effect would be much better, to say the least." Those who have seen Mr. DAVENPORT's excellent acting, and listened to his finely-modulated voice, will readily believe all that is here stated.

—Although the SULTAN is said to be ignorant, stolid, passionate, and of tastes and habits altogether unrefined, he has great taste for jewels and possesses some of the richest in the world. In emeralds and pearls he is particularly strong; one of the latter, pear-shaped, being three fourths of an inch in diameter. One of the emeralds weighs 125 ounces. He has a brooch with 280 large diamonds, and several necklaces of pearls as large as pigeons' eggs. The Sultan did not learn much by his visit to Paris; but his ministers were observant, and have introduced several reforms into the Turkish administration, suggested by the Government machinery of France.

—Another picture of BISMARCK, from the pen of an enthusiastic American, who regards him as the foremost man of the time, which he probably is—i. e., on the Continent: "His fine great head upon his tall, full figure, gave him a marked superiority over the whole assemblage. Power, prudence, self-possession, capacity, success, are stamped upon his features and bearing. If he is worn with care he does not show it; perhaps he carries it in those great sacks that hang under his eyes! He seems about fifty-four, and thoroughly well preserved. His habits are careful. He rides on horseback, and bathes in summer in the open river, a few miles from the town. He seems to possess much of the attainments of JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, with a tact in state-manship which never marked that powerful politician. If he had fallen from the skies he could not have come more opportunely, or with qualifications more out of the usual line of German statesmanship. Knowing all that German statesmen ever know, he has a thoroughly un-German dash and practical quality in him, which marks him out from his predecessors and leaves him wholly alone in his kind. With unsurpassed courage and competency, he possesses distinguished prudence and self-control. He is not a moral genius, nor are his disinterestedness and pure philanthropy his inspirers. But he is a patriot, and sees Prussia's opportunity to lead Germany to her destiny, and probably no man could possess qualities or antecedents better fitted to the work. An aristocrat, he puts himself at the head of the party of movement, and advocates all possible reforms in the interests of a large liberty and a freer life. He is already a whole head and shoulders above not only his contemporaries in Prussia, but European statesmen in general; and the more I see of the slack, tape-tied, broken-spirited character of German politicians—dreamy, mechanical, wordy, theoretical, and inefficient—the more I admire the prompt, incisive, practical, and bold qualities of the redeemer of Germany."

—Boston has a sensible physician in Dr. JACOB BIGELOW, who pleasantly remarked at the dinner of the Massachusetts Medical Society that he was indebted for his good health to the joint agencies of temperance, hard work, and abstinence from medicine.

—A small explosion is looked for in Court circles at Paris. The Marquis DE CLERMONT TONNERRE, who is a something or other about the palace, having occasion to deliver a letter to the Empress, offered it to her in the natural and common way, with his hand. Her Majesty refused to take it from him, saying she was accustomed to have letters brought to her on a silver tray. "Madame," said the rebuked courtier, reddening, "the CLERMONT TONNERRES do not carry trays!"

—King WILLIAM, of Prussia, can not be expected to receive any sympathy from the tailors of the United States. In the matter of clothes he prefers the shabby to the genteel. Recently his valet is said to have given him a hint by substituting a new coat for one which he had worn two or three years longer than he ought, and was thereupon summoned to the royal presence. "Where is my old coat, Jean?" "I have taken it away, your Majesty; it is no longer fit to be worn." "What are you going to do with it, Jean?" "I believe I am going to sell it." "How much do you think you will get for it?" This was hard to answer, for not a frippier in the world would have given five cents for the old coat. Jean, therefore, hesitated a moment, and answered then, "I believe I shall get about a dollar for it, your Majesty." The king took his pocket-book from the night-table, opened it, and handed Jean a dollar. "Here, Jean," he said, "is your dollar. That coat is so comfortable. Bring it back to me. I want it yet."

White Piqué Pocket.

THIS pretty pocket is designed for little children. It is fastened to a long strap of piqué, which passes over the shoulder. The pocket is embroidered with black silk in point Russe from the design given in the Supplement. Cut for the pocket from Fig. 33 two pieces each of piqué and fine white shirting. Having embroidered the piqué, sew the parts of the pocket together, run the edges of the outside and lining together at the top, and set it on the strap, which is likewise embroidered and lined. One of the designs given for the trimming of children's dresses may be substituted if preferred, as being less elaborate and more easily worked.

Trimmings for Children's Dresses.

We give illustrations of several pretty and easily-made trimmings for children's dresses, waists, etc. Figs. 1-4 may be embroidered with black silk, white cotton, or colored worsted. Fig. 4 shows the design worked in point d'esprit, or button-hole stitches linked one within another. Fig. 5 is white serpentine braid, button-hole stitched on the foundation with black silk. For this trimming take two pieces of white serpentine braid of the proper length, and twine them together so that the points lie one within another in the manner shown in the illustration; then make of the strips thus formed the border seen in the engraving, and button-hole stitch it fast along the edges on the foundation. This border may, of course, be made of black or red worsted braid.

Two Reels of Silk Mosaic for Winding Thread.

MATERIALS: Pasteboard, pieces of silk of different colors.

These reels will be found convenient for winding thread. The illustrations show them of the full size. Cut of pasteboard the requisite number of pieces—for Fig. 1 four, and for Fig. 2 six, all double. Cover all the pieces on one side with colored silk, fastening the edges on the other side; then sew together on the wrong side four or six pieces, according to which design is followed, and one side of the reel is completed. Having arranged the second side in the same manner, lay both together so that the covered side shall be outside, and overcast the edges fast. These reels may be made of any number of colors, or the different sides may contrast with each other.

Fringes for Sashes, Paletots, Tidies, etc.

THESE fringes may be made of silk, cotton, or fine cord. The upper edges of the fringes from Figs. 2-4 are crocheted, while the fringe, Fig. 1, is knotted in the edge of the stuff. For making the fringe, Fig. 1, run through the edge of the stuff from six to eight threads, and tie them together. Then lay one strand diagonally to the right, and the other to the left, so as to form the cross lines shown in the illustration. Arrange this on a pasteboard foundation, and stitch together the intersecting points as in the engraving. Continue in this manner with the whole border, which may be wide or narrow, as is desired. The remaining ends of the thread form the fringe.

For making the fringe, Fig. 2, work, first, a foundation, then on this one round in single crochet, and one round in double crochet, and after this a round in slip stitch, crocheting after every 5th stitch three chain stitches, passing over one stitch of the last round. Then tie in every one of these chain-stitch loops a strand eight threads thick, which is laid together at half its length. Divide each of these sixteen-thread strands into four equal parts, and weave these, as shown in the illustration, with the strands lying next. Then collect again sixteen threads, which fasten as shown in the illustration; divide again, and weave with the strands lying next, and, finally, tie and even the ends of the fringe.

For the fringe, Fig. 3, crochet, first, a double chain-stitch foundation, and run through the back vein of every third stitch of the foundation a fine cord of the requisite length, and in such a manner that it is doubled in the middle; then with the ends of the cord work the knotted weft as in the knotted slipper illustrated in Harper's Bazar, No. 9, bringing the knots at regular distances, as shown by Fig. 3. Having completed the border, join on several cords, and work over them in the manner shown by the illustration.

Fig. 2.—TRIMMING FOR CHILDREN'S DRESSES, ETC.

The border of the fringe, Fig. 4, consists of a round in single crochet worked on the foundation, then a round in double crochet, after every six of which work one chain. In each of these chain stitches tie a strand of the requisite length and thickness. These strands are divided, woven, and tied as shown by the illustration.

Cravat Collars.

See illustrations, page 613.

THESE collars are worn over high dresses, paletots, etc., and are made of Swiss muslin, lace, and colored ribbons.

Fig. 1 consists of a standing collar made of lace, with embroidered application figures and a muslin binding. The front is ornamented with a bow and revers. The bow consists of a three-cornered piece of Swiss muslin, the shorter side of which is seven inches in length. This strip is bordered with insertion three-fourths of an inch wide, which in turn is edged with lace an inch and a half wide. The piece is then gathered up in pleats from the middle of the long bias side to the corner of the muslin, thus forming the ends. The upper corner is next turned over as shown in the pattern, and all the corners are trimmed with small bows of ribbon, which are ornamented with an embroidered figure in the centre.

Fig. 2.—This standing collar consists of lace an inch and a quarter in width, which is set on a muslin binding half an inch wide. The front is finished with a frill, made of lace insertion an inch and a half in width, which is bordered with a narrow row of hem stitch. One side of this insertion is edged with a strip of muslin, which is on one side cut into points an inch deep and three-fourths of an inch wide; on this is set a ruffle half an inch in width, which is edged with lace an inch and a half in width. The under edge of the insertion is bordered with the same lace, while the other side is finished with lace an inch wide.

Fig. 3.—This standing collar is of Valenciennes lace an inch and a half in width and lace insertion, under which is laid colored ribbon. This is fastened to a chemisette front, which is made of insertion, underlaid with ribbon and bordered with lace. The single figures are set on a muslin piece which is eight inches in length, and four inches wide at the top and two at the bottom.

Collar with Short Chemisette.

See illustration, page 613.

THIS collar is sewed to a short chemisette, which requires very much less material than any of those previously described. The collar is of fine linen; the chemisette is of muslin. Cut from Fig. 31 one piece of muslin, and from Fig. 30 two pieces of linen. Backstitch the two pieces, Fig. 30, together, except the under edge, then turn them, and join them to the chemisette according to the figures on the pattern. Work a button-hole and sew a button on the collar, and hem the chemisette around the bottom.

Infants' Hats.

same material, box-pleated, and with loops of narrow blue velvet ribbon. A second row of the trimming forms a diadem in front. The crown is cut from Fig. 27 of the Supplement, and is laid in pleats on the outer edge and bound with a narrow bias strip. The trimming consists of a straight double strip an inch and a half in width, which is laid in box-pleats three-fourths of an inch in width; between every two pleats is set a ribbon loop. The edge is bound with satin ribbon. The second row is put on above the first, as shown by the illustration.

can, therefore, be turned over, as shown in the pattern. For making such a hat cut of black silk and oiled silk from Figs. 53 and 54 each two pieces, and from Figs. 51, 52, and 55 each one piece. First, join all the silk crown pieces, making the figures correspond on the pattern, and then sew these to the brim. Line the brim with silk; this and the buckram lining must, however, be joined to the brim only half-way. Now sew together in the same manner the oiled silk pieces (crown and brim). Double over the oiled silk portion, taking care to keep it exactly even, so that all the seams shall be on the outside; then lay the hat thus doubled up on the back of the silk hat, and join one-half of the oiled silk brim with the upper half of the hat brim, and the other with the under half of the brim over a buckram lining, in such a manner that the oiled silk pieces shall meet each other. Bind all the edges of the brim with silk braid, and work a button-hole in that half of the brim which is to be laid over, then put two buttons on the under parts of the brim, and line the crown with silk. When the hat is laid over the button-hole, a is buttoned on the button a, as is shown by the illustration.

Knotted Riding Whip.

This elegant whip can be made by any lady. Take a willow-branch, or a fine pointed Spanish reed, and work it with fine gray twine. For working, make a hole one-fifth of an inch from the end, and also from the beginning of the work, in order to fasten the threads. On the upper end fasten a round

For pattern see Supplement, No. XXI., Figs. 56-59.

Fig. 2 is of fine white muslin; the trimming of the front consists of two long clusters of muslin leaves and bow of the same. Cut of the muslin double from Figs. 27 and 28 each one piece. Then pleat the crown on the outer edge, bringing x on o; sew on the lining, which is trimmed with four rows of cord on the outer edge, and join the crown and brim according to the corresponding figures of the pattern. Bind the seam, together with the outer edge, with a bias strip. For the trimming on the front cut for each cluster sixteen leaves of double muslin from Fig. 29 of the Supplement. Sew them together on the outer edge, and lay in each leaf a pleat, bringing x on o; then arrange the leaves on the hat in two elongated clusters, as shown in the illustration. In the centre of these clusters set a bow made of a bias strip of muslin two inches in width.

Gentleman's Summer Hat.

This hat is especially recommended for traveling and country wear. It is made of black silk and oiled silk, arranged in such a manner that either material may be worn on the outside. The upper material of one side of the hat is not sewed fast, and knob. In doing this wind the end smoothly with the twine, running the end of the latter through the hole, after which wet the inside of the knob with mucilage, so that it shall adhere to the threads. In working the knotted work, which is in button-hole stitch, twist the position of the threads in such a manner that the chain-like veins of the stitches shall wind spirally around the rod. Having completely covered the reed in this manner, work for the last twenty chain stitches with the twine, draw the end of the thread through the last stitch, and leave four inches, on the end of which make a tassel by fastening on a few threads and raveling them all out. Cover the knob with a network of button-hole stitch worked with the twine. Work the first row over a ring of four chain stitches, after which widen and narrow according to the form of the knob. The holder is crocheted with gray yarn: for this cast on ninety chain stitches, join in a round and work three pattern rows in a kind of Tunisian crochet stitch. In every first round of a pattern row of this stitch draw a loop through each of the upright loop stitches of the former pattern row, and through this loop a chain stitch, which retain on the needle, and cast off with a chain stitch in the following round. Crochet a round in single crochet, each stitch in an upright stitch of the last pattern row. Then sew the holder to the whip, and give it a few coats of copal varnish.

This walking belt is worked of gray twine in ribbed crochet stitch, button-hole stitched on the edge with red worsted. The stitches of the edge vary in length, being $\frac{1}{10}$ th of an inch long in the middle of each rib and $\frac{3}{10}$ ths of an inch between every 2 ribs. In every button-hole stitch crochet 1 sl. Work all the pieces crosswise, the belt by the pattern, Fig. 32. Begin the belt with a foundation of 45 stitches, and crochet backward and forward, widening and narrowing as the pattern requires. Leave 5 small eyelet holes at regular distances apart at each end of the belt. For the shoulder-bands work two strips 45 inches long and 25 stitches wide, with a button-hole 7 inches from one end, and set a button to correspond on the under side. Work the edges with red wool, and sew the ends to the belt with the button on the back. These shoulder-bands are joined by crochet strips 15 stitches wide. The front is 4 and each back 2 inches long, while those under the arm are each $3\frac{1}{2}$ inches long. The strips are all sewed fast to the shoulder-strips.

Embroidered Chemise Russe.

This chemise russe is made of Swiss muslin, embroidered with black silk in point russe, from the designs given by Figs. 56-59. No. 34, of Harper's Bazar, Supplement, Figs. 13 and 14, gives the pattern of the chemise russe.

POLLY'S ONE OFFER.

IN SIX CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER III.

BOB was quite that sort of person. He had taken a fancy to Polly—every body in the house had taken a fancy to Polly; but, with the exception of Mrs. Livingstone, no one treated her with the respect that was her due. She seemed made for kisses, caresses, teasing, spoiling, and petting—for any thing but grave airs and work. Of course Polly did not see herself in the light of a good joke, very far from it, and yet she was happy in the atmosphere of kindly sarcasm that surrounded her. They were all so good to her, so easy and pleasant, and Bob and his mother especially. Mrs. Livingstone drew her on to talk of herself, and approved of what she heard of the principles and practical sense of the young creature.

"Yes, I know I am pretty, but children will like me all the better for it, so I am glad," said she, in reply to some comment on her beauty. "Miss Mill, an old governess near us, thought I might wear spectacles, but the oculist said if I did not require them they would permanently injure my eyes, and I was not going to suffer that. I did alter my hair and cut a lot off, which rather went to my heart, but it will take less time to do, and people who only see me with it plain will never know how much nicer I look in curls. And besides, I don't think any body calls me pretty except those who are fond of me. And, after all, I can't help it, and I am not inclined to starve or be a burden to Jane because of my face. I dare say it will prove quite as serviceable a face as if it began by being ugly—governesses age so fast; Jane has some white hairs already."

"But you may marry, dear. Don't you ever dream of a husband and children and house of your own? My girls do, and it is most natural," said Mrs. Livingstone.

"My mother does not approve of marrying," said Polly, calmly. "I used to think I should like it, but since I have heard how much there is to be borne from men, and what trouble in the bringing up of children, I am sure I shall be better out of it, and I have turned my mind to other things. Jane had an offer once, but my mother would not consent; and she has given up caring. We shall teach as long as we can, and when we have saved money enough we shall live together and be two old maids. All my ambition now is to be a good governess."

"I wish you'd come and be mine, Polly," said Bob, who, entering as she spoke, had caught the last words. "You have no notion what a good boy I should be under wise and judicious guidance, though I am nothing to boast of under present misrule. The fact is, they don't know how to manage me. Say yes, Polly." But Polly only laughed at his air of meek entreaty; and his mother told him Polly had not courage to undertake such a rough handful as he was, and he must apply elsewhere.

That evening Polly played on the piano, and sang distractingly. There was no end of her accomplishments. Bob listened till he loved her, till he longed to do as Maggie did, and hug her up and kiss her for pure kindness and pity that she was destined ever to be any thing but a pet and darling. That was the state of mind into which she threw many people, while she herself was feeling all the time quite strong and capable and equal to her fortunes.

In this way the week went on. It was fine weather, but Bob contrived to be much more than usual about the house. He was even troublesome occasionally, as one morning, for instance, when there were custards to make, and it was Maggie's turn in the kitchen. Maggie would have Polly with her, and just when she was standing at the end of the long white table inquiring where she would sit to see, and yet not be in any body's way, Bob appeared, lifted her up, and set her on the table. "Sit there," said he, and then took a small corner for himself close by, and supported his long length with one foot on the floor and one arm round Polly's waist. Such a thing had never happened to Polly before as to be made a prop of, and she felt that it was execrably wrong for a governess (oh, if her mother or Miss Mill could see her!); but, at the same time, the very novelty of the circumstance made it difficult to extricate herself without compromising her dignity. She pretended not to be aware of the arm, though she was blushing and palpitating all over, and looking at the floor ever so far below her feet, she said, "Let me get down, please."

"You are quite safe; you can't fall while I am here," replied Bob, purposely misunderstanding her.

"But I don't like it; I am not used to it," persisted Polly, vexed and ashamed of herself, she hardly knew why.

"Like it?" echoed Bob, in a voice of tender concern. "Like what?"

Polly turned her face and looked at him with sudden tears in her eyes. He would have liked to say or do something rash, but he only took his arm away and moved off to the hearth. It was impossible to withstand that touching appeal, which said plainly, "You are my host, and should protect me, not offend me." Polly gazed out of the window for several minutes after, but he saw the burning rose on her face and one tear splashed down on her hand. Maggie seemed not to notice this by-play, and went singing to the dairy, upon which Bob drew hastily near to Polly and begged her not to be angry. "I would not vex you for the world," pleaded he. "Say you forgive me." Polly did not say any thing distinctly, but he understood that his peace was made; and when he heard Maggie coming back he took his departure. "And a good riddance too," observed Maggie: "the custards would certainly have been ruined if he had staid."

In the evening Polly sang again, and Bob, who had quite recovered his native audacity, proclaimed that he would have a singing wife or none. Why did not his sisters sing? They could do nothing. Polly could do every thing.

"Yes, Polly's a clever little midge," said Maggie, tenderly enfolding her; "but you need not take the trouble to set your cap at her, Bob; for she has made up her mind already; she is going to be an old maid."

Bob laughed aloud, and seemed immensely tickled in his imagination. "She looks like it, very much like it indeed!" said he. "I should think so! Polly an old maid! That would be a sin and a shame!"

Polly blushed, and said, curtly, she wished they would talk sense, and let her alone. What business was it of Bob's, or Maggie's either, for that matter, what she was? As a governess and a working-woman, of course she had other things to think of that made her serious, very different to them, who had been born with silver spoons in their mouths. These sentiments, and the tone of them, and their slight incoherence, quite upset Bob's gravity. He laughed long and merrily, and only recovered himself when Polly sprang up in a temper and rushed to the door to escape. Then, with one rapid movement, he overtook and stopped her, and begged her pardon with pleas enough to soften a heart of adamant. But Polly's was harder than adamant. "I am not a baby; you treat me like a baby!" gasped she, crimson and furious. "I won't be called a mouse! My name is Mary Curtis!" Mrs. Livingstone was not present to keep order, but Maggie knew by Polly's way that she was really hurt and mortified; so she interfered, and bade Bob let her alone; she was not used to be teased.

"Then it is good for her—rub the starch out," replied he, exasperatingly, and went so far in his teasing that Polly, quite beside herself with passion, struck him in the waistcoat with all her little might. It was a mistake, as Bob instructed her the next minute, kissing her roughly, and then as roughly letting her go. The instant she was released she ran across the hall, half blinded with tears, and, after tripping and stumbling twice or thrice on the stairs in the dark, gained the safe refuge of Maggie's room, where Maggie found her presently, weeping fit to break her heart. Polly's self-respect was grievously wounded; if she could not make Bob behave to her like a lady, what was to become of her among children! Maggie was perplexed. The ways and customs of Blackthorn Grange admitted of a good deal of kissing among friends; but Polly evidently considered a kiss a mortal offense. She essayed to comfort her by representing the fact in its local light.

"Don't make such a fuss, Polly; one would think you were half killed," said she. "What does a kiss matter? and it was only Bob."

"He is a perfect bear!" sobbed Polly. "I wish I had never come!"

"You cross little savage thing! And it is not very polite to tell me Bob's a bear! He is nothing of the kind. You ought to feel flattered; he would not plague you if he did not think you nice. Maria Spinks was here a whole month, and he never offered to kiss her once."

Polly dried her eyes and looked up. "He is so abominably rough," she began, and then was scared into silence at the recollection of the blow she had given him, which, strictly speaking, was far more in the nature of an assault than a kiss.

"Ah, you may well stop and bethink yourself of his provocation," said Maggie, significantly.

"Did I hurt him?" asked Polly, with lovely wistfulness.

"Dreadfully! How could you help it, hitting him as you did purposely in the region of the heart? And Bob is very delicate. It is easy to be sorry for it afterward, but that is the way people get into passions and commit murder, or manslaughter, at least."

"I wish I could go away to-morrow before breakfast," said Polly, ready to sink with shame and self-reproach.

"That is impossible. You will just have to do penance and sit by Bob, and if you take my advice you will behave as usual, and say nothing about to-night. It is lucky my mother was not there; she would never forgive you for hurting Bob."

"I'm sure I won't mention it, Maggie; I think I should die if any body else knew," said Polly, ruefully. "It has made me feel so small and contemptible. If I had only remembered myself and kept my temper it would not have happened."

"Nonsense! it can't be helped now; think of the old song—'If a body kiss a body, need a body cry?' You might have been here at our New-Year's party you might have been kissed a dozen times under the mistletoe, if Bob had not intimidated that he would not stand it; nothing varies more in kind and degree than a kiss, you know."

"I don't know; but I want no more of Bob's kind and degree; my cheek and chin are red yet."

"Well, don't complain—it is your own fault; you may be sure it is when I tell you so," said Maggie; and Polly held her peace.

It was difficult next morning when Polly went down to breakfast a minute or two late. Mrs. Livingstone offered her cheek to her; and Bob, with not a little extra color in his face, gave her a cordial, expressive shake of the hand. Maggie had reported Polly's wrath and distress in unmitigated terms, and Bob was sorry he had been "a perfect bear," and "so abominably rough." She was much too shy and conscious to talk in her wonted way, and he perceived he had gone too far and frightened her—and heartily vexed at himself he was for his blundering stupidity. He transgressed in the opposite direction that day, and was as tenderly assiduous as a lover; Polly did not appreciate his kindness, but seeing that his repentance for his great offense was deep and unfeigned, she forgave him fully and freely—so fully that when he took his leave of her at the Warden House, whither he had driven her and Maggie over in his dog-cart, and said, humbly: "We are friends again, Polly, are we not? And you will come again at Easter?"

Polly, with a rosy beneficent countenance shining on him, replied: "Yes—if I may."

CHAPTER IV.

POLLY'S adventures at the Warden House were passed chiefly in the school-room. The children were reasonably good, and Mrs. Stapylton was abundantly satisfied with her new governess's cheerfulness, skill, and industry; but the first time she sounded her praises to her husband the captain replied: "Don't expect to keep the little woman long, my dear. She is uncommonly pretty, and I am much mistaken if Bob Livingstone is not sweet on her; he always inquires after her so amiably when we meet at the market table."

"Oh!" said Mrs. Stapylton; and the next time the meet was at the Warden House she bade her husband invite Bob to ride over the previous day and sleep; and she contrived to have a lady short at dinner, and asked Polly to be so kind as to leave lessons for once and fill the gap; for she was an amiable woman, married after her own heart, and would be glad, as she said, to give such a nice little thing a chance.

Polly had the sagacity to leave her profession up stairs, and to come down charming in her white dress and white ribbons; but Bob felt it was not quite like having her to himself at Blackthorn Cottage. Yet she was much easier here, and talked and was as gay as any one. There was nothing in Polly to provoke or invite an impertinence. The ladies made no difference with her, and her face was enough to insure her kindness at first sight from men. If Bob was a person to be influenced by other people's opinions, he heard many golden ones of Polly at the Warden House, and all casually expressed without reference to him. Perhaps he did carry away an idea or two of her more meaning than any he brought—Maggie certainly believed it, and began to insinuate the same in her letters to her friend; but Polly was heedless and indifferent to Bob, and her work and duty were much more in her head than "nonsense," which sufficiently accounted for her never responding to Maggie's hints and queries.

Easter did not linger, but was soon come, bringing with it Polly's second visit to the Grange. It was a lovely Easter that year—warm, sunny, serene as May, with hedges green, pear-trees and cherry-trees in blossom, and even roses in bud under the shelter of the eaves on the south wall of the old house. They made it quite a gay season at Blackthorn Grange, and Polly, whose dignities had worn easier already, entered into it with all the natural joyousness of her temper and time of life. She was exceedingly pleasant about the house, and the many visitors, kinsfolk, and neighbors who came there during her stay were charmed, and regarded her with a significant interest which none of the family discouraged. Mrs. Livingstone would walk her about the great walled garden for an hour at a time, talking to her no one but themselves knew what about, but the two were excellent company to each other, and often Bob made a third. Laura was rather quizzical on the subject of Maggie's friend and her brother; but that was her disagreeable way, and Fanny and Maggie made up to them for it by all sorts of little considerations, which they profited by without observing. And every day some excursion was planned which threw them together. Now it was to Cranstown Rocks, now to Haviland Priory, and one day, the most memorable of all, to Beech Grove, the Livingstones' ancestral manor, Bob's inheritance, where Maggie informed Polly that he would most likely go to live when he married and settled. It was an old place, though not so old as the Grange, and it had fallen into some neglect from having been let to a careless tenant, whose lease was, however, nearly run out; but, as Polly said: "With a little trouble and taste it might be made beautiful." Bob asked how she would go about to improve it? and as he trotted her through the rooms and the garden he treasured up all her little views and opinions, which she was perfectly free with, not at all as if they were a matter of personal concern. And perhaps they were not. Polly had a faculty for planning and suggesting, but she was not conscious of any peculiar sentiment for the place as Bob's future home, though every body, himself included, gave her credit for it.

And very happy Bob was in his illusion. Polly was quite kind enough to please him, and her shy trick of blushing, and her sudden vivacities and caprices soon charmed his heart away entirely. And hers? She was a mystery to herself; she liked Bob; she liked to be near him; once, when he took her by surprise and kissed her, she was not so furious but that he thought he might some day venture again; in fact, if she had given way to nature, she would have loved him very sweetly and tenderly. But all her principles were against giving way, and whenever she felt inclined to lapse into weakness she would recite to herself all her mother's litany of impediments, and pains, and penalties in marriage. This sufficiently proved her in danger, and set her on her guard against it, poor little Polly!

The Easter visit was extended to a fortnight, and before half of it was over the servants in the house, the men on the farm, the very dogs even, had learned to demean themselves to Polly as to a little lady in whom their master had a special interest. Mrs. Livingstone, Laura, Fanny, and Bob's two chief bachelor friends were ready with their consent whenever it might be required; and in the absence of the principals would discuss their private affairs without the smallest delicacy or reserve. Only Maggie held herself in an attitude of doubt, and this Laura treated as the supremest affectation. "You know your precious Polly will say 'Yes' the very first minute Bob asks her, and be only too glad!" the quizzical sister would tauntingly aver; to which Maggie would make answer that she only wished she was as sure of it as Laura appeared to be.

But Maggie could be sure of nothing. Polly was a puzzle and trial to her at this moment, and she was constantly trying to solve her by all manner of cunning experiments and questions. On their last evening together she went so far as to say in the privacy of their bedroom: "I fancied once you were going to be fond of Bob for my sake, Polly, and I am disappointed in you. You are not half good to him, you little cross thing, and you look him in the face as frankly as any of us—that's a sign you don't care for him, tiresome toad that you are!"

"Bob's eyes are blue," said Polly, with abstraction, but as coolly as if she were repeating "two and two are four."

"You have no particular prejudice against blue eyes, have you?" inquired Maggie, in a tone of affront.

"No! you dear old Maggie, why should I? Yours are blue."

After a brief silence Maggie returned to the charge: "You are coming to see us again at midsummer—now you need not seek any excuse, for I won't take it! You are coming to see us again at midsummer. Say yes, or don't open your mouth." Polly kept her mouth shut. "Have you been struck dumb? You are coming, I know you are! I'll never be friends with you again if you don't." Polly's lips still never stirred. "Oh, Polly, don't be a silly little donkey! Look here—is there any body loves you as much as I do, unless it be dear old Bob? and you are going to throw it all to the winds!"

"Yes, there's Jane loves me, and I must spend my midsummer at home with her and my mother," said Polly, thus solemnly adjured.

"That's all right; but you'll come here first—promise—I'll shake you if you don't."

Polly did not exactly promise, but she begged off her shaking with something Maggie accepted as an equivalent; and in the morning when she was driven off to her duties at the Warden House by Bob himself, it was considered an understood thing that at midsummer, before going home to Norminster, she should pay another visit to Blackthorn Grange. It was a lovely April day, with the sun in full glow, and the orchards all pink and white with apple-blossom. The country was very fine and luxuriant between the Grange and Lanswood, and Polly's eyes and soul took delight in its spring beauty. She was feeling happy, unconsciously happy, and the radiance of her heart shone in her countenance. Maggie, at whom she often looked round, thought she had never seen her so sweetly pretty before; and Bob, though his plan of courtship was all laid out, and he had no intention of being precipitate, found himself more than once on the brink of asking the question which would decide both their fortunes.

"You would not mind spending your life in the country, Polly, little town-bred lady as you are?" said he, gayly.

"I like the country best," replied Polly.

"When you come to us at midsummer I shall have Stella ready, and you shall learn to ride—all the girls ride hereabouts."

"But they ride from children. I am rather timid; I am not sure that I shall like it."

"I shall teach you myself," said Bob, as if that would remove all difficulties, and he glanced down at the little creature beside him with fond admiration. None of her friends' opinions of Polly had yet grown up to her own estimate of her dignity—not even Bob's. He laughed indulgently at her practical airs, and called her his Mouse and his Blossom, with a tender patronage that she could not repress, though she sincerely wished to do so. It seemed to Polly sometimes as if his will were the stronger, and controlled hers, however she fought against it; and that was the fact. Bob was not a particularly profound person, but he perfectly fathomed Polly's mixture of pride and shyness, lovingness, doubt, fear, and trembling toward himself, and he deemed it quite in his duty and business to tame her with kindness, yet firmness—much as he was taming his beautiful shy filly Stella; as for letting her go her own way, or supposing she would defeat him in the end, it never entered Bob's head; and had her mother's warnings and philosophy been laid before him, they would have been far too strange and unnatural for his honest comprehension. He religiously believed that every nice young woman wished to be married, and why not Polly, who was so extremely nice?

The drive to Lanswood was very pleasant all the way, and when Polly was left behind at the Warden House, to think it over, she could not but know why it had been so. Love is the best of companions. "Dear old Bob, I'm afraid I should grow foolishly fond of him if I went often to Blackthorn Grange. I had much better stop away at midsummer," said she to herself; but perhaps she did not mean it. She was rather dull and absent for a day or two, but she soon brightened up at her work, which was not severe or disagreeable. In truth her situation was very comfortable, and she had no injuries or hardships to make the notion of escape welcome; but still she counted the weeks to the holidays, and did not grieve to see them pass. And in every letter Maggie told her how much nearer midsummer was, and mentioned many delightful parties of pleasure and excursions which were standing over until her coming. At every such allusion Polly's heart underwent that physical spasm which she had described to her friend as afflicting her before she set forth on her career as a governess. To go or not to go to the Grange became her thought by day and night. She was pulled very hard both ways. She did not deny to herself that the Grange was a happy place for a holiday; but her principles of so many years' careful home cultivation were in peril there, while her head still approved of them so entirely that she felt it was inconsistent and wrong to walk into temptation with her eyes open and her judgment unobscured. Nobody at the Grange denounced marriage as a state of suffering bondage, or children as a perpetual care; indeed Laura and Fanny were both engaged, and Maggie, though not so far gone as they were, frankly avowed that she had only refused the curate because she did not like him; if she had liked him she should have had no scruple about accepting his proposal, and take her luck for what might follow.

In this manner she drifted into a decision that she would go to Blackthorn Grange, but it should be for the last time; and a few days after, there she was, in all her pretty dignity and grace, and every body in and about the house was talking about her and the master, and drawing only one conclusion from this third visit within the half-year.

CHAPTER V.

POLLY did not find her position under these circumstances at all pleasant—rather the reverse indeed. There was a great deal going on at the Grange; never was Maggie so busy in the kitchen or so little at leisure to devote herself to her friend. Laura and Fanny had, of course, occupations of their own, and were not going to be troubled with Maggie's darling; and so it fell out that she was often left to Bob, who had plenty of idle time on his hands, and was glad to employ it.

The first morning after her arrival Polly was introduced to Stella in a large, level pasture field; and Bob having put her in the saddle with infinite care, and many assurances that she need not be in the least afraid, led the pretty creature slowly round the field. They were a capital match, he said; and if Polly liked, Stella should be hers. Then Polly had the bride in her own hands, and Stella walked quietly and obligingly after Bob close to the hedge, and then across the field to the gate, where Mrs. Livingstone stood, without being led. Mrs. Livingstone said Stella was admirably trained, and a docile, fine-tempered thing; and then she commended Polly as sitting nicely and straight up, and bade Bob mind and take care of her. This lesson was repeated every morning after breakfast, and Polly could soon ride well enough to be trusted on the road with Bob and Maggie; and so they took several excursions together, not very long, and Polly made acquaintance and drank tea informally at several neighboring houses, where she was evidently welcomed for somebody's sake besides her own.

Every time this significant sort of welcome was given her Polly's heart suffered that strange physical wrench, and so it did often when she was with Bob alone, and he said kind words, and gave her kind looks that implied his love for her. He was never rough with her now, but very quiet and wary, as if he had an inkling of that hidden pang, and was watching for his opportunity to speak without scaring her, and so finally to cure it. His wooing was not at all unlike the process of breaking-in Stella. Polly was quite as shy, as proud, as averse to bit and bridle as that pretty thorough-bred; but once subdued, Bob thought she would also be as good and as obedient to his hand. Yet all this while that he was endeavoring to make her compliant and tractable Polly was hardening her mind against him, and perplexing Maggie more and more every day. She had no fear of herself what she should answer if Bob were so rash as to make love to her openly (as if his daily life at present was not all love-making!); but she had many doubts whether she had done what she ought to have done in coming to Blackthorn Grange. She had read very few novels, and was a child for worldly wisdom; but she knew it was not good for a governess to be called a flirt, and Maggie had said to her that if she did not like Bob she was no better than a flirt and a coquette; to which Polly had replied that she did like Bob, and she would not have bad names fastened upon her. But both the girls knew that they were talking at cross purposes, and that liking meant very different things in their vocabularies—standing for downright true love in Maggie's, and in Polly's for a mere general sentiment free to all the world.

The wrench at Polly's heart was very frequently repeated at this time; it was renewed, indeed, day by day. There was an old friend of the Livingstone family, a widow lady, who often dropped in with her work of an afternoon, and was quite in the confidence of the sisters. She tried to take up Polly in the same way, during one of her visits, and extolled Bob so highly that Maggie sat in dread lest Polly should indulge in one of those sharp satiric speeches for which she was famous at school when provoked. But no; Polly sat humiliated and in pain, listening to feeble anecdotes of Bob's babyhood and boyhood, most of which she had heard from his mother, and wishing she was safe at home and her trials and temptations over. While the talk was still at its height down came a heavy pour of rain, and Bob strolled in from the garden. Polly was in possession of his peculiar chair, and, quite simply, not meaning any offense or expecting it to be taken, he said, "Get up, Polly, and you shall sit on my knee." Polly got up, and would have stepped away; but Bob dextrously intercepted her and throned her on his knee, adding, in a cheerful, explanatory tone, "She is going to be my little wife, Mrs. Davis—are you not, Polly?"

"There go two words to that bargain," said

Maggie, and laughed nervously. Polly did not speak, but she made a gentle, decided move to extricate herself, her heart beating with pang after pang and her eyes turned with pathetic entreaty on Bob's face. Bob, who loved her eyes, smiled at their helpless sweetness, and thought they were like his favorite setter's when she cowered at his feet, fearing punishment. He did not let her go at once, and she did not struggle—dignity forbade—but she slipped away by-and-by, and contrived to say, pleasantly, that though it might be a vast honor to sit on Bob's knee she greatly preferred a chair, at which Bob laughed, perhaps rather too incredulously.

The day but one after this was the day fixed for Polly to go home. Mrs. Livingstone was very kind to her, and hoped she would soon return for a longer stay; and this she repeated so frequently that Polly quite understood that she had no doubt of it. Bob left her little peace, but he did not put her out of her pain until the last morning, when she had begun to think she was to get away without incurring the worst test. It was settled the night before that she should go to the station with Maggie and Laura in the pony-carriage, which had a front and back seat; and when she had said good-by to Mrs. Livingstone and Fanny indoors and came out at the garden-door in the morning sunshine there was Bob, in a light summer suit, looking in the finest spirits, but excited withal.

"Are you going, Bob? I have put on my driving gloves," said Laura, who had already taken the reins.

"You may drive and welcome; I only want to go to the turn of Pickett's Lane; I'll sit behind with Polly," said he, and put her in and followed himself. Then Maggie mounted by her sister, and off the pony went at a frisky trot.

Polly's parting glimpse of the Grange was adorned by the figures of Mrs. Livingstone and Fanny in the porch, Fanny waving her hand and crying, "Come back soon, Polly; come back soon!" The road was long and perfectly level and straight, but it wavered in capricious zig-zags before Polly's eyes, while roses and lilies contended for the dominion of her face. Bob was there, and watching her, and her heart was all one great swelling pang. She would have given anything for leave to cry, but this was neither the time nor place for tears, and she had forgotten her veil. Bob was apparently occupied with the landscape, but he did not lose one change of her sweet little face, and presently he began to speak of her return to the Grange.

"But I shall see you before then, Polly," he went on; "I am coming to Norminster next week, and you will introduce me to Jane and your mother. I am only a rough fellow, but I love you dearly, Polly, and you must speak for me. I'll promise to take all the care in the world of you if you'll be my precious little wife—don't you believe me, Polly?"

"I know you are very good, Bob, but I made up my mind long since that I could take care of myself," said Polly, with sudden, invincible, wicked quiet, that came to her aid from no one could tell whence.

"What on earth do you mean, Polly?" demanded Bob, startled out of his happy complacency.

"What I say. You are very kind, but—but I don't intend to marry."

Bob was posed for a moment, though not silenced. "Change your mind for me, Polly. Don't you think we could be happy together? I have quite set my heart on you; I can not live without you."

"That is what all men say beforehand; but I have heard my mother talk. No, Bob; I shall make a better governess than wife; I am not cut out for any body's wife."

"Let me judge of that, Polly; don't shake your head. What has come over you to be such a little savage all at once? You were very nice yesterday; why did you let a fellow go on worshipping you if you meant to be so hard to him at last? I don't understand it; I won't believe you can seriously mean to use a fellow so badly. Is it true, then, that you don't care for me? is it true that you can't be happy with me—that you won't even think of it?"

There was no softening or promise in Polly's countenance. She was feeling that she had come through the dreaded ordeal wonderfully, and the pride and excitement of a complete victory over the traitor in her bosom sustained her. Bob was speechless for a few minutes. They approached the turn of Pickett's Lane. At the supreme moment he looked at her once more with wrathful love, and said, in a constrained voice, "Then you'll have nothing to do with me, Polly?" Her heart moved with a cruel spasm, but her "No, Bob," came out cold, clear, and as clear as a drop of iced water.

Bob stepped into the road as Laura checked the pony. The halt was not for half a minute, and he had disappeared, and Polly was left to enjoy her triumph of principle over natural affection.

Maggie understood but too well what had happened, and, doing by Polly as she would have been done by in similar circumstances, she took no notice of her disappointing friend until they arrived at the station. There were not two minutes to wait, and the train dashed in. Laura staid outside with the pony. Maggie took Polly's ticket, saw her luggage safe and herself in a carriage alone; and then, just as the guard came along with his whistle and "all right," she kissed her and said, with a sob, "I am awfully sorry, Polly; but it is your own fault. You deserve to die an old maid, and I believe you will!"

CHAPTER VI.

It may, perhaps, be anticipated that Polly repented at once, for she was certainly fond of Bob; but it can not confidently be averred that she did. When she arrived at home her mother and Jane thought her looking remarkably rosy and well. Nothing was observed to be the matter with her spirits; and as she kept her own counsel about Bob's offer, she had neither praise nor blame to endure, nor question, nor comment, nor criticism. Mrs. Sanders did remark once, "You have not picked up a beau in the country, then, Miss Polly?" and her mother did rejoice that she hoped her girls had more sense than to dream of beaux, but that was the nearest allusion to the subject; and, when the holidays were over, she went back to the Warden House and resumed her school-room work in her orderly systematic way, as if she had not a care or a thought beyond it. For a month or two Mrs. Stapylton lived in daily expectation of a notice that she must provide herself with another governess; but no notice coming she concluded that Polly had missed her chance, and as she suited her admirably in every way, she was not sorry. Maggie's letters were not much less frequent or affectionate than formerly, but Polly was not invited again to spend her holidays at the Grange, as was very natural. Nor did they meet. People may live half a lifetime within a few miles of each other and never meet, if neither desire it; and the three years Miss Mill had decreed as the shortest time any governess who meant to prosper in her vocation should stay in her first place, went over without ever bringing the two friends within eyesight of each other again.

Nobody died meanwhile, and nobody was broken-hearted; only Mrs. Livingstone was once heard to say, bitterly, to Maggie, "Don't let me hear any more of your Polly Curtis!" and henceforth Polly's letters were read in private, and her name was never mentioned at the Grange. Bob was not the man to rave over a disappointment of the heart; he was more inclined to console himself in a way that was a sorrow to those at home. But Polly heard nothing of these consolations. When she mused of her old visits at Blackthorn Grange, which she did with a tender paradoxical regret (seeing how she had terminated them), her imagination always represented every thing there as it used to be, though she knew Laura and Fanny were married and gone, and that Mrs. Livingstone was no longer the active, strong house-mother she had been. And an unconscious change had come over Polly herself. A sweeter little woman to behold there was not, far nor near, though she dressed herself indifferently, as women do who have no desire or expectation of attracting. She had great fortitude at her tedious work, and never flagged: she improved herself by private study, and had economized a few pounds, which she meant to carry her to a foreign school, where she proposed to teach English in return for lessons in music and languages. Mrs. Curtis approved of her entirely, and Jane had ceased to complain. Yes, Polly was most exceedingly reasonable and practical, and was an anxiety to no one; yet sometimes a terrible sense of isolation would come over her, and she would cry softly, with that old spasm of the heart, "Oh, what a fool I have been!" as if she were sorry for some past irretrievable blunder. She had no longer the conceit of her own strength that was so obtrusive in her at seventeen. She had heard other people talk besides her mother and Mrs. Saunders, and in the loving, kindly family where she was domesticated she saw quite the other side—the happy side—of married life. But she was naturally reserved, and as she had religiously kept her one offer to herself, so she kept her repentance (if it was repentance), and at the three years' end she prepared to change the scene of her life and go to Germany.

Maggie Livingstone shed a few vexed tears over Polly's letter which brought the first announcement of her projected travels, and her brother Bob surprised her again, as he had surprised her on the original occasion which led to Polly's first visit to the Grange. "Going to Germany, is she?" said he, when the communication of her affairs had been made to him—"going to Germany?"

"Yes, and I shall never see her again, very likely. Poor little Polly! I was so fond of her, Bob!"

"Other people were fond of her, too, Maggie, but it was no use; she has not a bit of heart."

"Don't say that, Bob; she has heart enough for any thing, but her head was crammed with ridiculous theories and nonsense. I dare say she is wiser now."

"We are all of us that when it's too late," rejoined Bob, and walked out of the room softly whistling.

It was the same evening that Maggie, addressing her brother, said: "Bob, you'll drive me into Lanswood on Saturday; I have written to ask Polly to meet me at Miss Wiggins's shop if it is fair, for a last walk and talk together. I can't bear the thought of letting her go so far from home without a word of good-by."

"All right, Maggie," said Bob, with seeming indifference, but Maggie knew better than to believe it was real. She felt sure that when he did not hear or answer her further talk that he was musing of Polly—perhaps whether she was wiser or not now.

Polly was touched by Maggie's longing to see her again: "Dear old Maggie, she has forgiven me at last," she said.

Polly arrived first at the place of their appointment, and was sitting up stairs in Miss Wiggins's show-room when the Grange dog-cart stopped at the door. She looked out with a pale little emotional face, and the cruel wrench at her heart; but no one looked up from below. There was Bob dressed in mourning, and Maggie and a little boy also in mourning, and a groom behind, who assisted Maggie to alight, and then lifted the child down and set him on the pavement by her. Maggie took the boy by the hand to enter the shop, and Bob drove off up the street, and was out of sight before his sister could mount the stairs. Polly stood fronting the door, and as Maggie caught a view of her she cried: "Bless thy bonnie face, Polly, it's just the same as ever!" and they kissed with all the old love that used to be between them. And, of course, they cried a little together, until the appearance of Miss Wiggins, intent on business, obliged them to clear their countenances, and take an interest in the fashions.

Maggie said she wanted nothing for herself, but she would look at some children's spring coats, and while Miss Wiggins was bringing forth patterns, she called the child to her knees, and taking off his hat, ruffled up his hair, and asked Polly who he was like.

"He is like Bob," said Polly, and blushed with soft surprise.

"It is Bob's son," replied Maggie. "Kiss this pretty lady, Arty." Arty was nothing loth, and Polly having supplied him with a box of sugar-plums from Miss Wiggins's various stores, he sat on a stool at their feet, and was extremely content with his own society while the friends talked in hushed and interrupted tones.

"A hundred things have happened at the Grange that I never told you of; but you may have heard whispers? No! You know nothing about it, then? You governesses live quite out of the world, I suppose?" said Maggie, and paused.

"In a very quiet, secluded little world of our own," said Polly, and lifted up the child's face to look at him again.

"He's pretty, isn't he? It was after—you know what—Bob took up suddenly with a girl in the village, and though we never knew it until she was dead (she died last October) he was married to her, and Arty is his heir. Bob dotes on him, and my mother too; she insisted on having him brought home to the Grange, and if ever you go to our church again you'll see 'Alice, the faithful wife of Robert Livingstone' on the family monument. She was quite a common person, and Bob would never have acknowledged her in my mother's lifetime; but there's the story, and not so bad as it might have been. She was handsome, and she loved Bob, or she would never have borne being looked down on as she was for his sake, or have kept his secret. However, it is out now, and she is gone—"

"Hasn't Arty eaten sweets enough for once?" insinuated Polly, caressing the child, but making no response to Maggie.

"Yes: give the box to aunty to put in her pocket," Maggie said, and Arty with a little unwillingness yielded it up.

Then the spring coats were looked at, and one chosen, and a garden hat, and Arty was put to sleep for an hour on Miss Wiggins's bed, while Polly and her friend took a walk by the river and continued their conversation. All the news was on Maggie's side. Polly had none—literally none.

"And you never will have any while you go on living to yourself—your interests will lessen every day you live. Oh! Polly, it makes me sad to look at you, and to think what might have been," said Maggie, tenderly.

"Never mind! Let by-gones be by-gones," said Polly; but there were tears in her eyes, and almost a sob in her throat.

Then they discussed Fanny and Laura and Maggie's private concerns, which were in a promising way, and the time went so swiftly that they were five minutes behind the hour agreed on for Bob to take his sister and little son up at Miss Wiggins's shop to go home. The dog-cart, however, was not at the door, and Maggie said she was glad, for Bob did not like the mare to be kept standing. They ascended to the show-room to wait, and he was not long in coming; he was too soon, indeed, for half they had to say. At the sound of the wheels in the street Polly offered herself for a last hug of her friend's kind arms, and Maggie was all in tears.

"You'll come down and speak to Bob just for a minute?" said she, and Polly suffered herself to be entreated, and went with all her heart in her face.

Bob evidently expected her, though he colored when she appeared; and as he lifted his hat she saw he was ever so much older, but he had his kind rallying smile for her, as he said: "You wear well, Polly; better than most of us, I think."

"It is a calm life at the Warden House," said she, quite with a shaken voice.

"And so you are going all the way to Germany—going by yourself?"

"Yes." She had to stand aside for Maggie and the child to reach their places, and from the step of Miss Wiggins's shop she waved them all her good-bys. She was still standing gazing after them when Bob looked round before turning the corner of the street, and told Maggie to dry her eyes and not fret.

"I can't help fretting when I think I shall perhaps never see her again; dear little thing that she is! Oh! Bob, if you had only waited to ask her till now that she's come to a right sense of things."

Bob made no answer to his sister's rueful adjuration; he was lost in thought of Polly's beauty and Polly's sweetness, as they were once and were still, and wondering whether she would have anything to do with him now.

Perhaps you can guess how it all ended, and I need tell you no more.

Yes. Bob asked Polly again, and Polly gave him a prettier answer this time. Mrs. Curtis cried at the wedding and foreboded many evils, but they have not befallen yet. While waiting for them she is, however, blessed in a standing grievance—namely, that Polly's one boy is not the eldest son, and will not inherit the Livingstone Manor. But she is not aware that she is herself to blame for this, her pet mortification, and Polly is not likely to tell her.

Swiss Muslin Fichu, with Green Satin Trimming.

This pretty fichu is of Swiss muslin, and is trimmed round the edge in the manner shown in the illustration with narrow Valenciennes insertion, through which very narrow green satin ribbon is drawn, and which is edged with Valenciennes lace a little over an inch in width. A bow with long ends of green satin ribbon three-fourths of an inch wide is set on the middle of the back; and a similar bow, with short ends, confines the fichu in front in the manner shown in the illustration. For the fichu, cut the fichu in a single piece from Fig. 49. Border this piece with insertion and edging in the manner already described, lay pleats in the back and front from X to O, as marked on the pattern, and finish with ribbon bows. This fichu is a tasteful addition to a summer toilette.

Marie Antoinette Fichu.

We have already given in the Supplements to Harper's Bazar several patterns of this graceful article which is so universally in favor this summer. The present style possesses the advantage of being exceedingly simple and easily made, and withal pretty and becoming, especially for young girls. It is of fine Swiss muslin, trimmed with guipure insertion and edging and narrow blue satin ribbon. Cut the fichu whole from Fig. 50 of the Supplement, and hem it narrow on the right side. Cover this hem with the back with a pleated piece of muslin which is set in, the seam being covered with a pleated bias strip of Swiss muslin. In the middle of the front and back, at the point where the pleated strips cross, is placed a knot also of the pleated muslin. The neck is finished with a row of guipure insertion, through which velvet ribbon is drawn. This insertion is half an inch in width, and is edged with guipure lace one-third of an inch in width. The sleeves are also of pleated muslin. The upper and lower edges are bordered with insertion, and the under edge also with lace. The chemise is cut from the pattern given for the low-necked guipure chemise russe. The trimming is put on as shown by the illustration. This chemise russe is especially suited to young girls.

THIS chemise Russe is of Swiss muslin. The revers is lined with lilac silk and bordered on the outer edge with two rows of Valenciennes lace, arranged so that the straight sides lie together. The belt is covered with a bias strip of lilac silk, which is laid in two folds and finished in front with a lilac bow. Cut the chemise Russe from the pattern given for Fig. 23; but on the upper border allow the material to extend only to the dotted line. The revers is of muslin arranged as shown by the illustration. which must extend one-quarter of an inch beyond the muslin on the outer edge. Finish the edge with lace and sew the revers on the chemise, as shown by the illustration, in such a manner as to conceal the seam. The short puffed sleeves are made of a piece of muslin fifteen inches long by five wide in the middle. The ends are sloped till they are only two inches in width. Sew this piece together on the ends, gather the under edge and join it with a revers, which is cut and arranged as shown by the illustration. On the upper edge gather according to the size of the arm-hole, and sew into the chemise.

FEMININE AFFECTIONS.

A FAVORITE form of feminine affectation among certain opposers of the prevalent fast type is an intense womanliness, an aggravating intensity of womanliness, that makes one long for a little roughness as to how they do it, and how they look while they are doing it. In every action of their lives they see themselves as pictures, as characters in a novel, as impersonations of poetic images or thoughts. If they give you a glass of water, or take your cup from you, they are Youth and Beauty ministering to Strength or Age, as the case may be; if they bring you a photographic album, they are Titian's Daughter carrying her casket, a trifle modernized; if they hold a child in their arms, they are Madonnas, and look unutterable maternal love, though they never saw the little creature before, and care for it no more than for the puppy in the mews; if they do any small personal office, or attempt to do it, making believe to tie a shoe-string, comb out a curl, fasten a button, they are Charities in graceful attitudes, and expect you to think them both charitable and graceful. Nine times out of ten they can neither tie a string nor fasten a button with ordinary deftness, for they have a trick of using only the ends of their fingers when they do any thing with their hands, as being more graceful, and altogether fitting in better than would a firmer grasp with the delicate womanliness of the character; and the less sweet and more commonplace woman who does not attitudinize morally, and never parades her womanliness, beats them out of the field for real helpfulness, and is the Charity which the other only plays at being. This kind too affects, in theory, wonderful submissiveness to man. It upholds Griselda as the type of feminine perfection, and—still in theory—between independence and being tyrannized over, goes in for the tyranny. "I would rather my husband beat me than let me do too much as I liked," said one before she mar-ness, just to take off the cloying excess of sweetness. This kind is generally found with large eyes, dark in the lids and hollow in the orbit, by which a certain spiritual expression is given to the face, a certain look of being consumed by the hidden fire of lofty thought, that is very effective. It does not destroy the effectiveness that the real cause of the darkened lids and cavernous orbits is most probably internal disease, when not antimony; eyes of this sort stand for spirituality and loftiness of thought and intense womanliness of nature, and, as all men are neither chemists nor doctors, the simulation does quite as well as truth. The main characteristic of these women is self-consciousness. They live before a moral mirror, and pass their time in attitudinizing to what they think the best advantage. They can do nothing simply, nothing spontaneously, and without the fullest consciousried, who, after she was married, managed to get entire possession of the domestic reins, and took good care that her nominal lord should be her practical slave. For, notwithstanding the sweet submissiveness of her theory, the intensely womanly woman has the most astonishing knack of getting her own way and imposing her own will on others. The real tyrant among women is not the one who flounces and splutters, and declares that nothing shall make her obey, but the soft-mannered, large-eyed, and intensely womanly person, who says that Griselda is her ideal, and that the whole duty of woman lies in unquestioning obedience to man.

In contrast with this special affectation is the mannish woman—the woman who wears a double-breasted coat with big buttons, of which she flings back the lapels with an air, understanding the suggestiveness of a wide chest and the need of unchecked breathing; who wears unmistakable shirt-fronts, linen collars, vests, and plain ties, like a man; who folds her arms or sets them akimbo, like a man; who even nurses her feet and cradles her knees, in spite of her petticoats, and makes believe that the attitude is comfortable because it is manlike. If the excessively womanly woman is affected in her breadth and roughness. She adores dogs and horses, which she places far above children of all ages. She boasts of how good a marksman she is—she does not call herself markswoman—and how she can hit right and left, and bring down both birds flying. She is great in cheese and beer, in claret and still Champagne, but despises the puerilities of sweets or of effervescing wines. She rounds her elbows and turns her wrists outward, as men round their elbows and turn their wrists outward. She is fond of carpentry, she says, and boasts of her powers with the plane and saw; for charms to her watch-chain she wears a cork-screw, a gimlet, a big knife, and a small foot-rule; and in entire contrast with the intensely womanly woman, who uses the tips of her fingers only, the mannish woman when she does any thing uses the whole hand, and if she had to thread a needle would thread it as much by her palm as by her fingers. All of which is affectation—from first to last affectation; a mere assumption of virile fashions utterly inharmonious to the whole being, physical and mental, of a woman.

RUBIES.

THE value of the ruby much exceeds, when perfect, that of any other gem. A pure brilliant, for instance, of four carats would be worth eleven hundred dollars; but a pure ruby, of that vivid pigeon-blood color which is so highly prized, would fetch two thousand dollars. It all depends on the color, since a pale ruby of the same size might not be worth sixty dollars. There are very few large ones in existence. The King of Burmah is said to possess one as big as a pigeon's egg; but then nobody (who is any body in a jeweler's point of view?) has ever seen it. However, the ruby-mines of Burmah produce the finest stones, and when a particularly good one is found a procession of grandees, with soldiers and elephants, is sent out to meet it. One of the titles of his Burmese majesty is Lord of the Rubies.

SOMETHING LEFT.

"Gone, gone, the freshness of my youthful prime;
Gone my illusions, tender or sublime;
Gone is the thought that wealth is worth its cost,
Or ought I hold so good as what I've lost;
Gone are the beauty and the nameless grace
That once I worship'd in dear Nature's face;
Gone is the mighty muscle that of yore
Swept through the woods or roll'd upon the shore;
Gone the desire of glory in men's breath
To waft my name beyond the deeps of death;
Gone is the hope that in the darkest day
Saw bright To-morrow with empurpled ray;
Gone, gone—all gone, on which my heart was cast;
Gone, gone forever, to the awful Past;
All gone—but Love!"

Oh, coward to repine!
Thou hast all else, if Love indeed be thine!

KITTY CLOVER.

KITTY CLOVER behaves with young Brown Pudding precisely as my Jenny does with her doll. Just so long as the doll was wrapped in tissue and entombed in a sort of paper coffin, high out of Jenny's reach, it was the object of her admiration, longings, prayers, and tears; but when my prudent spouse, touched with compassion, delivered it over to her, to have and to hold henceforth, she tired of it in half a day.

It is always under the sofa now, or standing on its flaxen head in a corner, with its pink satin slippers flourishing wildly in the air, or in the grate, or in the area, or forgotten behind some door, and staring about it with a wide-eyed desolation of look—Brown Pudding's precise expression, similarly deserted; not, indeed, on his head in the corner, but as well have been, or hanging by his neck from a door-knob, for what Kitty cares; or in disconsolate attendance on some fright, to whom Kitty has ordered him to be attentive, because, poor thing, the men neglect her so; or holding Kitty's cloak and bouquet while she dances four square dances, and six round ones, without once looking his way; or humbly importuning her to make him miserable by driving or walking with him, and flirting meanwhile with whoever else she happened to meet; or sneakily attempting to pluck up a spirit, and instantly routed by a frown, a shrug, a pout, or an arching of her handsome black eyebrows.

For she would make a Persian satrap blink and wink again, this black-eyed little despot! She so snubs him, and chaffs him, and turns her back on him! And yet once, when Brown absent-minded himself for a week (by advice), and was seen every day with Mehetabel Meringue (by advice again), heigh-ho! our little Kitty had no smiles for any body, and played melancholy music of evenings—till—Brown came back again, and then—she was loftier than ever.

What can a man do in such a case? Friends advised Brown to try more absence and side flirtations. But he is of the opinion that the first remedy is worse than the disease, and he dares not risk the second. Friends indignantly advised Kitty to beware how she trifled with a man for whom by-and-by she would cry her eyes out; and Kitty, with a toss, as indignantly replied that "she should never cry her eyes out for any one." And how matters ever were settled, unless you will agree to believe that she really went to Hades, you will find it difficult to explain.

For myself, I believe it; and I think I should be better acquainted with her history than you, and for these reasons:—It is absurd to say that any thing is impossible in these days, when you can light up a man's stomach and examine it by the help of a Gessler's lantern. And besides, if this was not Hades, what could have been the place in which she so suddenly and strangely found herself on stepping from the carriage?

Brown was helping her out. They had been at the Opera, and Kitty had laughed the whole evening with young Etoile; and on the way home Brown had sulked and pulled his mustache in silence! But Kitty was not to be disconcerted by such trifles, but dozed and smelled at her bouquet, and gave him the tips of her fingers, and stepped out, laughing at his grave face, into—darkness. She turned around and around, but it was equally dark on every side of her. Then she became frightened, and called on Brown.

"I am here," he answered.

"But where is here? What is this?" asked Kitty?

"Haven't the least idea," replied Brown, cavalierly. For once, though he was with Kitty, he was evidently not thinking about her. Kitty was piqued, and, with her favorite toss, walked on till they were stopped by something like a huge iron gate.

"Oh, what is this?" whimpered Miss Clover, in great terror.

"Kitty Clover and Brown Pudding!" roared a strong voice, as if calling a roll. "Brown Pudding—No. 900, in the place where the good lovers go. Kitty Clover—Nos. 369, 896, 457, 695, 842, among the impertinent flirts."

And, with the words, Brown was whisked one way, and she another; and, struggling and sobbing, Kitty found herself dangling from a monstrous tulip-stem in a field of similar flowers.

"Dear me, Kitty Clover!" lisped a familiar voice; "are you here too? Do tell me how I look. There is not a glass in the whole place. So you see what you have to expect. Is it not dreadful?" And her next neighbor wagged herself this way and that on her stem, and twisted a tress of yellow hair around her finger.

Kitty looked at her in consternation.

"Why I thought you were dead, Myra Harris!"

"So I am, and so are you. Oh dear! my hair will not curl without curling cream, and I am such a fright in straight hair, am I not, Kitty Clover? Oh! one of them is coming, Kitty Clover. Quick! do tell me! am I a fright?"

"One of who is coming?" asked Kitty, bewildered, and with little chills creeping down her back at finding herself so unceremoniously dead.

"Oh! one is coming! One is coming!" cried all the tulips, or rather their occupants, in chorus. The whole field was in commotion. Blonde and brunette faces twisted and smirked on all sides. One looked down because a mournful expression became her, and one twisted her neck around to display her profile, because that was prettier; and on all sides were heard fair ones wishing for rouge, for crimping-pins, for false hair, for even a bit of lace. But Kitty could see nobody but Brown walking down the path, and she asked again, "Who is coming?"

"Why, that man," replied Myra, impatiently. "He is one of the good lovers."

"Oh! Brown Pudding!" Kitty tossed her head, or rather tossed on her stem.

"Very fine; but when you have been here as long as I have, you will not toss yourself," observed Myra, petulantly; "for unless one of these good lovers should take pity on you, you will stay on your stem to the end of all time, I can tell you that. And the worst of it is, that the good lovers hear lectures every day on female arts, depravities, and virtues; and they get so wonderfully wise that they are not to be caught by a pink and white bloom, or a golden tress, or any thing of that sort. They look at your moral and mental qualities; and it is such tiresome work being moral and mental! He is looking this way. Oh! I wish my hair would curl!"

Kitty's heart beat fast, for he came her way, and he was looking at her. Oh! the eager heads that turned toward him! The eyes that looked after him! The thrills of hope wherever he glanced! The disappointment and the tears when he passed by! Poor little souls! all trying to catch his attention! trying to look prudent! trying to look gentle! trying to look clever! The agitation was infectious. Kitty's heart beat faster and faster, and she gave him such a shy, imploring look as would have made him ecstatic on earth. But how coolly he looked her over now, and passed on!

"Now I call that too bad," said Myra, chuckling. "And you a new-comer too! He might have spoken."

"As if I cared!" cried Kitty.

"Oh, my dear! no use to say that. We are not on earth. We all care, and every body knows it; because if no one takes us—do you see that shriveled face over there? That is what we grow like, especially if one has no good qualities."

"But how do you get the good qualities?" asked Kitty, curiously.

"Oh! I can hardly tell. Think of improving things, I suppose. We have lectures too; but I never can keep awake; or else I catch myself thinking about my hair, or wondering about the fashions. Were hoops out when you came? There comes another one. Oh! I wish he would look this way!"

But no, he turned into another path; and, watching him, Kitty saw him awaited with the same eagerness and followed by the same crushing disappointment.

"Hateful, odious creatures!" she cried, indignantly. "Why do they come here to aggravate us? looking this way, and, as we wait, turning to the left, and from there veering suddenly to the right about to play with the hearts and hopes of as many as possible! I say it is monstrous!"

"No more monstrous, Miss Clover, than you are," answered a voice.

"The lecture! the lecture!" whispered Myra, "much good may it do you!"

"Every gentleman has a right to make a choice," continued the voice. "Ladies should not risk their hearts and hopes readily; and surely a man has a right to use his eyes and look where he pleases."

Now, Kitty had said something very like this, on that last night of the Opera, when Brown had accused her of trifling with him.

"And I do not call that a lecture, I call it impertinence," she said, reddening furiously.

"You will hear plenty of it," observed the consoling Myra.

"Miserable place!" exclaimed Kitty, twisting angrily on her stem; but just then she saw Brown Pudding. He was walking up and down, not looking her way, but studying a little miniature that he held in his hand.

"That is not my miniature," thought Kitty, aloud.

"I should fancy not," answered Myra, sharply.

"That is a miniature out of the good lovers' picture-gallery. When he comes each lover selects the picture that suits him best, and studies it, and if he takes any of us it is sure to be the person who resembles his picture most. Your miniature, indeed! Let me tell you that the more he examines that the less he will care for your color, and your little mouth, and your straight nose that you are so proud of."

"I am not proud of it," said Kitty.

"You know you are," snapped Myra, so unpleasantly that Kitty would not have spoken again only her curiosity got the better of her. Brown was continually turning the miniature, and seeming to compare one side with the other; and she could not help questioning Myra.

"On that other side," returned Myra, maliciously, "is that straight nose that you are so proud of, and your hair and your eyes, just as they will be. All the little scornful lines, just as they will be. The corners of your mouth turned down, as they will be. Your color gone, as it will go. Just the same weak look that you always wear. You, as you will be, without your youth, plumpness, good spirits, crimps, and curls! And for all your straight nose, I can tell you, you are not pretty, Kitty Clover! On the other side is Hattie Strong, who has all the good qualities, as she will be! And there is no denying it, Kitty Clover: those girls that have clear, pleasant faces, and quiet, sensible eyes, and that do not depend on their hair and dress, as we do, wear better than we! You can see for yourself now. The miniature is turned this way."

"I do not care to see it," returned Kitty, swelling with jealous rage at the sight of her self and servant devouring another woman's picture before her eyes.

"Let him go," she said to herself; but he had never looked to her so well worth keeping; and as he glanced at that moment toward her she felt a sudden hope. She gave him a shy, imploring glance. It fell on him as if he had been so much steel. He did not even seem to see it, but turned again to study the miniature. Grief and rage tore little Kitty's heart, and tears blinded her eyes.

"The brute! I hate him!" she said; but even as she spoke he looked her way once more, and, dashing away the tears, tried to smile.

"It is of no use to do that," observed Myra, kindly. "The good lovers learn all these arts at the lectures. He knows that you are bursting with jealousy, if you do stretch your mouth so."

But the smile must have had its effect after all, for Brown pocketed the miniature, and walked down the path to Kitty.

"Good-morning, Kitty."

"Good-morning," returned Kitty, tremulously.

"Fine day," pursued Brown, taking no notice of her agitation.

A fine day! it was all blackness of darkness to Kitty.

"Of course you think so," she answered.

"What is the matter now?" inquires Brown, looking astonished.

"You do not care for me, or you would not ask that. But of course, you do not care for me. Walking about with that miniature in your pocket!"

"Oh! come now! You are cross, because you are fast on that stem, and you would like to see me fast too."

Kitty thinks that she has reason to be, but, remembering that if she wins Brown it must be by good qualities, struggles with her vexations.

"Perhaps I am," she says, sighing.

"Why look so unpleasant?" continued Brown.

"You can hardly expect me to admire such a sour face as that. Why not smile and sing?"

Kitty tried. She brushed away her tears; she perked up her little head, and, clearing her throat, commenced "Sweet Kitty Clover." But, oh dear! Brown had forgotten her already, and he was studying his miniature again; and when he had sufficiently examined it,

"Yes," he said, jauntily, "it is a fine place; I am quite charmed with it!" and walked away. He! he! he! tittered all the other flirts, nodding to each other. For Kitty, she was smitten with a sort of stupid wonder.

"How can any human being have the heart to treat another so?" she exclaimed. "I wish I could be really dead!"

"Is it so much worse for you than for him?" asked the lecturing voice. "Just such hopes and disappointments, such chokings down of his temper and his grievances, such hypocrisies, and such submissions to injustice, have made the greater part of the last two years of Brown's life. And what have you done to deserve his kindness? Nothing. But what has he not done to deserve yours? The sacrifices that he has made must have touched any woman's heart, but you had no heart. No wonder that he is tired of his bondage, and prefers Hattie Strong."

"I will never believe that he does. He shall not; I will not let him!" exclaimed Kitty, and, making a desperate effort, found herself sobbing in her chair, and Brown Pudding looking wonderingly at her.

"I really think you fell asleep while I was reading," observed Brown.

"Asleep! Oh, Brown! you will not marry Hattie Strong, will you?" cried Kitty, rushing up to him and seizing him by the arm, as if to keep him from disappearing. "You could not do it, could you, Brown?"

"I should think not," cried the young man, in a rapture; and Kitty drew a long breath. If he had been to the place where the good lovers go, and heard those horrid lectures, he had forgotten them; that was clear, she thought.

I think so too, for Brown and Kitty were married last Thursday.

ONLY SIXTEEN.

ONLY sixteen, and lying there—
Dead, dumb beauty—soft, golden hair;
Hands like the lily, folded and fair—
Only sixteen.

Only sixteen—fall bitter tears;
Can God want saints of such tender years,
Who have wrought no ripeness from woes and fears?
Only sixteen.

Only "sixteen" on her coffin-lid;
Must the sunny hair and sweet lips be hid,
And we stand helpless, nor dare forbid?
Only sixteen.

Only sixteen—why, her books lie here;
She is yet but a school-girl stretched on the bier,
A sweet child-woman, how deathless dear!
Only sixteen.

Only sixteen—and I loved her!—oh
God He knoweth what only I know;
And I never dared press her sweet lips, so!
Only sixteen.

Only sixteen, and lying there—
Dead, dumb beauty—soft, golden hair;
Hands like the lily, folded and fair—
Only sixteen.

Adventures and Misadventures of

CHAPTER I.

MY FIRST HOME.

MY earliest recollections are of a scene which throughout an eventful life has been, and to the end of life will remain, in my esteem, the brightest region of this various and beautiful world. From Indian forests, from the shores of mightier rivers, under the light of larger stars, my thoughts have flown back to the streams and woods of my early home, and taken shelter there, as young birds return to the nest they have been too eager to abandon.

I was born in London, in the year 1731, but of my birth-place or of those who watched my cradle I have no recollection. My first babyish steps trod the soft turf of a gentleman's park in the county of Bucks—a domain so large that in my childish ideas the world beyond its boundaries must needs be very narrow. Deep in the heart of this sylvan scene there was a game-keeper's cottage, and to the game-keeper's honest wife I owed those maternal cares which transformed a sickly infant into a sturdy lad.

Until my tenth birthday the game-keeper's cottage was my only home; the game-keeper, his wife, and their one little girl my only friends. Nor did I sigh for other companionship or a more agreeable abode. The low white cottage, cross-barred with ponderous timbers painted black, the slanting thatched roof, pointed gables, and small casement windows, curtained with roses and honey-suckle, appeared to me the perfection of a dwelling-place. It had been called the warren's lodge in the old times, when the skins of rabbits and conies were employed for the costume of English knights and squires, and the rabbit-warren was a feature of great importance in a gentleman's estate. It still stood on the border of a great warren, the safe keeping whereof was one of my foster-father's duties.

This tranquil home I loved with all my heart, and my little sister Margery—for by that tender name I had learned to call her—I regarded as the dearest of created beings. With her I spent my days, wandering hand in hand among the fern and underwood, knowing the progress of time only by the different wild-flowers which the changing seasons gave us.

Nor did we lack companions and play-fellows in our childish sports. The sylvan depths we inhabited were alive with wild creatures that had grown almost tame in this deep solitude. Mild-eyed fawns watched us gravely when we played; squirrels leaped and frisked before us, no more conscious than ourselves of life's realities; partridge and pheasant, blackbird and thrush, flattered the young fern in the bright days of early summer; and in the shadow of a copse that was purple with hyacinths the rabbits swarmed thick as Virgil's famous bees.

This was my world from my first hours of in-fantine consciousness until my tenth birthday; and bitter was the stroke which ended this phase of my life. On the knees of the keeper's wife I had uttered my first prayer; in the brawny arms of the keeper I had been carried before I learned to walk. The first syllables which my lips had shaped were those that called these good creatures Mammy and Daddy. I was but just old enough to perceive the progress of events when little Margery's baby face first beamed upon our family circle, and from that hour I had tenderly loved the fair-haired baby, who grew betimes into my sister and companion.

In those early years of my life I tasted perfect happiness; and not to the lips of many children is that cup offered. Over the fairest childhood there is generally some shadow—sickness or change of fortune, a cross nurse or a careless mother. But in the humble home where I was reared there was no skeleton lurking in secret cupboard. The keeper and his wife were young, honest, and healthy. They loved each other fondly, and had affection to spare for the foster-child that came to them before their own. For these good creatures life was not to be all sunshine; for them, as for me, there were to be trial, and tempest, and gloom. But the halcyon days of their existence were these which I shared with them—a period of calm and pure delight, which was destined to haunt me in many a scene of horror and death, in many an hour of heart-sickness and despondency.

My pleasures in these days were of the simplest. To trudge beside the keeper on his morning round; once, on a rare occasion of never-to-be-forgotten delight, to watch with him in the moonlit woods for midnight snarers of hare and pheasant; to ride to the market-town with Mammy in a lumbering cart, which the good soul sometimes drove; to hunt for mushrooms in the dewy mornings; to pick blackberries in September, and to roast chestnuts with Margery among the ashes at Christmas—these were the chief excitements of my childhood.

Neighbors we had none. The nearest village was seven miles away from us. The nearest house was the great pile of building in the centre of the park—a grand old mansion of the Elizabethan era, encircled by a broad moat, and approached by a grim arched gateway that belonged to a much earlier period.

The fairy tales which I had heard at this time must needs have been few; yet I never beheld this gloomy gateway, flanked by its twin Gothic towers, nor did I ever peer into the dark still water of the moat, with its vague sense of the supernatural, some instinctive feeling of awe, which was stronger even than my curiosity.

The dreary quiet of the place, the long rows of blank shuttered casements, the absence of sound or movement on the terraces and in the courts, the massive towers, and the iron-clamped gate, which seemed no more likely to be opened than the black doors of the mausoleum in the park, were indeed calculated to inspire unwelcome thoughts in the breast of childhood. When I was old enough to be curious I questioned my good-humored Daddy, and he freely imparted all he knew about the mansion which filled me with such wonder.

He told me that house and park and woods, and the little church within the park-walls, where there was service on alternate Sundays, all belonged alike to his mistress, Lady Barbara Lestranger, who lived in foreign parts, where her husband, Sir Marcus Lestranger, had been sent ambassador.

"Which be a kind o' king in its way," added the keeper, with the pride of a faithful servant, whose master's honors are in some sort his own.

"And does no one live at the great house now, daddy?" I asked.

"No one but old Anthony Grimshaw and his wife, and a couple of women-servants. A rare starchy gentleman is Tony Grimshaw, and has been house-steward to my lady and my lady's father these thirty years. They do say as Mrs. Grimshaw's a brimstone; but she have always been kind to me and my wife, and 'twould come ill from me to say aught agen her. Madge was house-maid up at the great house before I married her, in the old earl's time; and she's owned to me that mother Grimshaw was a bit of a scold. She was Martha Peyton then, and own maid to Lady Barbara, and they say as she must have frightened old Tony into marrying her. But she's been kind to us in the hard winters; and when Sissy was born she sent us wine and tea, and such-like fal-lals; so we'll let by-gones be by-gones, Robin."

"And has Lady Barbara been kind to thee, daddy?" I asked. (We "thee'd" and "thou'd" each other in these parts; but I shall take no pains to reproduce the patois of the country, which I have indeed in some part forgotten, having heard and conversed in many strange languages since I first learned my native tongue from honest Jack Hawker, my foster-father.)

"Has she been kind to thee, daddy?" I reiterated.

"Ah, Robin, kind enough in the way of fine folks like her. She brought thee to my wife to nurse, and has paid me handsome for thy bite and sup."

This was not the first time I had heard that I was but an alien in the home I loved so dearly.

"She brought me, daddy! Where did she bring me from?"

"From London, Rob; where thou wouldst have starved, poor orphan, but for her. The Lord knows where my lady found thee; but she was ever charitable and kind to the poor. Thou wert the sickliest infant ever these eyes looked upon, and thou must thank my wife Madge that thou art here to-day."

"I wish thou wert my real father, daddy," I said. Whereon sturdy Jack Hawker snatched me up in his great arms, and covered me with kisses.

"So do I, little one," he cried, with an oath; "but wishing won't make thee mine; and some day my lady will come and take thee away from daddy and mammy."

This set me blubbering, and the good fellow had hard work to comfort me. His forebodings were too quickly realized; for within a year of this time my pleasant childish life came to a sudden close, and I began the world.

CHAPTER II.

PASTORS AND MASTERS.

I HAD been gathering sticks in the woods with Margery one bright October afternoon, and came home loaded, with my little sister trotting merrily by my side, both of us happy in the consciousness of deserving mammy's praise for our labors. We came bounding into the cozy little kitchen; but, finding no one there, threw down our burdens and went in search of mammy. We paused, awe-struck, on the threshold of the parlor, that sacred Sabbath chamber, where portraits of King William and Queen Mary hung on each side of the chimney-piece, and where an earthen-ware pot of fresh flowers always adorned the somewhat cheerless hearth. In this room, so rarely used as to be in a manner a chamber of mystery, we beheld mammy seated in solemn converse with a stranger; a tall, thin, pale-faced woman, dressed in black, and of a severe aspect; a woman whose face had been plowed and ravaged by that dire scourge of those days, the small-pox, and at sight of whom little Margery uttered a faint shriek of terror, and immediately turned and fled. Not so myself, who stood transfixed by the strange vision.

"Is that the boy?" demanded the stranger, sternly.

My foster-mother faltered an affirmative. "Come hither, boy," said the stranger; and I obeyed with fear and trembling.

Upon this she began to question me. "What is your name?" she asked.

"Robin," I mumbled.

"Robin what? Nothing but Robin, poor cast-away!"

She shook her head in a dismal manner, and groaned aloud. I think it was the first groan I had ever heard, and the sound appalled me.

"Robin is but a vulgar name for Robert," she said. "Can you read, Robert?"

I stared on hearing myself addressed by this new name.

"Is the boy an idiot?" cried the grim stranger.

"My name is Robin," I answered; "and I know nowt of reading."

This was true. In the circle in which I had lived, reading and writing were unknown accomplishments.

The stranger shook her head again more dismally than before.

"It is time you were taken in hand, Master Robert," she said; and I hated her forthwith for this persistent alteration of my name. "Would you like to live in a big house, and to learn to read and write?"

"I'd rather stay with daddy and mammy," I answered, sidling up to my foster-mother, who rewarded me with a silent hug.

"And grow up a very heathen in the darkness of ignorance?" said the stranger. "Happily for you, Master Robert, Providence does not permit us to choose our own paths, or few among us would be snatched from the burning. I have had a letter from my lady bidding me take you to live at the great house, where my good husband will undertake your education."

The whole of this speech might have been spoken in a foreign language for any comprehension I had of its meaning, except so far as it conveyed to me the one direful fact that I was to be separated from those I loved. I began to cry, and little Margery, who had crept back to the doorway, curious to observe the stranger, came running into the room, and flung her arms round my neck. Her affection conquered her terror of the grim stranger, and she looked defiance at the dame as she clung to me.

"Naughty woman shan't take 'oo, Rob," she cried; but her mother interposed, and laid a firm hand on the dear innocent's lips.

"We shall be very sorry to lose him, Madam," she said, gently; "he has been like our own child; and I wish my lady had given us longer notice before she took him away."

"Hoity toity!" cried the dame, indignantly; "my lady thought she had to do with sensible people. You could not suppose you were to keep this boy all his life. He has to learn how to get an honest livelihood, that he mayn't be a burden on Lady Barbara to the end of the chapter, as some folks I would rather not mention were a burden upon my lady's father. He comes of a bad stock, Mistress Hawker; and running wild in the forest won't mend him."

On this the keeper's wife hugged me closer to her honest heart.

"There is not a better child in the county of Bucks," cried the tender soul, with some warmth. Margery, perceiving, as by instinct, that I had been maligned, clung about me the closer; and thus bound together by grief and affection, and encircled by the mother's fond arms, we defied the intruder.

"I don't come of a bad stock, and I ain't a burden upon any one; and I don't want to live at the big house with the nasty black water round it; and I don't like you, because you're ugly; and I won't leave mammy and daddy."

"I wish you joy of your nurse-child, Margery Hawker," cried the stranger, getting up from her chair in a great passion, and stalking to the door. "His manners and his learning do you credit; and I'm sure my lady will be vastly pleased with you when she hears the good effects of your care."

My foster-mother pleaded pardon for my ignorance in a great fright, for Mrs. Grimshaw held a sceptre of regal sway at Hauteville Hall, during the prolonged absence of Sir Marcus and my lady. Margery and I were sent from the room in disgrace, and retired to weep together in the kitchen, where I plighted my youthful troth to the sweet young damsel, and swore that none but she should be my wife. Better for one of us, God knows, better for us both, it may be, if I had never forgotten that childish vow, and had lived to fulfill it.

"I'll never go to the big, ugly house, Sissy," said I; "but we'll be married, and live in the woods with the squirrels, and have nuts and berries for our dinner."

"Yes; but some night we should die of hunger, and the robins would cover us with leaves; and mammy and daddy would be sorry," cried Madge, who had heard the story of the Children in the Wood.

After this there came a few more careless days, during which Margery and I gathered wood in the forest, and hunted for nuts in the hazel copses, and forgot that there was such a creature as black-robed Mrs. Grimshaw upon this world. Then came a bleak, bitter morning, when my foster-mother dressed me in my best clothes, and kissed and cried over me before she handed me to the executioner.

The executioner was a small, sickly-looking man, dressed in a suit of chocolate-colored cloth, and a carefully-powdered wig. This gentleman I was told was Mr. Grimshaw, and to him, as to his stately spouse, I was to pay all possible respect.

"You'll let him come to see us sometimes, won't you, Sir?" asked the keeper's wife, piteously. "He's been with us over nine years; and it's a sore trouble to lose him."

"So it be, wife, a sore trouble," growled the keeper.—"Thou'lt think on us sometimes, won't thee, Bob?"

"Ay, ay, he shall think of you, and come to see you too," replied the chocolate-colored gentleman, good-naturedly.

Even this little speech inclined me to prefer Mr. Grimshaw to his respectable consort.

"Thou'lt mind thy book, Robin, and do as thou art bid," urged my foster-mother; "and thy new friends will love thee; and thou'lt come to see thy old friends sometimes."

"Every day, if they'll let me," I answered, sobbing.

After this there were many embraces and many tears, until Mr. Grimshaw grew impatient, and said we must begone. So I tore myself away from those dear souls, who had made my childhood happy, and put my hand into that of the house-steward.

The day was bleak and wintry, and we trudged off at a good rate among the crisp fallen leaves. I looked back at the keeper's cottage. Ah, dear home, mine no longer! How many years were to pass before I should inhabit any other dwelling which I could dare call by the fond name of home! Mansion and palace, tent and dungeon, were to be my habitation in the shifting scenes of life; but long and far were to be my wanderings before I rested again beside so cheery a hearth, or among friends so dear.

The walk from the keeper's cottage to the Hall was a long one, and I had ample leisure in which to observe the countenance of my new guardian as I tramped by his side among the drift of withered leaves and the fallen fir-cones which I had gathered so merrily but yesterday with little Margery. It was not a hard or sour face at which I looked; and with the quick instinct of childhood I divined that this gentleman in the chocolate-colored coat would be my friend. I pushed my hand a little farther into his, and drew closer to him as we walked on. For a long time we walked in silence, but by-and-by the old gentleman looked down at me with a curious glance.

"You are but a little chap to begin your schooling," he said; "but I see you are no fool, and I think you and I may get on well enough together."

After this he questioned me for some time about my past life and its simple pleasures, and conversed with me kindly until we came to our destination. We did not pass beneath the shadow of the great Gothic archway; that ponderous gateway had not been opened since Lady Barbara Lestranger's last residence at Hauteville. We crossed a narrow stone bridge of modern construction, which spanned the moat upon the inferior side of the Hall, and entered the house by a little door, the key whereof my companion took from his capacious pocket.

Within I saw shadowy stone passages that seemed endless, incalculable doors of darkest oak. The silence and gloom of the place were awful to my childish mind. I clung closer to Mr. Grimshaw, and shuddered at the echoing noise of our footsteps on the smooth stone flags. We crossed a great hall where tattered rags of many-colored silks hung from the vaulted roof, and where shone upon me, for the first time in my life, the splendor of an old stained-glass window.

The floor of this chamber was of alternate squares of block and white marble. The effigy of a mailed knight, bestriding a plumed war-steed of painted wood, shone in the rainbow light from the great window; and at the opposite end of the hall a staircase, with elaborately-carved balustrades in black oak, led to a gallery which made the circuit of the roof.

At this chamber I gazed with delight and wonder, and for the moment forgot my awe of the gloomy house. From the hall my companion led me into a long saloon, with ten windows, overlooking a small Italian flower-garden, within the moat. Here I beheld more books than I could have supposed were contained in all the world, seeing that one volume—a clumsy leather-bound "breeches" Bible—comprised the keeper's entire library. From wall to ceiling this long and lofty room was lined with volumes, for the most part in handsome, though somewhat sombre, bindings. Wings had been constructed, abutting into the room, for the accommodation of more books; and these abutments divided the spacious apartment into pleasant nooks and retiring-places, where I thought it must needs be very agreeable to sit on a bright summer day, when the flowers in the pleasure were all in bloom.

"See, Master Robert," said my new friend. "You open your eyes wide at sight of so many books. What would you say if I told you that I had read them every one, or, at any rate, know the contents of every one—from the big brown folios down yonder to the smart little duodecimos on those narrow shelves near the ceiling? I was my late lord's librarian as well as his house-steward, and all these books are still in my care, and are likely to be till I die: and then I know not how it will fare with them, for books are like children, and must be cared for by those that love them."

He hurried me from the library—where I would fain have stood gaping longer—by a small door almost hidden between two book-cases. This door led us away from the light and the sunshine into a dark and narrow passage, at the end of which Mr. Grimshaw opened another door, and pushed me into a square oak-paneled room, where I beheld the black-robed woman whom I had seen at the keeper's cottage.

She was sitting at a table working, with a great wicker-basket before her. She laid down her work as we entered, and gazed upon me with menacing eyes.

My heart sank as I encountered those searching glances.

"So, Master Robert, you have come at last! I began to think that you and my husband were lost in the woods."

I almost wished that this misfortune had befallen us, as I quailed beneath Mrs. Grimshaw's stern gaze. Surely the berries and the robins and the brief summer-day life of children abandoned in the forest would have been better than existence shared with Mrs. Grimshaw.

"Now, Master Robert," said at last, "this is where you are to live until you go out into the world to earn your own bread, which will be as soon as you are old enough to turn to an honest trade, or sit upon a junior-clerk's stool in a merchant's office. You are to live with me and my husband, and to learn what he teaches you, and to do as I bid you, or it will be the worse for you. An' mark you, young gentleman; there is to be no gadding about the park, or sneaking down to John Hawker's cottage, to waste your time among vagabonds and idlers."

She spoke to me as if I had been fifteen years old instead of ten. But there was one part of her speech I understood well enough.

"My daddy is no vagabond," I cried, indignantly; "and this gentleman said I should go and see him."

"Ay, ay, I promised as much as that," answered Mr. Grimshaw, with an apologetic air. "Hawker and his wife seemed so sorry to lose the boy, and the boy cried at leaving them; and I could not well avoid promising—"

"You're a fool, Anthony Grimshaw!" cried his wife, angrily.

She rang a bell, which was answered very promptly by a plump, rosy-faced woman in a mob-cap and big white apron.

"This is the young gentleman, Betty," said Mrs. Grimshaw; "take him to his room, and see that he washes his face and hands before he comes back to dinner."

The maid led me off through the dark passage and up a narrow wooden staircase, into a small whitewashed chamber, neatly but poorly furnished. This room she told me was mine; and as it was superior to any chamber in Jack Hawker's cottage, I felt somewhat proud of the proprietorship.

"Has Mrs. Grim been unkind to you, boy?" asked Betty, as she scrubbed my face with a merciless prodigality in the matter of soap.

"Mrs. Grim?"

"Pshaw! Grimshaw, child. We call her Mrs. Grim for short. The name fits her to a T; but Mrs. Brimstone would be still better; for brimstone she is and brimstone she ever will be. Has she been scolding you?"

"She has not been very kind," I answered, whimpering.

"No, and it ain't in her nature; so don't expect it. She was turned sour close upon twelve years ago, when a fine gentleman that she'd have given her eyes for laughed and talked and made a fool of her with his pretty speeches and pretty looks, and then walked off and forgot all about her. I know! She took the small-pox after that, and lost her beauty, which was never much to my mind, and that didn't mend her temper. She hasn't had a civil word for any body since then; and how old Grim could have been such a fool as to marry her, unless she frightened him into it, I can't think. But he did; and now she's turned Methody, and is always going after preachings at all the towns round about, and leads us all the life of dogs."

Thus did Mrs. Betty give vent to her opinions while engaged with my toilette, and it is to be observed that from this time forth I became the habitual recipient of confidences ill adapted to my tender years. People who have but few companions with whom to converse will find relief in opening their minds to a little child; and whether it was Anthony Grimshaw who dilated on the history of the house he served, or Betty who reviled her mistress, I listened with equal patience, and with no small interest; and being henceforth cut off for the most part from intercourse with children, and denied all childish sports, I acquired a gravity and a curious spirit not common to my age.

When Betty had scrubbed and brushed me into a becoming state of redness and stiffness, she conducted me back to the oak parlor, where I dined in state with my new guardians, attended on by Betty in a clean white apron.

Mrs. Grimshaw found a great deal to say about my boorish demeanor, and the ill use I made of knife and fork, the former of which I was indeed accustomed to use with a freedom and a dexterity unknown in polished circles. The dinner was of the plainest, but served with much neatness; and after the cloth had been removed Mrs. Grimshaw kept the obsequious Betty employed for a quarter of an hour in polishing the dark walnut-wood table on which we had dined.

Even after this operation Betty was not free to depart, for Mrs. Grimshaw bade her seat herself at a respectful distance, in order to hear the conclusion of a sermon, one half of which she had been edified by upon the previous day.

"And I hope you feel some inward benefit from Mr. Whitefield's precious eloquence, Betty," said Mrs. Grimshaw. "I grieve to say there are some rocky hearts upon which the blessed seed falls in vain; some heathenish minds that prefer to pore over any dusty rubbish in a foreign language, rather than to heed the voice of the mighty Judge calling sinners to judgment."

Her looks were directed at her husband during the latter part of this speech, and he, by his answer, acknowledged that it was leveled at him.

"Why, truth to tell, Martha," he said, "there may be some that are not inclined to stand before Mr. Whitefield for judgment. If I am to be brought to believe that one section of mankind is destined for grace, and the rest doomed to perdition unspeakable, and that our good works and gentle deeds in this world shall avail us nothing with Him who gave the woman of Samaria His blessing in exchange for a cup of cold water, I will be taught by Calvin at first hand, and not Mr. Whitefield at second hand. We have the Genevise edition of John Calvin's works, in twelve folio volumes, in the library yonder; and I can read the 'Institutes' for myself if needs be. But it has been my custom to smoke my pipe on the terrace after dinner for the last five-and-thirty years of my life; and with your leave, wife, I shall continue to do so, till pipe and I go out together." By this I perceived that old Anthony Grimshaw was not completely under his wife's dominion.

"Will you come with me, Master Bob?" he asked; and I sprang up, eager to follow him.

Mrs. Grimshaw groaned aloud.

"The boy will stop, for the profit of his sinful soul," she said, in a tone of command. "Sit down over against Betty, child."

I seated myself meekly, while Mr. Grimshaw lighted his pipe, and went out by a half-glass door that opened on the terrace—a noble promenade going all round the house, and bordered on this side by a bank close planted with evergreens sloping to the broad moat.

Then began the reading of Mr. Whitefield's sermon, which was performed in a hard, harsh voice by Mrs. Grimshaw. Of the sermon I know no more than that it was of appalling and threatening import, and that it seemed to my childish ears interminable. Betty yawned more than once; and on one occasion I saw her on the point of sinking into a peaceful slumber; but she caught herself up with an effort, and stared at her mistress with unblinking eyes when that lady turned her gaze toward the handmaiden. When the discourse was at last ended, Betty declared herself beyond measure edified, but seemed, nevertheless, somewhat glad to withdraw.

Mr. Grimshaw had passed the window several times during the pious lecture, and appeared at the glass door, still smoking, a few minutes after it was over.

"May I go to the gentleman, ma'am?" I asked; and Mrs. Grimshaw having nodded assent, I ran out and put my hand into that of her husband's, who received me with a kind smile.

"I like you so much," I said, "because you're kind, like daddy, though you don't speak like him."

From this time forth Anthony Grimshaw and I were fast friends; and the old man's gentle treatment enabled me to endure his wife's harsh usage with all due meekness. Her conduct never varied. Stern and sour in her bearing toward all her little world, her manner to me betrayed an aversion which she would fain have concealed. Hard, bitter, and implacable as my own evil fate, she cast her vengeful shadow across my boyhood; and if she could have prevented the sun from shining on me, or could have stunted my growth and wasted my flesh by the influence of her baleful gaze, I believe she would have exercised her evil power. It was not till later that I obtained the key to the mystery of her feelings with regard to me. She had happily little power to do me harm, for I was intrusted to her keeping by a mistress whom she feared, and whom self-interest compelled her to serve with submission and fidelity. She had, however, the power to make my life more or less uncomfortable by small cruelties and petty slights, by cold looks and bitter words; and this privilege she exercised without stint. Had it not been for her husband's kindness I might have fared ill in that splendid mansion, where I was a humble and nameless dependent; but his goodness to me never wavered, nor did his protection ever fail me in the hour of need.

My first night in my lonely chamber was a very sad one. In my dreams I went back to the warren's lodge and the dear souls I loved; but even in those dreams the bitter sense of separation clung to me, and I felt that I saw the familiar faces across an impassable gulf.

My studies began on the next day in the parlor where Mrs. Grimshaw sat at work; and I felt her eyes upon me while I was being initiated into the mysteries of the alphabet by my friend

Anthony. From this time my life became an unvarying routine. Early breakfast in the oak parlor, a walk with Mr. Grimshaw about the house and in the grand old stone quadrangle, where Hercules and his club held guard over a marble fountain which had once been the glory of the place. Then back to the oak parlor for lessons, which lasted till the early dinner. Then Mrs. Grimshaw's lecture from the last-published pamphlets of Whitefield or Wesley, or some minor lights of the new non-conforming church, and Betty's smothered yawns, and Anthony Grimshaw's figure passing to and fro before the windows, and my own weariness always in precisely the same measure. At six we drank tea; a solemn ceremony, from the gentility whereof Mrs. Grimshaw took much pride. At half past eight she read prayers to her husband and myself, and to the three servants of the great melancholy house—Betty, a buxom girl called Martha, and a rheumatic old woman, who lived in some stony obscurity in the kitchens, and only quitted her lair for this evening ceremonial.

After prayers I was hustled off to my chamber by Betty, while my guardians supped together in grim state. I should often have gone to bed hungry if it had not been for Betty, who brought me a crust of bread and a basin of milk, which I ate and drank seated on the edge of my bed with more enjoyment than I ever derived from set his affairs in order and regain his solvent condition. The Reverend Simeon addressed his flock as if convinced that they were so many fraudulent bankrupts, conscious that they could never pay a shilling in the pound, and rather to be congratulated than otherwise on their ignominious insolvency.

"Believe!" cried the awakened Noggers, "and prove your faith as I do, not as St. Paul did. Prove it by long prayers and reiterated invocations, in which the familiarity of affection verges on the blasphemy of presumptuous folly; prove it by howlings and beatings of the breast, by up-turned eyeballs, and solemn shakings of the head, and consistent condemnation of all mankind except the elect of Brewer's-yard."

This was the gist of Mr. Noggers's teaching, which I heard during the ten most impressionable years of my life, and which did much to make me in early manhood a disciple of Bolingbroke and Hobbes. It fell to my lot in after-years to hear both Wesley and Whitefield, and I then perceived the difference between a man of original mind and deep-rooted convictions and the ignorant imitators who assume his functions without one of the gifts that have qualified their master for his office. I know that to that good man John Wesley there came much trouble and perplexity from the ill-advised officiousness and spasmodic industry of some among his followers.

"AT THIS CHAMBER I GAZED WITH DELIGHT AND WONDER."

the ceremonial meals in the oak parlor. On Sundays there were no lessons, but there was chapel—to my youthful mind a far greater trial. Mr. Grimshaw went on alternate Sundays to the little church in the wood, and to have gone thither with him would have been to happiness unspeakable to me, for at this time-honored tabernacle I should have met Jack Hawker and his wife, and dear little Margery. But here Mrs. Grimshaw had a convenient opportunity for exercising her tyranny, and avenging that unconscious sin which I had committed against her by coming into this bleak world. So she ordained that I should accompany herself and the two maids to the meeting-house in Brewer's-yard—a stifling upper room, little better than a loft, in which the Rev. Simeon Noggers, an awakened tailor, held forth every Sunday to a select congregation of Wesleyans. In this airless chamber I underwent the tortures of a weekly suffocation while the Reverend Simeon pounded his deal reading-desk and exhorted his fellow-sinners, from the blackness of whose guilt he appeared to derive a dismal satisfaction. From that respectable teacher I learned that it was rather advantageous for the soul to be dyed of the darkest hue, in order that its renovation might be the more astounding. There I heard no exhortations to the weak and wavering; no friendly counsel for the small debtor, whose payments were but a little in arrears, and who needed only a brave endeavor to Doubtless he found other laborers better fitted to work with him in the vineyard, and it must never be forgotten that the uprising of the sect which bears his name has done much to arouse the slugs of the Established Church, who had sore need of some revolution to awaken them from slumber.

For nearly ten years my life at Hauteville was all of the same pattern; my studies laborious, my pleasures of the rarest. Indeed, the only holiday I knew in these days was an occasional visit to Jack Hawker's cottage, and Mrs. Grimshaw took care that I should not often enjoy this happiness. The distance was long, and my task-mistress contrived to find reasons for refusing me the leisure required for such a visit. It was only when Anthony Grimshaw interfered in my behalf that I was allowed the privilege of an afternoon's holiday. Dearly then did I love the long walk through the park, the cozy supper by Jack Hawker's hearth, and the return in the dewy moonlight to the great enchanted castle, which, even after years of residence within its ponderous walls, still retained for me something of its awful mystic charm.

Although to the last degree monotonous, my life during these years was not unhappy. In Anthony Grimshaw I had a true friend, and such a tutor as few prosperous young noblemen of my day could have boasted. From the hour in which he first introduced me to the hieroglyphics of the English alphabet to the proud day in which he smiled upon my successful rendering of a love-ditty by Rochester into Anacreontics in pure Greek, he made the steep of Parnassus easy and the waters of Pieria sweet for me. It was a delight to him to have some one to whom to impart his ripe store of history and legend, and he found me a willing and delighted listener to that cherished lore. I knew every biography in Plutarch, and every adventure of Ulysses, before I could read the easiest page in my spelling-book; and I was lured on through the slough of despond which the juvenile student must pass by the knowledge that the great brown-backed folios in the library contained innumerable stories delightful as those my master told me. The time came when very few of the brown-backed volumes contained any mystery for me, and when I could read alike easily in English, French, and Latin; and from that time forth my chief pleasure was found in the long library, where I used to spend my leisure hours curled up in one of the deep-recessed windows with a folio on my knees.

The noble old Elizabethan mansion was a source of perpetual pleasure to me. The great empty rooms reverberated with the echo of my footsteps as I roamed at large, with my tutor's official bunch of keys in my pocket. The very poetry of ghostliness pervaded these spacious, untenanted chambers. All was swept and garnished; there was no trace of dust, no token of neglect; but the emptiness was none the less dismal. The house had the unmistakable air of a long-deserted habitation. All the brightness had faded from curtains and carpets, the gilding was tarnished, the paint was worn and dull; an unchangeable odor of dead rose-leaves and mouldy lavender perfumed the atmosphere; the stillness of rooms that had once been noisy with the bustle and grandeur of state-reception and familiar assembly was more oppressive than the solemn calm of a church-yard. But to me there was a subtle delight in that dead calm, that utter stillness. My imagination ran riot in those empty chambers. At will I peopled them with the shades of the mighty dead. The Virgin Queen revisited the house where she had been entertained in wondrous state by the first Baron Hauteville; and I saw her in all her great littleness, the cynosure of statesmen and flatterers, philosophers and sycophants, lovers who never loved her, courtiers who dared not trust her, ambassadors who registered her every look and word for swift transmission to their masters, spies who watched in the Stuart interest, and hungered for the hour when this great Queen should be dust. Swift passed that radiant vision of queenly grandeur and human weakness, and lo! the rush and terror of civil war. Buffets ransacked of their gold and silver store; plate melted or sold to foreign Jews; trusty captains playing at hide and seek in chimneys and secret closets; Cromwell's grim soldiers battering at the gates. A sudden cry of horror through the land; halls hung with black; bells tolling slow and solemn in the wintry morning, and England kingless.

Again the scene changes, and it is the garish summer noontide of the Restoration.

"Room there for my Lord Rochester!" cried the nobles by the great gilded doors of the white and gold banquet-hall; "way there, knaves, for his grace the Duke of Buckingham!" and athwart the slanting shaft of motes dancing in the sunshine came the shadows of Wilmot and Villiers, in their silken-embroidered suits of French make, with long, curling perukes and ribbon-befringed jerkins, stars and orders blazing on their breasts, and a languid light in their eyes. As I sat by the cold, empty hearth, and mused with dreamy eyes fixed on the opposite doorway, the room grew crowded with the notabilities of the Restoration; I could almost hear the fluttering fringes and sword-knots of those butterfly lordlings; but with a thought they vanished; and here was hook-nosed William, grave and silent as his mighty ancestor, and stately St. John, and courteous Harley, and anon all the wits and beaux, generals and statesmen, of dull Queen Anne.

Not alone with the great whom I had read of did I people those desolate rooms. At my bidding other shadows grew into life. From the canvas on the walls of picture-gallery and saloon the images of the dead descended to walk again in the rooms they had inhabited living. Hautevilles of the Elizabethan age, and Hautevilles of the Restoration; Hautevilles who fought in the low countries with Marlborough, and sat in the senate with Harley; about these, of whose histories I then knew so little, I dreamed my dreams. This dark cavalier had loved and won that fair-haired maiden with tender blue eyes and simple pastoral dress; that smooth-faced boy-soldier had wooed and been scorned by the haughty damsel with eagle glance and towering head-gear.

For each of these pictured faces I wove my little romance, but was not the less eager to extort some details of their actual lives from my kindly tutor.

I often plied him with questions about the dead-and-gone masters of that deserted house, but with varying success. He was no gossip or scandal; and, indeed, was so complete a student that he thought more of a rare edition of an original classic, or a noble translation of the sixteenth century, than of all the changes and chances of the age in which he lived. An occasional Post-boy kept him apprised of the conquests our arms achieved abroad, and the difficulty our ministers found in agreeing at home. But he thought more of the Philippics of Cicero than of a smart attack from the Opposition, or a scathing reply from the polished chief of the famous Broad-bottom Administration, and was far better acquainted with the politics of the Pompeian party than with the objects and opinions of the minority at Westminster. Sometimes I was happy enough to find him in a communicative mood, and then I took care to improve my opportunity.

THE HOUSEHOLD ANGEL.

By FITZ HUGH LUDLOW.

CHAPTER IX.

BUT no, bitterly for him, he was not dead. When Perro and Kledda came to lift him to his bed he opened his eyes again and walked to his chair, only asking the assistance of their shoulders. Then, with a terrible stony face, which brought back their most shuddering memories of nights passed with old Seibert Kearney, and in a stern, soulless voice which they had never heard from his lips before, he told them he was well, quite well again now; that he had fallen asleep and had an awful dream; but now he was out of it—well, yes, quite well, and they might leave him. So they went away, mournfully whispering to each other that it was that “cussed brack bottle again;” but we need not make their mistake, for we can read his letter:

“GARRET RUN, Tuesday Morning, 11 o'clock, June 4, 18—.

“MY POOR CUTHBERT,—How can I find words to tell you what I must? In any way that I can say it will be hard; for I believe that we once loved each other, and the semblance is still a great deal to you, though the substance departed long, oh! long ago. You are a man; and a man, having so many other things in life, can live on and be comfortable with the semblance of love; but love is a woman's all—she has no business, no play, no comrades, no gladdening, maddening drink—and when she has not the fact the shadow becomes hell to her.

“I thank God that, though we made the mistake we did in joining our lives when we were both ignorant of the world and our hearts' demands, the mistake is not irreparable. I have found the substance, and it is very sweet, so sweet that I can not endure the semblance another day. You will, I pray, I trust, knowing how much there is in you to attract the woman you ought to marry—I may say I know you will find it too when I am gone.

“For, my poor Cuthbert, I am going. When you read this I shall be on my way to a far country: not only another State, but another land. The whole wide sea will presently be between us. Let a wider sea—forgetfulness—be between us, too. Forget that you ever knew me; that you ever caused me, I ever caused you, shame and agony.

“I leave you all my wealth—my heart breaks when I think of it—I can not call it by name. In leaving that I show you how deep is the love for whose sake I am willing to abandon it; show you, too, how little desire I have to hurt you; for I might take the precious thing I mean and leave you comfortless; but for its own sake, for yours, I will not. I can be generous, even while it breaks my heart, for to be loved as I am—with the first, only love of a great, strong, noble, yes! divine nature—raises a woman up to the height of any magnanimity, pays her for all loss, even for this.

“Oh, for God's sake, teach not the treasure I leave to hate, to curse me! To forget me, if you will—yes, it is better so! And in the long years to come that will be hard enough for me to think of—me, who would have died for it! To forget, then; but oh, not to hate nor curse!

“And if you marry again, as you will, marry a woman who will be a good mother, who will not hate mine because she must hate me.

“It will be vain to try to track me. I shall be hidden to-night, as if I were at the bottom of the sea. So spare yourself, spare the good name of that unspeakably precious treasure I have left you. Let there be no noisy search for one who can never be found, one who henceforth—oh! it seems strange, seems awful, to know that these are the last words that shall ever pass between us—must be

“DEAD TO YOU FOREVER.”

After the servants had gone Cuthbert sat in his chair with the same terrible stony face, and in perfect silence, for nearly half an hour. Lily would not go back to bed, but climbed upon his lap and nestled against his bosom, crying bitterly. He hardly seemed to notice that she was there till he felt her shivering; then returned to the outer world only long enough to reach a folded blanket from the foot-board and throw it around her little night-gown.

“Oh, papa! Own, own darling papa, tell Lily where you are sick!” she sobbed, stroking his cheeks with her tiny hand. “Dear, lovely, precious papa! speak to your only little girl—kiss your own Lily! Ain't I your lamb any more? Do speak to me and kiss me! Tell me if you're sick! Precious own papa—your face frightens me so!”

Cuthbert's only answer was to press his lips upon her lovely forehead, mechanically as a sleep-walker. They felt cold as ice, and frightened her still more terribly.

“Papa! papa!” she almost screamed, “I'm afraid! I'm dreadfully afraid—aren't you dying? You mustn't die! I'll pray for you!” And slipping down from his knees, she threw herself beside them on her own—to take refuge in the dear heart to which her too early clouded infancy had already brought so many griefs without ever finding it shut.

“Oh sweet, lovely Jesus!” she cried, in a trembling voice, “we're all alone, with nobody to help us! I'm such a little girl, and I don't know what to do! Nobody knows what to do but you, dear Saviour, and I'm afraid that papa'll die before we can get any doctor! Save him! Please, please save him—save him as you did when your little Lily asked you before! I'll love you and thank you always—when I get to heaven I'll fall down and kiss you where the cruel nails went in. I'll take my little harp and sing to you forever. Don't let my papa die! Oh! oh!” Sobs choked her voice, but she clung to her father, and driving them back again, went on: “And oh! we're so sad to-night that our hearts are breaking! Dear Saviour, we don't know what's become of mamma! Jesus, sweet Jesus, bring back my own, own dear mamma—”

“Stop! stop! my poor desolate baby!” groaned Cuthbert, covered from head to foot with a great spasm of agony. “Oh, Lily! you have no mamma! Oh, my broken-hearted darling—my own little motherless girl!”

“Papa!” shrieked Lily, leaping to her feet, with a face as white as death—“are you having another dreadful dream? Oh, how haven't I got any mamma? Have you heard? Where is she? Is she dead?”

“My God! Oh, my God! How shall I tell her?” He clenched his nails into his palms well-nigh till the blood came. “Dead, my darling? Yes, dead! Dead to you and me forever! Oh, my little desolate orphan lamb—dead, dead! Say, God, what has she done to thee—what vengeance hadst thou to wreak on this harmless baby head? I am a wretch, without claim to shelter—a cumbering tree oft dugged around—a fruitless vine oft pruned; men might gather and burn me—thine axe might cut me down—thy lightning fall and blast me to the root—I would not cavil or complain. But she—what quarrel hadst thou with the child? Oh, cruel as Death and the Grave—merciless as Hell—to murder her thus! Come, my baby—come and nestle close. All of father and mother He has left you is here. She is dead, dead, dead!”

For a moment Lily stood stupefied; then crept again into her father's breast, and childhood's blessed relief came to her—a tempest of tears, mingled with bitter moans and cries, until her strength was utterly exhausted. Then for several minutes she lay in an almost lifeless lull, brokenly murmuring between her sobs, “Only, only, own papa.” At length the thought of his grief overpowered her own. The wonderful force of character which had marked her little span of life since babyhood with self-control and self-forgetfulness came back to her. She calmed herself with such an effort as might be asked in vain of many an adult. She sat erect upon her father's lap, and fixing on his haggard face a look of unutterable love, said,

“Tell me all about mamma now. I will not cry. I will be your little comforter, precious own papa! We haven't got any thing in the world but each other now, and we'll never, never, never go away from each other any more. Tell me please, darling papa.”

Cuthbert rose, and pouring another tremendous draught from the decanter, tossed it down as if it had been clear water.

“Dear papa!” said Lily, “doesn't that fire-poison make you worse?”

“I'm going to tell you all, darling,” answered Cuthbert, hoarsely, “and I haven't the strength without it. It keeps me from feeling what I say—and if I feel it, as well as think it, I shall be crazy. No! no! I must not feel, my baby!”

Then he took her on his lap again and told her all. All the facts, but not all their meaning. That it was impossible for her to be told. One of the seraphs in the Immediate Presence could as little understand it. All that is involved in a man's robbing a neighbor of his wife, and the wife's abandonment of the husband, was incoherence to her. It was a cruel, hard-hearted thing—an ungrateful treachery for any one who professed fraternal love for her father to have taken her mother away from him. It was likewise a bitter ingratitude and cruelty for her mother to desert them, when they loved her and longed for her so much. To her mind the one deed was precisely like that of the gipsy who stole the little girl in her story book, and the other nowise different from her own conduct if she had run away from home and refused ever to love her parents or see them any more. The wounded marital love and marital honor which made the gist of the adult criminality and agony could not be otherwise than incomprehensible to her. Her father's anguish and his asseveration that her mother was dead to them she could but dimly understand. When she learned that her mother, in the literal sense, was still alive, she burst into tears of rapture, and cried that she would find her and bring her back if she had to beg her way barefoot over the world. Cuthbert could not be selfish enough to wish that she might feel, like him, how devoutly they might have thanked God if He had laid their heart's best beloved in her grave before they left New England. Not for all the wealth of Christendom would he have sullied her heavenly mind with the knowledge which would have adequately answered her innocent question: “Why did Uncle Derrick take mamma away from us? Couldn't he have staid here and loved her? Couldn't she have loved him just as much and loved us too?” But though he thanked God for those sweet baby lips, unstained by the blistering fruit of the knowledge of good and evil, her innocent, ignorant joy at the fact which was his most terrible torture, jarred upon him like the cruelest of mockeries. It left him at the very direst point of his need so utterly without the sympathy of a heart whose sympathy was the most precious; it sent him into his Gethsemane so entirely alone. She almost danced with ecstasy when she heard that her mother was not in the winding-sheet she had first thought. Tears and laughter chased each other over her countenance, and she kissed him every where on face and hands, on his garments, almost from head to foot, crying, “No! no! she is not dead! she is not dead! Mamma is alive yet! thank you, dear Jesus! mamma is not dead!” Who can fathom the agony with which Cuthbert heard this, or with which he listened to her gentle yet astonished chiding for a stern despair seeming to her only implacable wrath, when he had said, “Would that I could see her in her coffin!” Who can measure the struggle by which he held himself from toppling over the verge of insanity when, in answer to his broken-hearted assertion that nothing could ever give him back his wife or Lily her mother, her face lighted with what he so well knew to be a desperate faith, and she said,

“I know mamma has been very naughty and very cruel to you, papa, but I will go to her and tell her that we will love her always better than any body in the world, and put my arms round her neck and kiss her and bring her back: then we'll forgive her and Uncle Derrick, and pray Jesus to give them new hearts, and I'll have my mamma again, and we'll all be happy for ever and ever.”

As his brain reeled under these awful utterances, these terrible incongruities, like the crowing of a baby at the bright flame jets round the fagots which are burning its father at the stake, again and again, almost unconsciously, poor Cuthbert sought the solace which, as he had told Lily, kept him from feeling all the things he was compelled to think. When, with a prayer for both father and mother on her lips, and exhausted by the day's surfeit of emotion, the little girl dropped asleep upon his breast, he gently laid her on the bed, and, going to the decanter, found that he had drained it to the last drop. Within the past three hours the whisky he had taken could not have amounted to less than a quart: but, resisted by the tremendous tension of his sufferings, it had produced no visible effect on him—none at all, indeed, except an iron-plating of his nervous system and a sensation of preternatural strength either to do or to endure. Never stopping to reflect how dear-bought this condition must prove to him on the morrow, he clung to it with such agonized tenacity as his only hope for the present preservation of his reason, that to avoid dropping to a lower plane he returned down stairs and brought up a fresh bottle.

With the next draught his fiery excitement culminated; reaction commenced, and he fell asleep in his chair. He must have sat there with his chin upon his breast more than an hour, for his candle was guttering in its socket when he started up from a terrible dream vivid as reality, in which he had seen his wife whirled along the rapids of some black ferocious river to a cataraet vast as ten Niagaras—stretching her white arms toward him out of the rumbling avalanche of waves, and heard her shriek his name. He woke with “Cuthbert!” ringing in his ears, and the sound of those relentless waters which choked it in her throat, so close that it seemed just outside his window. He ran to the casement and looked eagerly out, almost expecting to see her imploring him there in the moonlight. His straining eyes met only the cool, beautiful, empty, unsympathizing night, and the horror of his position stared him in the face with a new reality. All that had been heavenly in his married life—every little caress and lover's word, the stolen interviews of his courtship, the mutual tendernesses which had endeared their happy poverty, his wife's girlish caprices and rocco fancies, his own ingenious self-sacrifices to bestow pleasant surprises on her; this new dress, that bit of ribbon, the ear-rings put by stealth under the pillow, her sparkling eyes and thankful blushes when she found them; the little vacation trips to humble watering-places and objects of local curiosity a hundred miles away; every sweet look, every comical pet name she bestowed on him; their endless wonder and crazy joy at the baby, their hourly discoveries of likeness in her features, and cunning ways she had with her fingers and toes; the weekly weighings of her with handkerchief and steelyard like a turkey; the days when she began “to take notice,” when she learned to “come,” when she cut her first tooth, when she took her first step, when the young mother stood trembling with delight outside the school-room door, hardly able to wait for recess, to tell Cuthbert that Lily had said “Papa!” every joy, grief, hope, and fear of their united lives since Cuthbert first saw his wife and loved her ran lightning swift in ordered succession through his mind, like the past life of one drowning—and ended on that dreadful ruin heap where he stood to night in the ashes all alone.

“O God!” he cried, “I am going mad!” And he was going mad. He began to doubt the evidence of his waking senses—to believe in the reality of his dream. He heard again the cry which had wakened him from sleep, and his wife seemed in truth to be shivering below his window, clad in her thin white night-gown, just as he had expected to see her—her bare feet wet with dew. He rubbed his eyes and she was gone—but a moment more and she was fleeing over the sparkling grass or hiding behind the misty shrubbery with one fold of her garment fluttering out into the moonlight. He ran to the bed and waked Lily. "Darling," said he, hoarsely, "cry any more—your mamma's back! I just saw her running over the lawn. Get up and papa'll put on your little frock; hurry, my baby, and we'll go after her! We shall need provisions for our journey—while you're getting your shoes and stockings on I'll prepare them," so he lighted a new candle and descended to the dining-room.

Lily's ecstasy knew no bounds, for her faith was equally boundless, and her childish ignorance of symptoms prevented her from reading the disturbed condition of his mind in her father's face, though his frenzy a little frightened her. She was quite dressed, with the exception of her frock, when her father returned with a loaf of bread wrapped in a napkin, and a fresh bottle of whisky in one coat-pocket. Into the other pocket he thrust the bottle from which he had already taken a draught, bestowed the bread in a light courier's satchel, whose strap he threw over his shoulder, and grasping his little girl's hand hurried out of the house.

"We're provisioned with meat and drink for a long cruise now," said Cuthbert. "Bread's plain fare; but we haven't heart to eat dainties when she may be perishing, have we? Look, darling; do you remember whose little bag this is? See the pretty morocco with her letters gilded on it! Oh, my head and my heart! Oh, my God! my wife—my wife—my dear wife!"

"Oh, papa, papa! isn't it good? isn't the Lord kind?" she cried, as she skipped along gayly, following his rapid strides without a thought of the past day's fatigue, in her own rapture paying no heed to the great change which must have taken place in him before he could have forgotten the tax which her energies had undergone sufficiently not even to accommodate his pace to her childish feet. No woman could be more thoughtful than Cuthbert usually was in such matters; but now he rushed on as if some terrible task-master was goading him, letting her run to keep up with him till her breath gave out, and she had to catch him by the hand panting an entreaty to wait for her. He snatched her up and set her on his shoulder; then, without feeling any burden, drove ahead as before.

"Where are you going, dear papa? Where did you see mamma?" asked Lily.

She was close beside his ear, keeping on her uneasy, jolting seat by one arm thrown about his neck; but he seemed not to hear her till she repeated her question.

"Going, my lamb? Over the earth—everywhere in the wide world till we find her! I saw her on the gravel-walk, behind the lilacs, out in the meadow, flitting about like a ghost—everywhere. Yes! you are right. We'll bring her back, my baby! We'll never, never, never go into our house again—our house? no! the wicked devil's house!—never again till we find her."

"Thank you, dear papa! Oh, how your Lily loves you for that! and we will find her!" said the little girl in a glow of joyful confidence; though his hoarse voice and wild manner astonished her.

Cuthbert wandered for an hour about the estate until even the little girl began to lose confidence in their vain quest, and to fear that something out of the ordinary was the matter with her father. When at length his distracted fancy led him to speak of a crowd of people down the road, going toward "the Pool" with her mother in the midst of them, she grew seriously alarmed.

"Dear papa!" said she, tremblingly, "you frighten me. There is nobody there. I'm afraid you're sick; let us go home, and you take a good long sleep and we'll begin looking again in the morning."

"Hark!" replied Cuthbert, trembling all over as a whip-poor-will in the woods fringing the stream began its plaintive repetitions—"Hark! she's calling to us again. Coming, coming!" And shouting at the top of his voice with a terrible cheeriness, he set out as fast as he could run for the spot to which he thought the procession was tending. Then Lily—although she had never seen any mental aberration but the paralytic form manifested during her grandfather's last few days on earth—distinctly comprehended that her father's sorrows had turned his brain.

Cuthbert ran without feeling fatigue till he reached the opening of the wood-path which led to the pool, and striking into it continued his mad race. The foliage was so dense that the moonlight barely showed him the way. The jasmine, woodbine, and fox-grape twined across it in such tangled luxuriance that even in the daytime a stroller's step need be wary to avoid tripping, and the branches of the trees drooped low enough to graze a tall man's head. But that wonderful instinct—surpassing even the educated skill of the blind man—that Providence, rather, which the French have commemorated in their proverb, "Il y a un dieu pour les enfants et les ivrognes," protected both Cuthbert and the child on his shoulder from any of the painful consequences which, at that clattering pace, must have resulted either from a misstep or a bump against the boughs. By what seemed to Lily a miracle, or at least a direct answer from that Jesus to whom she was pouring out her dismayed young heart in passionate entreaty, Cuthbert did not once stumble, and the trees fairly grazed her little head again and again without any further damage than the lashing of her tender face or the rough combing of her curls with the leathery young twigs of ash and locust. At length they emerged into an open space which the moon, now at the zenith, made clear as day. Recognizing the spot where she had knelt and prayed her father back on that terribly sweet and bitter morning of the last autumn, she cried out, "The Pool, papa, the Pool!" and was about struggling from his shoulder, not knowing but his frenzy might disregard the barrier, when, of his own accord, he stopped short at the brink, set her down, and began peering over the edge into the jetty shadows and molen-silver lights of the deep basin.

"No, she is not there!" said he, mournfully. "Indeed she isn't," answered Lily, tugging at his skirts to pull him back, in an agony of fear lest he should slip or jump. "You didn't think mamma was there, did you?"

"Why not?" said Cuthbert, wildly. "You saw her with all the people, just where the path begins; she turned in here when she left them, and I ran to save her. There's been death in this awful hole before, Lily darling, and I can't let her die! She mustn't come here when she's sorry and hopeless, it's no place for such. She'll be back here. We'll hide and wait for her. Yes! she sha'n't kill herself if forgiveness and love can stop her. No, darling Lily and I are ready to take you back—open arms—open hearts—all ready for you!"

The poor fellow sat down behind the ledge of rock, and pressed his burning forehead between his hands, Lily nestling at his knees, and watching his every motion with agonized anxiety.

"Does your head ache, dear papa?" she asked tenderly.

"I don't know, baby; it feels like a sky full of clouds, and rain, and splitting thunder and lightning. Oh, my wife! my wife!"

Such a terrible return of old memories as had convulsed him in his bedchamber fled through his brain again. In desperation he pulled one of the bottles from his pocket, and drank a long deep draught, eagerly, as if his life depended on it.

"Oh papa—dear papa!" murmured Lily in a tearful voice, now utterly broken down by her loving little heart's long harassment, "please—please don't! Don't, for your little Lily's sake, don't! You'll kill yourself, and you're all I've got—darling, dearest papa!"

Cuthbert laughed strangely. "No, baby! papa can't die. He'd have died before this if any thing could kill him. No! no! he can't die—but he can go mad, and this is all that keeps him! Oh, my wife! oh, my little lost bird—my flown dove—my wife, my wife! And Lily burst into tears as he drank again, freely, as if the liquid murder had been that crystal wave below him.

But Lily's womanliness returned, and with it—rather as part of it, for are they not the same?—her tender helpfulness. She sat down behind him, and taking his poor head into her lap began pressing it with her tiny hands. In this position he presently dropped into a troubled sleep. As he lay, alternately sobbing his wife's name and gnashing his teeth over Derrick Dalmager's, Lily's anxiety grew almost unbearable. What if he were to drink till he killed himself, like her grandfather? What if he were to live and be crazy all his life, like some unhappy patients of the Doctor's, for whom her sympathetic little heart had bled when she heard him telling about them to her father? At length with fear and trembling—for she still worshipped her father, and looked up to him with a deference which revolted at the thought of any thing like interference with his will—she drew the bottles from his pocket. At first she meant to throw them into the pool, but a moment's consideration altered her mind. She would be obliged to tell him where they were if he woke and insisted on knowing, and the poor little thing was not certain but in his distress he might jump in to attempt their recovery. So she tossed them into the thicket as far from the brink of the pool as she could without the risk of waking him by rising. Cuthbert's uneasy slumber lasted only for half an hour. He came out of it with a terrible cry, and sprang to his feet with a force which, but for Lily's clinging round his knees, might have ended all his struggles for this life by throwing him over the edge of the basin. For several seconds he seemed quite unconscious of his whereabouts; seemed to imagine that he was fighting for his life with a band of cut-throats, blindly striking right and left, calling to Derrick Dalmager in a voice of immeasurable scorn and hatred, and for the first time that Lily had ever heard him, swearing after a fashion that curdled her blood. Broken-hearted and exhausted as she was Lily never once lost her presence of mind, but steadily kept between him and the brink, and with all her tiny strength pushed him away from it. The tremendous strain which his system had endured was beginning to tell on him. His struggles grew fainter, and all at once he fell to the ground with a despairing groan. Lily, almost as exhausted, again took her seat beside him and tried to lift his head upon her lap. He raised himself on one elbow, felt for his bottles, and missing them asked her where they were.

"Oh, dear papa, don't drink any more!" "I'm dying—I must! Quick! Give me the whisky!"

"Darling, darling papa! For your own little Lily's sake—"

"Stop! stop!" he cried, in a voice like a sick child's, "tell me what you've done with that—tell me without another word!"

Her agony of fear for him for the first time in her life overcame her habit of instant filial obedience.

"Papa! oh, papa! I can not see my papa die like grandpa!"

In the desperation of his suffering he yelled at her like a madman, commanding her with an oath to mind him instantly.

In utter brokenness of heart—she, his darling, his angel, his very idol, sworn at like a pirate's child by the father for whom she would have cheerfully laid down her life—in a dream of horror, not at being cursed, but at his cursing her, had still the strength of nature to make one more effort for his salvation. She fell on her knees beside him, and began pleading.

"Oh, my own best, dearest, loveliest papa! all that Lily has left—please, for Jesus' sake, please—"

It was the brute maddened by torture, not the man, that cut the prayer short, though all but the angels and Lily herself must have said, looking on that Cuthbert Kearney was the one who raised his feeble arm and struck her. His hand fell on those bright curls where it had so often lingered in caressing adoration, and with a piteous little moan she fell forward, striking her forehead on a sharp stone by his side. Then his own senses receded again, and with the reaction from this last bitter deed went out in total darkness.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

ANOTHER "Enoch Arden case" is reported in an Indiana paper, which seems unusually sad. Nearly ten years ago a Mr. Shirley removed from the vicinity of Bloomington, Indiana, to Illinois, with his family. In the course of time he bought a drove of cattle, which he wished to take to California to sell; and he sent his wife and children to their friends to remain while he was absent. When a short distance from Salt Lake City he was captured by the Indians, and remained in captivity until a short time ago, when he escaped. He had been so closely confined that he had not even heard of the rebellion. Yet he hastened to Bloomington in the hope of meeting his wife and children. But his friends, not having heard from him during all these years, supposed him to be dead; and about a year before his reappearance his wife had married again, and removed to another State. Mr. Shirley seemed wholly overcome with grief when he learned that his wife had married again. He bears upon his person unmistakable evidence of hard treatment; but he considers this a small matter when compared to the loss of the mother of his children.

Nature indulges in curious freaks once in a while. A New Haven gentleman the other day found within the pulp of an orange he was eating a second perfect orange. And the Prescott (Wisconsin) Journal says that a garden in that place contains an apple-tree in blossom, on a limb of which are six perfect white roses in full bloom. A white rose bush stands a short distance from the apple-tree.

A leading English journal opposes the bill in Parliament conferring certain rights of property upon married women, on the "one great leading principle of the radical inferiority, physical, moral, and intellectual, of women." It enlarges upon the subject in the following style: "We believe that no system of law, whether it relates to property, to person, or to political rights, will ever be really just—that is, generally beneficial—unless it presupposes and is founded upon the following principles: First, that men are superior to women—that is, that we have more moral, intellectual, and physical strength than they have; that we know more, feel more, can do more, are their superiors in every sense in which one class of beings can be superior to another. Secondly, that families are in the nature of small governments, and that the constitutions of those governments should be monarchical, the husband being king." Weak, feeble, and inferior though they may be, women occasionally exhibit feeling and intellect enough to desire to know how gentlemen, English or otherwise, regard them. It assists their limited capacities to, in their turn, appreciate the "lords of creation." They should, at least, have the benefit of the quotation, which we give in the belief that, while lamenting over their own unfortunate condition, they will pity the still more wretched state of their English sisters who happen to be included in the "small government" of the aforesaid journal.

It is cooling and refreshing, now that the July heats are upon us, to hear about the splendid skating-rink which the Bostonians are erecting on Tremont Street. The lot is 117 feet front by 269 deep, and contains about 30,000 square feet. The foundations are already laid; and the building is to be of brick. It will have accommodations—so it is stated—for 1500 skaters, and seats for 5000 spectators. A refreshment-room is to be connected with the skating-rink. When the building is not needed for skating, the basin will be floored over, forming a hall, which it is estimated will hold ten thousand people. It is expected that this building will be ready for use in September, and it promises to be a popular resort, not only in winter for skating, but at other seasons, when it will be used for concerts, fairs, and similar gatherings.

The Princess Carlotta, although very much improved in health, still has occasional attacks of lunacy. These frequently occur immediately after eating, and she herself is said to be so well aware of this that she withdraws into complete solitude at such times, hoping to escape observation.

In the very heart of the noisy city of Vienna, in Austria, near a great market-place, is the Church of the Capuchins—a common-looking structure, and architecturally inelegant. Within its deep vaults, however, repose the bodies of emperors and princes of Austria. The place is damp and mildewed with age. Here are the remains of Maria Theresa, and also of her favorite instructress—the only person not of royal lineage interred here. But in a far-off corner of the vaults lies a coffin, covered with evergreens, crucifixes, and similar offerings, indicating that the royal occupant has but recently entered his narrow home. It is the mortal remains of "Maximilian of Mexico," as the Austrians have inscribed upon the coffin. Above the coffin is the Mexican flag, and over all the Mexican eagle spread its wings.

Brigham Young gives the following advice to his young people: "Young men, fit you up a little log-cabin, if it is not more than ten feet square, and then get you a bird to put in your little cage. You will then have something to encourage you to labor and gather around you the comforts of life, and a place to gather them to." And to the women he says: "Ask your husbands to furnish you some straw for hats and bonnets; and when you get it put more than three straws over your head, and make a hat that will shade you from the scorching sun."

Canned vegetables and fruit are great luxuries in the winter season. At the city grocers and markets canned corn, tomatoes, and many other vegetables can be obtained, which are really delicious. But families often experience much difficulty in canning corn so that it will keep. We notice a method of drying green corn for table use, which seems very simple. The green ears are to be boiled a minute or two just to harden the milk, then cut from the cob, and spread on a cloth in the sun for two days, being taken in at night. This will then keep any where. Before cooking it should be soaked a few hours, and boiled in the same water. A little milk and flour added while it is boiling is an improvement.

The eloquent preacher of Scotland, Rev. Dr. Guthrie, thus speaks of his advancing years: "They say I am growing old because my hair is silvered, and there are crow's-feet upon my forehead, and my step is not firm and elastic as of yore. But they are mistaken. That is not me. The knees are weak, but the knees are not me. The brow is wrinkled, but the brow is not me. This is the house in which I live. But I am young—y younger now than I ever was before."

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

PINE-TREE SHILLING.—It is not customary for brides who are married in church to wear traveling costumes, though there is no valid reason why they should not. The changeable silks and self-colored gros grains are selected for handsome traveling dresses. Silk serge at $2.50 a yard is cheaper than these and more distingue. If you prefer a changeable silk we advise dark colors, such as blue and gray combined, or brown and blue, or green and maroon. In solid colored silks the choice lies between dark gray and dead-leaf brown. Avoid the Bismarck shades. Traveling dresses must be short. Make a wide ruffle on the gored skirt. If the silk is changeable bind the ruffle with the most conspicuous color in the combination. Make a long polonaise, belted at the waist, and looped in the back and side by three large plaits. A small cape over the shoulders with pelerine ends adds style to the polonaise. Trim with fringe and folds, or with two ruffles narrower than that on the skirt. The bonnet should be of the dress silk with tulle veil and strings of the same color. Kid gloves to match the dress. Black boots are in good taste with every dress, but if the dress is a quiet color the boots may be of the same material. Uniformity of color throughout the toilette is most desirable. Even the leather of the indispensable traveling bag is selected with a view to blending harmoniously with the bride's dress.

If a less expensive suit is preferred we recommend the gray pongee poplins made in the same style. They are preferable to silk-faced serge, which shrinks and fades. Corded poplins, such as the French and Irish, are but little worn now.

In a late Number of the Bazar we answered the question of our correspondent about wedding costumes for grooms. The English style then described has since been worn at some most fashionable weddings, and is becoming the regulation dress. It consists of a short cut-away coat of dark blue cloth, lavender vest and pants. White cambric or black silk neck-tie. Gloves to match the pants and vest.

Admiral Farragut is 67 years old; his name is pronounced as spelled.

While the Bazar eschews politics as being outside its province, it can not suffer your animadversions on one of the most able and earnest, and withal kindly of its friends, to pass unrebuked.

LIZZIE MASON will find the information she requests embodied in the foregoing reply to "Pine-Tree Shilling." If the bride wears a traveling-dress the groom should do the same. A black dress-suit would, under such circumstances, be very inappropriate.

ROMEO.—You should, unless you are about marrying in the French mode, be sufficiently intimate with your betrothed as either to take or ask the measure of her finger for the engagement ring. As to the "best style," that depends upon your means and generosity. It is customary for the rich and thriving to give a diamond ring of a single stone "to one's beloved in token of engagement." The size of the diamond may vary from the smallness of a pin's head to the bigness of the Koh-i-noor, according to the wealth and munificence of the donor. The occasion is so rare and special a one as to justify an extraordinary effort of liberality.

MRS. H.—New York.—A married woman may make any contract respecting her own separate property, but not contracts in general. Her marriage debars her from these. For example, if she gives a promissory note the money can not be recovered at law, unless at the time of making it she executed some instrument or agreed to bind her separate estate as security.

MRS. LIZZIE SALISBURY.—By the bosom pleats of the Watteau pailot we mean the darts or seams taken in at the front of the waist. A Pompadour neck is cut square at the throat.

APPRECIATOR.—You will find a full explanation of the point Russe stitch in the Bazar of April 11, No. 24.

WIFE.—Your case is a hard one, to be compelled to live with a husband who abuses you without the f racy necessary in law to justify a legal separation. You must follow the domicile of your husband, and if you don't like it, there is no help for you. If he don't provide for you according to his means he is liable to any tradesman who chooses to furnish supplies and take the risk. But you yourself can not sue him. Exercise all your persuasive energies and virtues; bring about repentance and reform him. This is your best course.

MRS. K. F. S.—The carbuncle is not a fashionable stone, and is seldom seen in first-class jewelry stores. Etruscan gold, pink coral, Byzantine, Mosaic, topaz, and enameled gold, are stylishly worn with street dress and in the daytime.

R. H.—Your ignorance does not surprise us. The expression, "Without benefit of clergy," has led to the popular mistake that it means without the privilege of a clergyman at the gallows; and we have frequently heard persons otherwise intelligent commenting on the Draconic and merciless character of the old law which hung criminals without benefit of clergy. The term had its origin in medieval times, when reading and writing were confined almost exclusively to colleges and monastic institutions, which claimed the privilege for their members of pleading their learning, or benefit of clergy, in extenuation or excuse of their first offense. The abuse of this privilege led to its final abrogation.

PRESENCE.—The chief female guest should be the first handed to the dinner-table and by the host. The hostess should bring up the rear with the least significant male guest.

CONSCIENCE.—Be true to your convictions. If you can not go conscientiously to the counting-house on Sunday, though it may be only for half an hour to take the letters, refuse to do so. Your employer being a foreigner, looks at the matter differently from you as an American, but will probably think all the more of you for acting in conformity with your principles.

WHAT I DID:

I halted at a jewelry store to read a Circular that a very pleasant man gave me. I became dazzled, and finally left my money on a dirty envelope. I lost it. Was robbed of what I had left. Was knocked down and kicked out of the shop. Was lugged off to the Hospital. Was poisoned with doses of medicines. Got away barely with life. Went to Dr. Wolcott's office, 170 Chatham Square. Had a trial of Pain Paint, free of cost. Got better. Bought one quart bottle of Pain Paint, and am well.

CONCENTRATED PLATING.

We take pleasure in calling the attention of buyers of Silver-plated Forks and Spoons to a valuable patented improvement in Electro-Plating Spoons and Forks, by which those parts most exposed to wear receive an EXTRA COAT OF SILVER, THREE TIMES THE USUAL THICKNESS, viz., on the back of the handle, heel of the bowl, and points of bowls of spoons; back of the handle and breast and points of tines of forks.

It is confidently believed that this mode of Electro-Plating will supersede the old way of plating. The great advantage will be readily seen, as spoons and forks always wear through on these exposed points, while the plate is yet good upon other parts of the article. This new process

WILL ADD THREE TIMES TO THE DURABILITY OF GOODS SO PLATED.

Additional expense, at following low prices, is only $1.00 per dozen on Table Spoons and Forks, and 50 cents per dozen on Tea Spoons.

All goods stamped "1847, ROGERS BROS., A 1, XII" are Electro-Plated by the new Patented Process.

PATENTED OCTOBER 29, 1867, and FEBRUARY, 1868.

PRICES:

SPOONS—TEA, $3.75; DESSERT, $7.00; TABLE, $8.00.
FORKS—TEA, $1.00; MEDIUM, $7.50; TABLE, $8.00.

We also keep a full stock of SUPERIOR ELECTRO-SILVER-PLATED GOODS made by the celebrated MERIDEN BRITANNIA CO., and ROGERS, SMITH, & CO., and fully guaranteed by us.

STRONG AND DURABLE.

FACETIÆ.

An old and weather-worn trapper was recently seen sauntering along the main street of one of our Western villages. Pausing in front of a little meeting-house for a moment, he went in and took his seat among the congregation. The preacher was discoursing on the text of "the sheep and the wolves," and had evidently been drawing a contrast between the two subjects. Says he: "We who assemble here from week to week and do our duty and perform our part are the sheep; now who are the wolves?" A pause, and our friend the trapper rose to his feet: "Wa'al, stranger, rather than see the play stopped I will be the wolves!" The preacher was vanquished.

Lord Brougham's longevity is now attributed to his having been preserved in Canned.

A Connecticut editor gives an account of a man who "blew out his brains after bidding his wife good-by with a shot-gun."

"How much to insert this death?" asked a person at a newspaper-office.

"One dollar."

"Why, I paid but fifty cents the last time I inserted one."

"That was a common death," said the publisher, "but this is 'sincerely regretted.'"

Lord Dundreary has given his opinion in regard to that much vexed question—marriage with a deceased wife's sister: "I think," he says, "marriage with a deceased wife's thither is very proper and economical, because when a fellow marrieth his deceased wife's thither he—hath only one mother-in-law."

"I'm afraid you don't like babies when they cry," said a matron to a gentleman, as she tried to soothe the darling in her arms. "Oh yes," said he, "I like them best when they cry, because I've always observed that then they are invariably carried out of the room."

A little up-town five-year-old, who was hungry one night recently just at bedtime, but didn't wish to ask directly for something more to eat, put the proposition in this way: "Mamma, are little children who starve to death happy after they die?" A good big slice of bread and butter was the answer.

GROWING BETTER.

THE question is often asked, "Is the world growing better?"

Certain classes of minds are incompetent to answer this question. The habitual cynic, whose cold and sarcastic nature is unable to supply the materials for moral judgment, and, on the other side, the too generous enthusiast, who carries a constant millennium in his overwrought fancy, are alike unfit to decide the point. Each projects his own mind upon the subject, and, while moving in opposite directions, each transforms his personal thoughts into positive facts. Between these extremes we have other orders of mind, such as the statisticians, the skeptical, and the unhelpful, who are more or less incapable from temperament or culture to enter into the merits of this question. If these men are not reliable witnesses in the case, to whom shall we turn for an authoritative decision? Men of genial intellect, men of heart, men of moral insight, who have openness of understanding, strong but balanced sympathies, genuine tenderness of feeling, these are the men worthy to be heard.

All such men will agree that the world in this age is much more sensible of the evils that exist in society than ever before, and, at the same time, is dissatisfied that its knowledge of these enormities is not more accurate and complete. The ignorance of these things, once so common, was the worst form of ignorance. It was contented and complacent ignorance that rejoiced in its own blindness. But that has passed away. The minds of men are now turned with intense consideration to whatever afflicts the state and oppresses humanity. Intellect is every where sanitary, searching into the occult causes of moral ill health, and laboring to institute a more wholesome regimen. Intellect, too, is the great police of the day. By a divine commission it penetrates the shelters of iniquity, drags forth the burrowing culprits, and throws the full daylight upon their hideousness. This is unquestionably a vast gain. We are beginning to get the "gauge of human misery," and to form some definite idea of the gigantic wrongs that curse the world. The contrast in this respect between our times and those of our grandfathers is very sharply defined; so much so as to make us wonder at the quiet way in which they took the evils under which they suffered. Old files of newspapers, magazines of the last century, reviews of the anciently modern school are singularly reticent on such topics; and, like Cowper with Bunyan (though in a different spirit), they avoid such discussions lest they should offend ears polite. But it is all changed now. The change, indeed, is not an unmixed good. Publications exist that present details of vice to panders to vice. These, however, are the scum on the ocean, not the ocean itself.

Another fact all will unite in accepting. Not only are we more sensible of existing evils, but we are much more sensitive to their moral and social dangers. The terrible truth is reaching us in such a way as to compel us to feel its force. Had it been exhibited in the form of mere statistics that would have been a demonstrative appeal to the intellect. But as the good spirit of the age would have it, the mighty agencies of literature, and of the secular press, and of the reforming platform were all in active operation, and could lend their strength to the good work. What the steam-engine and the telegraph are to trade and commerce, these are to morality and virtue. And through their instrumentality the world is made to feel as well as see the prodigious evils under which it is groaning. We need not claim that these agencies are primary. We are content to view them as merely subordinate to the religious power of the age. But while regarding them as simple adjuncts to Christianity, we are justified in affirming that they are invaluable in their humbler sphere. If the ocean contains a vast supply of salt, it does not follow that salt mines and salt lakes are expletives. If the sun is the central source of light, oil and gas are still very useful. And hence, while admitting, and gladly admitting, the supernatural influence of Christianity as the remedy for evil, we nevertheless rejoice that we have these auxiliaries as palpable everyday helpers to touch our hearts, and bring closely home to our consciousness the tremendous evils beneath which this world is struggling.

The battle with evil is as old as the world. But let this be said—viz., the fight was never as fierce and as general as in our day. On the side of truth and goodness never was there such a firm and glorious array, and every hour this array is extending both as to numerical and spiritual strength. Men have better command of great principles, and they know better how to employ them. Is it strange, then, that we have more confidence in right and integrity than formerly? The age is hopeful, and no man belongs to the age who is not hopeful. You tell us of the enormous wrongs of the times. But the whole argument turns on the amount and quality of the resisting and reforming good. Count the waste places of the physical globe, the spaces of dreary sand stretching out into vastness, the mountainous regions that defy habitation, the snow and ice solitudes, and how wide and continent-like is their reaching sweep? But despite of these we number the millions of earth's population by the hundred, and civilization achieves its wonders, and trade and commerce have scope and verge enough for a magnificent expansion. So with the moral world. The forces of evil, although so multitudinous, so well-organized, so compact, so defiant, are really less dangerous every hour we live. Is there any Vesuvius in our day that could bury a Herculaneum or a Pompeii? Is there any Sodom without its ten righteous? One reason why the world is so bad is because it is so good—just as the intenser light casts the thicker shadow. Far be it from us to disguise the fact that sins and sorrows abound, and yet this fact can only be rightly seen in the all-revealing light of a higher fact. If it is sheer wickedness to say with Milton's Satan, "Evil, be thou my good"—if it is mere folly to believe with certain modern poets that evil is good in process of formation, it is wisdom and piety to believe with Thomson that from "seeming evil" God "educes good, and better thence in infinite progression."

ENGLAND'S WELCOME TO LONGFELLOW.

HERE'S a welcome to you, Professor,
Arrived on the English strand;
For your songs across the Atlantic
In the tongue of the mother-land.

Your lyrics are loved of the household,
That knows no Academy's law:—
One hand's warm pressure is better
Than a whole world's distant awe.

It's cold in the clear blue ether,
That the king of the eagles achieves:—
But the swallows have endless summer,
And build close under our eaves.

And the voices that bid you welcome
Are many, and tender, and true—
They'd not shout for the best of the poets
As loud as they're hailing you!

Come to the homes of the people,
Where your household words are dear;
There's seldom a poet has sung them,
Such lyrics of courage and cheer.

The poet who taught "Resignation,"
Who sang us the "Psalms of Life"—
You are dear to them all, Professor,
Child, parent, husband and wife!

Ay, let Universities seat you
In Temples of Honors and Arts:—
The people of England, Sir, greet you,
And open the doors of their hearts.

VENTILATING OUR AFFECTIONS.

WHILE the mutual enjoyment of each others' company is undoubtedly essential to love, friendship, and family affection, it is quite possible that a too close and constant association may rather weaken than strengthen those ties.

"Out of sight, out of mind," says the old proverb, which, with all its cynical doubt of the constancy of human attachment, may be true. A long absence and withdrawal from daily view will severely try the strength of the most pertinacious affection, and it may be prudent not to protract the test. A short absence, however, sharpens love, and it is easy to find the reason why it should. We require to be dispossessed of an habitual enjoyment to appreciate it. It is necessary to be stimulated by the pain of privation, in order to feel the pleasure of possession. We must suffer hunger before we can enjoy the feast. If we sit down daily to the rich banquet we get satiated with the good things, and the most delicious morsels pull upon our taste. So it is with those greatest of all human delights, love, friendship, and family affection.

Occasional absence from those to whom we are strongly attached has the advantage, too, not only of increasing our desire for their society by feeling the want of its enjoyment, but of smoothening over with a film of forgetfulness the fretting irregularities to which the most nicely adjusted friendships are liable.

The domestic familiarity may not have the proverbial effect of begetting contempt, but it never fails to wear away that reserve so favorable to the preservation of one's own dignity and respect for that of others. Among well-bred people who are not bound to each other by any stronger tie than mutual acquaintance there is a chivalrous courtesy which lubricates social intercourse, and gives it a harmonious smoothness extremely grateful to the refined. A little of this would be desirable even in closer intimacies. In former times, when domestic authority held stronger sway, the mutual bearing of the various members of the family was more courteous, but it was as much too formal and severe as in these democratic times it is too free and irreverent.

If those who are sincerely attached to each other would more frequently place themselves in the mutual attitude, as it were, of strangers, by occasional separation, they would find their love strengthened and not weakened. There are other means, no doubt, of stimulating the domestic affections than temporary absences. The home circle is apt to become too contracted, bringing all within it into an excessive closeness of contact, which ruffles the necessary inequalities of temper, and makes them unpleasantly sensible. By widening domestic sympathy, and receiving within its embrace a larger portion of society, there will be occasionally interposed between the different members of the family so much of a foreign element as to prevent roughness of domestic friction.

We shall find that ventilating our affections, either by letting in the free air of the world or seeking it without, will be sure to refresh and invigorate them.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

A Letter to a Young Politician.

MY DEAR BURLEIGH,—I have observed your career with peculiar interest from the moment you made your first speech in the caucus to the present, and after our little conversation of yesterday evening I shall not refuse to give you the lesson of my experience. There is no road more difficult, not even Jordan, than that of politics, and none is so copiously strewn with the skeletons of the unfortunate. As I reflect upon the men that I have known, the distinguished politicians, the eminent "public servants," the labors and agonies of aspirants, I discover that not only is the road difficult, but that the most blinding manners upon it are often useless and lost. Ah me! the bows, the smiles, the smirks, the affected interest, the lies, the bores, the waste of soul and body, to which I have seen clever and sensible men submit, to secure political preferment!

Nevertheless, it is not surprising to me that you are fascinated by the promise of such a career, because you see only certain external results, and you imagine a great many more. Indeed, the pleasure I have in knowing that you will enter politics, as it is called, is not disturbed by the reflection that you will be bitterly disappointed in many ways. There is nothing more foolish than the air with which I hear people say:

"Oh, I know nothing about politics. I get dirty enough without dipping into that cess-pool."

Precisely; and my good friend who says so does his very best to make it and to keep it a cess-pool. If ability, and intelligence, and refinement will have nothing to do with politics, ignorance and knavery will have every thing to do with them. Here is my fine acquaintance Tom Gresham. He is one of the most prosperous merchants in the country. He is a man of true genius for affairs, and manages his business with a skill which is delightful to witness, and of which the results are visible in a hundred public as well as private ways. He is proud of being a merchant-prince. This is the age and the country of merchants, and he is one of the chief.

"But politics, my dear Bachelor," says Tom Gresham to me—"politics! Why, politicians are the dirtiest knaves going. I despise them."

Thomas Gresham, merchant, speaks of affairs to which Edmund Burke, and Alexander Hamilton, and Bismarck, and Cavour did not disdain to devote their powers, in the same manner in which the aristocracy of Christendom always spoke of merchants two or three hundred years ago. I don't care for the reasons. Perhaps it was because the traders were of the race that crucified. That does not disturb the fact, my dear Burleigh, that the merchants were scorned.

Now suppose that in some old baronial castle, say in Front-de-Bœuf's, say in Richard Plantagenet's, some grave philosopher had laid his hand upon the disdainfully-slugging baronial shoulder, and had said:

"Oh, Richard! oh, mon roi! is not the man who carries the fruits of the earth from one part of it to another, whose pursuits require peace, and extend civilization, and increase intelligence, as useful a man in his way as one who goes flashing off to Palestine, and strikes blows that resound through the world to wrest the sepulchre from the infidel?"

Is it possible to imagine that the baron or the king could have seen the subject as we do? And if not, if with a huge medieval oath he had brought his steeled hand down upon the table, and had sworn that merchants were pigs and cattle and vermin, would his great oath and his noisy hand have made them so?

Men who do the work of the merchant are benefactors. They are to be praised. They serve us all. But I have no hesitation in saying to my prosperous mercantile friend Thomas Gresham:

"Tom, you are as dull as Front-de-Bœuf, and your conduct and speech are as ridiculous."

For what ought every honest man in this country to be but a politician? I don't mean a corrupt and false intriguer, of course, nor a loafer in any sense, nor, above all, do I mean an office-seeker; but a man informed of public affairs, and of the principles and policies of parties, so that he can take an intelligent share in the government of which he is a part. My friend Gresham may be very sure that a country will not govern itself. It will be governed either by its intelligence or by its ignorance; and it will be ruled by its ignorance if its intelligence disdainfully shirks all interest in the subject.

My dear Burleigh, if Alexander Hamilton, and John Jay, and James Madison, and James Wilson, and James Otis, and Samuel Adams, and George Washington, and Thomas Jefferson, and Rufus King, had all said that politics were a dirty mess, and that they would have nothing to do with them, because Philip Freneau and other doubtful men were politicians, they would have deserved as miserable a government as their refusal to mingle in politics would have suffered to arise. There is nothing more unworthy an American citizen than this contempt of an interest in politics. If it be real, the man does not comprehend the first duty of an American. If it be affected, he is not worthy of the name America. Moreover, I always feel that we have a right to demand it of each other. When an intelligent and responsible citizen says to me that he despises politics—my friend Gresham again, for instance—I say to him:

"Indeed, and what right have you to make me carry your load?"

"What do you mean by talking in parables, my dear Bachelor?" replies Tom.

"I mean that if any sailor dodge his work some other sailor has to do it, and that is just what you impose upon me, Thomas Gresham, when you refuse to give your experience and good sense to politics, so far at least as to know for whom you vote and why you vote for him, and so to make and sustain a sound moral public opinion; and what is more, my hearty, I won't stand it."

Gresham surrenders, and says, "Well, Bachelor, tell me whom to vote for, and why I vote for him this time, and I will try to keep along even with the business hereafter."

Would you believe, my dear Burleigh, that I have met Gresham in the queue at the polling-place, and when I asked him for whom he meant to vote, he has shown me his ballot, and when I said, warmly, "Why, Gresham, why do you vote for him?" the intolerable Laodicean has replied, with a laugh,

"Well, good Heaven, if you have any preference, give me your candidate's ballot and I'll vote for him."

When I rebuked him he laughed only the louder:

"Why, my dear fellow, they are all scall-wags together; one's as bad as t'other; what's the odds?"

I am very glad that you do not mean to follow such an incorrigible example, but that you understand that character and ability count in politics as they count every where else in human life. I do not mean that all young men should make speeches at caucuses, and strive for a political career. Of course not. Let those only make speeches who can make honest ones, and who have a gift and a wish for speaking. I certainly do not advise you or any man to place his hopes upon political preferment. Public office requires an immense private sacrifice. It is to those who are best fitted for it a true burden; and while nothing is considered more ridiculous than for a man to speak of accepting office in obedience to a sense of duty, nothing is truer than that many of the best men in office accept it for no other reason. They know the quality of the glory that surrounds office; they know that the Hesperidean banquet to which they are summoned is a feast of apples of Sodom.

Do you remember in Homer the parting of Hector and Andromache? Such it seems to me is the farewell that every public man takes of the life of the affections, the true and eternal life of man. Yet it is often a plain duty to take that farewell—often the duty of the unwilling head to wear the heavy crown for which so many brows are aching.

You can easily see, my dear youth, what my counsel is. There is but one talisman in the way upon which you enter, and that is honesty. Discover, first of all, what your real purpose is. Is it to serve yourself, or to serve your country? If self is your real object, honesty will be often horribly in the way; if the public welfare, honesty will never incommode you. If you are serving yourself in the ordinary sense, by which I mean your personal advancement in office and general consideration, you must be every body's humble servant. Every man who wants a place must feel that you are his friend. You must offend nobody. You must smile meaning smiles upon every side—talk very softly, and say very little. You must remember that nothing is more dangerous to your chances than the expression of an opinion. Smooth your face, muzzle your tongue, oil your elbow, in order that every body who votes for you may feel that you are his property, his agent, his slave.

My dear Burleigh, what letters public men, yea even Presidents, receive! What insults they endure, what nauseous familiarity! In my younger days I ran for alderman of my ward, and was defeated. But there was not a loafer of the party that nominated me who did not come all through the year to ask for some office, not as a suppliant, but as an owner of me and of my efforts. "I voted for you, you remember," was the phrase which they seemed to think was all-sufficient to secure my undivided devotion to their unauthorized wishes. And as I did not behave as if I thought myself under any obligation whatever, they denounced me as a proud aristocrat, and I was never again nominated.

But I did not therefore despise politics and renounce patriotism. On the contrary, I felt only the more deeply how necessary it was for every honest man to strive against a system in which the condition of personal success is so often personal dishonor. And as I had no personal ambition, my good Burleigh, I still continued my humble efforts to advance the public welfare by sustaining a wise public opinion, which does not believe that you can gather grapes of thorns nor peaches from cabbage-plants, nor yet a good government out of bad men. And whether you mean to serve the commonwealth as an unknown private, like me, or as a General Commanding, like so many others, I am equally glad for that invisible but beloved parent, the country, who always needs all the honest efforts of all her honest children.

Your faithful counselor,

AN OLD BACHELOR.

TOILETTE ARTICLES.

HANDKERCHIEF PERFUMES.

THE perfumes for the handkerchief are prepared from almost all known fragrant substances. They are called essences, extracts, bouquets, and treble extracts, besides a more concentrated form of the latter called concentrated essences. The extracts most in vogue at this moment are the Guards, Jockey Club, Ess Bouquet, West End, Opera, Indian, Chinese, Grand Duchesse, and Florimel. All these are compounds of various sweet exotic perfumes. In addition we have rose, wood violet, jasmine, magnolia, orange, tuberose, iliang-ilang, and other natural perfumes. These odors are really obtained direct from the flowers, and the names given to their preparations by the French perfumers are those of the flowers from which the perfume is extracted.

There are four means used by perfumers for extracting the aroma from fragrant substances—distillation, maceration, absorption, and expression.

Distillation is applied to plants, seeds, barks, woods, and a few flowers.

Maceration consists in steeping flowers in a bath of hot grease and renewing them until the grease is saturated with the perfume. This grease, which is called pomade, is then submitted to a strong pressure in horse-hair bags. Oil is also perfumed the same way, but it requires less heat. This process is applied to rose, violet, jonquil, and orange flowers; but for the more delicate flowers, such as jasmine and tuberose, the absorption system is employed.

Absorption or enfleurage may be thus described: Purified grease is spread in a thin layer on a pane of glass mounted in a wooden frame or sash called châssis; fresh flowers are strewed over this grease, and renewed every morning; and at the end of two or three weeks this grease acquires the scent of the flower in a high degree. Perfumed oil is made in the same way by substituting a wire bottom to the frame, and spreading on it a thick cotton cloth steeped in the finest olive-oil, which is pressed out of it after complete saturation. These frames are piled on each other to keep them hermetic. Some manufacturers mount the flowers on a net so as not to touch the grease, and others have arrangements of perforated plates supporting flowers placed alternately with sheets of glass covered with grease, inclosed in a chamber through which a current of air is made to pass, until all the scent of the flowers is carried into the grease. There are other processes, but none of them in general use, the bulk of the natural perfumes from flowers being produced in the manner here described.

The two processes of maceration and absorption are founded on the affinity the fragrant molecules of flowers possess for greasy bodies, becoming fixed into them more readily than into any other. Thus the scent of flowers is first transferred to grease, when it becomes pomade, and the pomade yields it to alcohol, the perfume having greater affinity for the latter than for grease, while if the flowers were placed directly in the alcohol, it would not extract the perfume at all, but destroy the flower's perfume. These alcoholic extracts, more or less diluted, form the most delightful perfumes, as they possess the true scent of the flower in all its freshness and delicacy. The best are made from pomades, those from the oil retaining a slightly oily flavor which is not agreeable.

The number of flowers used for perfumery purposes is about eight, viz.: rose, jasmine, orange, violet, jonquil, tuberose, iliang-ilang, and cassia. The rose used is the Hundred-leaved rose; the iliang-ilang (the unona odoratissima or Flower of Flowers); the jasmine is the Jasminum grandiflorum; the orange is the Bitter Orange; and the violet the Viola odorata, or Double Parma violet. The tuberose and jonquil are two bulbous plants; and the cassia is a pretty shrub, with globular golden flowers.

Out of these flowers five only are distilled, and yield essential oils, viz.: Rose, iliang-ilang, orange, jasmine, and cassia. Rose gives the famous otto, which is principally made in Turkey, near Adrianople; it is produced in India, but not in such large quantities. Iliang-ilang is made only in the Philippine Islands. Orange flowers produce what is called neroli, a name derived from nero-olio, dark oil, on account of its becoming dark by exposure to light, and not, as some people imagined, from its having been discovered in the time of Nero, for the Romans were totally ignorant of the art of distillation. Jasmine and cassia, we believe, are only distilled in Algeria, Tunis, and in India.

The aroma of the other flowers is extracted by means of absorption or maceration. Besides the flowers named others are sometimes submitted to these processes, such as mignonette, lilac, hawthorn, wall-flower, lily, heliotrope, sweet-pea, night-blooming cereus, flor-de-mayo, etc.; but the quantities obtained are so small that they have hitherto been mere experiments, and the perfumer is still obliged to compound all these perfumes artificially, by studying resemblances and affinities, and blending the shades of scent, as the painter does the colors on his pallet, produces an odor that is very like that of the flower.

Flowers for perfumery purposes are principally grown in the neighborhood of Grasse, Cannes, and Nice, three towns situated in the south of France close to each other. The manufacture of perfumery materials forms one of the principal branches of industry in that district, giving employment to upward of ten thousand people, including many women and children, for whom the work of culling flowers and picking off the stalks is particularly suitable. These flowers are generally grown by small farmers, who sell their crops to the perfumers by contract, with the exception of orange flowers, which are always sold in the market.

There are many essential oils used in perfumery which are not to be classed with those already mentioned. In England are grown the best lavender and peppermint in the world, and the essential oils distilled from these command a very high price. France produces also lavender, spike, peppermint, rosemary, thyme, wild thyme, and majoram. These are distilled on the spot where they are grown, by means of portable stills. An essential oil is also extracted from geranium, which, from its strong rosy flavor, is much prized by perfumers; and the bitter orange leaves yield a powerful essence named petit grain, which is used in eau de Cologne.

The fourth process is that of expression, which is confined to the fruits of the citrine family, viz.: orange, bitter orange, lemon, bergamot, cedar, and lime. The rinds of all these fruits contain an essential oil readily formed in small vesicles, and various means are adopted to extract it. On the coast of Genoa they rub the fruit against a grated funnel; in Sicily they press the rind in cloth bags, and in Calabria, where the largest quantity is manufactured, they roll the fruit between two bowls, one placed inside the other, the concave part of the lower and the convex part of the upper being armed with sharp spikes. These bowls, revolving in a contrary direction, cause the small vesicles on the surface of the fruit to burst, and give up the essence they contain, which is afterward collected with a sponge. These processes, are called in French au zest, and give the finest essences. The rinds are sometimes distilled, but that process does not give as fine essence as those already described. The three principal essences of this kind used are orange (called also Portugal), lemon, and bergamot. These all enter into the composition of eau de Cologne and many other perfumes. They are made in Calabria and Sicily in the months of October, November, and December. The essence produced by squeezing the rind is yellow; that made with the machine has a green tint. The more or less ripe state of the fruit also influences the color.

In addition to these essences, essential oils, etc., the following substances enter largely into the composition of perfumes for the handkerchief.—Musk (the secretion of the musk deer, found in Thibet, China, and Siberia; this is the fine musk of commerce; the various musky substances, such as musk-seed, etc., are only used in the preparation of the most ordinary perfumes); ambergris (the secretion of the ambergris whale found floating on the sea or on the coasts of America, India, China, Japan, Greenland, and other places); balsam of Tolu; cloves; cascarilla; cinnamon; civet (a secretion from the civet cat found in the Indian Archipelago and Africa); orris root; patchouly; sandal-wood (from which an oil is obtained); tonquin bean; vanilla bean; viivert, and many other aromatic substances. Our own country produces oil of cedar, pepper-mint, sassafras, and winter-green, the latter being exported in large quantities.

We have in our great country climates and places adapted to the cultivation of flowers for the purposes of perfumery as suitable as Grasse or Nice; but before such a thing is possible the country must become more densely populated, and a community must grow up in the places suitable for flower culture tutored in the particular cultivation of flowers for the special purpose of perfumery, as the flowers best adapted to the perfumer's wants are not always those the horticulturist would choose or grow; but they possess the quality of being highly perfumed, which is of the greatest value in the eyes of the flower farmers.

The principal French perfumers are Houbigant-Chardin, Pivert, Rimmel, Lubin, Pinaud, Chardin-Hardincourt, Coudray, and the Société Hygiénique. Of these, Lubin has been hitherto one of the best known in the United States, for which reason, probably, his perfumes have been so successfully counterfeited, as regards bottles and labels, that it is a matter of great difficulty to obtain the genuine. In England, Eugene Rimmel is the great perfumer; his father may be styled the reviver of the art of perfumery in that country. In America, Phalon, Wright, Bazin, and Burnett are probably the largest and most successful manufacturers. The price of an ordinary bottle of handkerchief perfume is $1.

PERFUMED WATERS AND TOILETTE VINEGAR, ETC.

The oldest perfumed water known is Hungary-water, first introduced, in 1370, by Queen Elizabeth of Hungary, who, it is said, became so beautiful through its use that she was asked in marriage at the age of seventy-two by the King of Poland: the closest approximation known to "beautiful forever." Next to this is aromatic, or toilette vinegar, that powerful disinfectant by the means of which four thieves, their faces covered with cloths saturated therewith, robbed the dead with impunity during the great plague of the sixteenth century. This was known long after by the name of Thieves' Vinegar. It afterward fell into disuse, until it was revived by Eugene Rimmel. It has since been manufactured by Bully, Bonn, and others. This is an excellent remedy for headache, being compounded of ammonia, vinegar, and balsams; and, as it is free from spirit, can be used in baths without injury to the skin. Rose-water is also very ancient. It was the custom in the Middle Ages to offer it to guests to wash their hands after meals. It is now used in France and England at table in various ingenious devices of fountains, etc. We have seen rose-water crackers in the form of mortars, which, when pulled, explode with a loud noise, and disclose a mortar, a no. 6, and a collapsible rose-water fountain. Lavender-water, both plain and musk-scented, is an agreeable adjunct to the toilette, as are also violet, verbena, and Florida waters. Orange flower water makes a delicious beverage—the eau sucrée so much liked by the French; for this it is only necessary to add a tea-spoonful to a tumbler of sugared water.

EAU DE COLOGNE.

Of all perfumed waters Cologne is most used in America. This fragrant and refreshing perfume was first manufactured during the last century at Cologne, by a German of Italian origin named Johann Maria Farina. It became so universally popular that a host of copyists sprung up in that place, all bearing his name, and professing to manufacture the same article, so that there is now a tradition that the only man in Cologne who is not named Farina is an inn-keeper, who has changed his name therefrom in disgust. The little city of Cologne is one vast Cologne manufactory, in which nearly all the bottles look precisely the same, and bear the same marks, and even the same flourish. The only token by which the original Johann Maria Farina is known to the initiated is that his bottles are marked gegenüber dem Jülich Platz, or opposite the Jülich Platz, the locality of his shop; while those of the numerous other Johann Maria Farinas are labeled gegenüber dem Elogius Platz, dem Juden Platz, etc. Johann Anton Farina and François Maria Farina also are known for their fine Colognes. It is said that the superiority of the Cologne-water manufactured in Cologne arises from the peculiar aroma of the grape from which the spirit is made, and which differs from that found in any other part of the country. It is very costly, however, a four-ounce bottle being worth $1 25. Fine Colognes are manufactured in England and France by Rimmel, Lubin, Coudray, Pivert, etc. Good Colognes, which are much cheaper, are made in America by numerous parties. Among the most celebrated in New York are Burnett, and Hazard & Caswell. These, of course, are not classed among handkerchief perfumes, but are used for the toilette; the best are those which are evanescent, and do not leave a stale odor behind.

POMADES.

The number of pomades is endless, and must be varied to suit the individual, as what suits one is frequently deleterious to another. A mixture of lime juice and glycerine cleans the hair effectually without the disagreeable properties of grease. Cocaine, philocome, bear's oil in various forms, hirsutus, and many other preparations, are well recommended.

COSMETICS.

These should be used with the greatest care, as they not infrequently contain mineral poisons, destructive to health and even life. Powders and lotions of all sorts are offered, the most of which are better let alone. We have seen a costly novelty of the kind, called Pearline, composed of pulverized mother-of-pearl, which imparts a velvety softness to the skin, and is said to be innocuous. The Kalliston and Paphian Lotion are also in good repute as cosmetics.

DENTIFRICES.

For these, soaps, powders, and washes are used according to the individual taste. A brush and water, with a little good soap, will always be found effectual. Powder is apt to wear the enamel of the teeth, and should be employed with great caution.

TOILETTE SOAPS.

This department is so large as to require an article of itself. We shall recur again to the subject; for the present we will only say that the English soaps bear the best reputation, followed closely by the French. Among the most celebrated English soaps are the Glycerine, Windsor, Spermaceti Tablet, and Yardley's, varying in price from one to three dollars a cake. Castile soap was first made at Castile in Spain, of olive-oil, whence it gained its reputation; it is now manufactured in all countries, chiefly from rapeseed oil. The mottled appearance of colored Castile soap is given it by sulphate of iron, a substance deleterious to the health. White Castile is therefore greatly to be preferred. That it does not make much lather is owing to the absence of resin, which is an ingredient in many popular soaps. Very fine scented soaps are made by the French perfumers, Lubin, Rimmel, etc. Cheap and good toilette soaps are made by American perfumers, among whom we may specify Phalon, Wright, Hull, and Colgate, at prices ranging from twenty-five cents to one dollar a cake.

VAPORIZERS.

For the fumigation and perfuming of rooms various ingenious devices have been contrived, by means of which a current of steam is made to pass through extracts or essences, setting free the fragrant particles; or pastilles are burned in tiny houses, locomotives, etc., diffusing an agreeable odor around. It is the custom in Europe to perfume places of public amusement in this manner, and so speedily is this done that, by means of a huge vaporizer, a whole theatre is perfumed in ten minutes.

PERFUMED DINNER CARDS.

In England and France it is very fashionable at dinner-parties to place a highly perfumed card bearing the name of each guest at his place at table. These cards are ornamented with beautifully-colored pictures of Cupids, children at play, and gastronomes, such as Baron Briesse, etc., in characteristic situations. They were used for the first time, we believe, in this country at the Dickens dinner in Boston.

For information given, we are indebted to EDWARD GREY & CO., representatives of EUGENE RIMMEL; PHALON & SON; JOSEPH BURNETT & CO.; HAZARD & CASWELL; SARGENT, JOYCE, & HOLTON; and J. C. HULL'S SON.

PERSONAL.

MRS. HENRIETTA D. FIELD, the accomplished wife of the editor of the New York Evangelist, gives the following graphic account of her recent visit to the home of "George Eliot," or MARIAN EVANS LEWES. She lives in London, near Regent's Park, on what is called the "North bank," where the great city verges away into the country, and, spreading out in all directions, the houses are no longer crowded together in solid masses, each square looking like a huge factory, but stand apart surrounded by grass and flowers. In this beautiful suburb, hidden by a wall which shuts out all jarring sights and sounds, stands the home of the author of "Adam Bede." Enter the gate and you see a square house of two stories, with no architectural pretensions, but which has about it an air of taste which is very attractive. The interior has the same character of refined simplicity. There is nothing pretentious. The furniture is simple and modest, yet there is a harmony of color which pleases the eye. White draperies soften without intercepting the rays of the sun, which play among the flowers in the window, the smell of which fills the room. All this the eye takes in at a glance before it rests on the mistress of this charming English home.

The appearance of "George Eliot" or Mrs. LEWES has been often described. No one who had ever seen her could mistake the large head (her brain must be heavier than most men's) covered with a mass of rich auburn hair. At first I thought her tall, for one could not think that such a head could rest on an ordinary woman's shoulders. But as she rose up her figure appeared of but medium height. She received us very kindly. A few words, and all reserve was gone. "Come, sit by me on this sofa," she said; and instantly, seated side by side, we were deep in conversation. Never did a sweeter voice fascinate a listener—so soft and low that one must almost bend to hear. You can imagine what a pleasure it was thus to sit for an hour beside this gifted woman, and hear her talk of questions interesting to the women of England and America! Though she has never crossed the sea she has many ties to America, from which she said she often received very kind letters. Like all liberal people in England, she looks to this as the country of the future, with earnest love and hope.

—Brigadier General ELIZA LYNCH, a daughter of Ireland, commands a regiment of one thousand women in Paraguay. Ancient poetry and legends are full of the exploits of female warriors called Amazons. Theseus married one of their queens named Hippolyta, his "buskined mistress and his warrior love," as Shakespeare calls her. His black majesty, the King of Dahomey, also has a female body-guard of cavalry.

—Sir EDWIN LANDSEER has alone, perhaps, of living artists, enjoyed the satisfaction of seeing one of his works fetch, at a public auction, the great sum of £4160—the price given for his "Braema."

—Another eminent and beautiful actress, Frau-lein HEDWIG RAABE, is coming to this country. She is German, but her professional distinction was mainly achieved in Russia.

—Mr. DICKENS announces in a letter to a French friend, that he long ago formed the intention of writing an autobiography.

—Mrs. ELLA E. HOBART, who officiated as chaplain in the First Wisconsin Volunteer Artillery, has just been honored by Congress, that body having passed a bill to pay her the same salary paid to men who filled similar positions. The Governor of Wisconsin declined to commission her until the War Department should consent to recognize the validity of the commission. This Mr. STANTON refused to do, on account of the sex of the applicant, although her application was indorsed by President LINCOLN. She has consequently been unable to obtain pay for her services until now.

—Miss CUSHMAN has not only come to remain, but proposes to sell her large and very valuable theatrical wardrobe. She intends to give a series of readings in Boston, to create a fund that shall be devoted to procuring marble copies of the three splendid brackets which she presented to the Boston Music Hall.

—Mrs. Dr. WILDMAN, of Vineland, New Jersey, does things. Last week she painted the outside of her house, and on Sunday preached for the Unitarian minister, giving entire satisfaction to a large audience. She is one of the oldest of the female medical practitioners.

—An enthusiastic Britisher who participates in the general joy with which LONGFELLOW has been received in England, puts his sentiments upon paper in the following poem:

"Let's welcome the Poet
With cheers deep and mellow,
For the day will be long Ere we welcome his fellow."

—Mr. JOHN BRIGHT is as bright at repartee as he is in parliamentary oratory. Recently a gentleman in his company took up a newspaper, saying he wanted to see what the Ministry were about. BRIGHT advised him to look among the robbers!

—Mr. EDWARD L. STANTON, a son of the late Secretary of War, is ambitious to maintain the reputation of his sire. He recently delivered the Alumni address before Kenyon College, Ohio, on the subject of practical education.

—It is regarded as a most excellent and very jocose proceeding that Mr. R. H. DANA, Jun., should have recently astonished the Massachusetts Legislature by reading an extract from the New Testament in the original Greek. An irreverent newspaper man, who has not yet succeeded in escaping from that State, but is making laudable effort to do so, fears that King JAMES's version would have been just as unfamiliar to many of them.

—Mrs. PATTI STRAKOSCH, with her two children, sailed for Paris on the 11th of July, to attend the wedding of her sister, ADELINA PATTI, which is to take place in August. The settlements are placed in the hands of Baron JAMES ROTHSCHILD, and are to be so drawn up as to prevent the bride's fortune becoming compromised by any weakness on her part, or by any imprudence on the part of her future husband, the Marquis DE CAUX, whose assent to them puts an end to the calumny that he was seeking not the heart but the hand of the little Diva merely to get the means of paying his debts.

—Miss BURDET COURTIS has had a picture painted of the Bishop of Exeter, in his 90th year, surrounded by his six sons. Price $4000.

—Good old Mr. and Mrs. HOWE, of Vermont, one 90, the other 89 years old, have lived together the remarkable period of 71 years. Of their eight living children the oldest is 70, the youngest 42. They have 42 grandchildren and 45 great-grandchildren.

—Miss NILSSON was a street singer and fiddler not many years ago, and used to display her musical talents for casual coppers at Swedish fairs.

—The King of Bavaria superintended the rehearsals of WAGNER's new opera, The Singing Masters of Nuremberg. The piece has just been performed with success in Munich. It lasted from five o'clock to eleven. The composer was called for repeatedly, and received in the box of his Royal patron, and by his Majesty's side, the applause of the audience.

—The lady readers of the Bazar may be edified with the information that the wardrobe of the Princess METTERNICH has been carefully enumerated, and contains the following garments: 119 dresses of silk, trimmed with 1900 yards of trimmings; 164 gowns of various materials, adorned with one million of buttons; 61 walking dresses and cloaks, ornamented with one ton of bugles; 51 shawls of various sizes and colors; 152 petticoats, in variety; 275 other undergarments; 365 pairs of stockings; 156 pairs of gloves of every known color; 49 pairs of boots and shoes; 71 sashes and belts; 64 brooches, in variety; 72 pairs of ear-rings, in variety; 31 fans; 24 parasols; 1 umbrella. It will be observed that the census-taker has skipped all allusion to bonnets, and that the odious word calico is pointedly ignored.

—The eldest son of the Crown Prince of Prussia, the Queen of England's grandson, speaks English as fluently as German. His grandfather, the old King, often uses the little fellow as interpreter, when promenading with him in the Garden of Sans Souci and conversing with English or American tourists.

—We lately spoke of the "late GEORGE D. PRENTICE." It should have been the late Mrs. GEORGE D. PRENTICE, that estimable lady, a leader of fashion in Kentucky for many years, and the writer of several beautiful musical pieces (not least charming of which is the most popular of the many airs to which MOORE's "Bower of roses by Bendemeer's Stream" has been set), having died about that time. PRENTICE, old, feeble, and a mere wreck of his former self, still lingers. His paper, once a power in Kentucky, is not what it once was, and HARVEY WATTESSON, of Tennessee, formerly editor of a traveling war paper called the Chattanooga Rebel, and latterly of the Nashville Banner, has been engaged to revive it.

—A literary man and a Christian—DAOOD PASHA—has been added to the Turkish Cabinet. He is the second literary gentleman and the second Christian ever called to the highest councils of the Ottoman Empire. The first Christian named a minister was AGATHON EFFENDI, but he died in Paris without officiating; and the first effective Christian minister is DAOOD PASHA, who was the first who reached the rank of Marshal, or Vizier. Several had been created Pashas before, but not of such high rank. GARABET ARTIN DAWOOD OGHLOO—now known as DAOOD or DAOOD PASHA—is a native of Constantinople, and a United, or Catholic Armenian. His first studies were devoted to universal history, but he afterward directed them to political history; and having been attached to the Ottoman Legation at Berlin, he seriously took up an important subject. The European studies of the Armenians, and others in the East, are not unnaturally modeled on French examples; but DAOOD was led to question the great principle of French administration—centralism by the state—so generally accepted by his brethren. He obtained the conviction that the true channel of inquiry was not by French or Latin institutions, but by those Germanic institutions from which constitutional and individual liberty have been transmitted to England and America. He consequently published a work of value, one remarkable for a Turkish author, "Histoire de la Législation des Anciens Germains." This came out at Berlin, in 1845, in two volumes. It is dedicated to JACOB GRIMM, under whose auspices it was brought forth. After holding various employments, DAOOD was, on the occasion of the Syrian troubles, selected by the Porte and the Allied Powers as Governor-General of the Lebanon, and has shown great ability and a high spirit of independence in the administration of his principality.

—The young gentleman who stands highest this year on the roll at the Naval Academy is Midshipman KELLEY, a nephew of Mr. BARNEY WILLIAMS. Mr. WILLIAMS himself, next to Mr. FORREST, possesses the best library and finest collection of pictures of any theatrical artist in the country.

—"The course of true love does run smooth" sometimes, and after a long while. Professor EVANS, for instance, of the University of Michigan, was very much attached to a young lady, who married another party, from whom she recently obtained a divorce. The Professor having remained single and constant, went at it again with the old sweet-heart, was successful, and a few days ago, in the library of President ANDREW D. WHITE, of the Cornell University, was united to the original "object," the Rev. SAMUEL J. MAY being the cleric who tied the connubial knot.

—Sir WILLIAM ABDY, recently deceased in London of too much port and cognate luxuries, left five millions of dollars in hard cash, besides a magnificent private library. The stamp duty on the will was sixty-seven thousand dollars.

EMBROIDERY PATTERN FOR BELL-PULL.—[SEE PAGE 629.]

HOME DRESSES.

This design is extremely tasteful. The foundation is black velvet, on which the pattern is worked in bead satin stitch with chalk, milk, crystal, and steel beads, three shades of green glass beads, and gilt beads. The branches and twigs are of milk, glass, and gold beads; the leaves partly in green and partly in shaded beads. The flowers and birds are of white and steel beads, the latter forming the darkest shade; while the filaments are of gilt beads. All the colors are used for the birds, the darker shaded parts being worked in green. The single figures of the design are underlaid with cotton, while the beads are strung on the working thread in the requisite numbers and color for each stitch. In some places, as, for instance, on the head, back, and breast of the birds, the beads are strung on separate threads and afterward laid on the foundation and sewed fast with short cross stitches. The leaves are underlaid with white pasteboard cut of the proper shape. The stitches are taken singly, and in the direction shown by the pattern. The letters designate the point at which the design begins to repeat. The edges are bordered with silk cord, and the end finished with a tassel.

SUMMER TOILETTES.

AMONG THE CORN.

The girl sat down 'mid the rustling corn
And started a nested bird,
And up it sprang with a burst of song;
But I do not think she heard.

She sat her down on the low stone-wall,
And gazed at the sunset sky:
I can not think that she saw its glow,
For why should it make her sigh?

What does she think about, sitting there?
What does her spirit see?
Is she thanking God for his golden sky,
And for river and hill and tree?

No: for her heart's in the city streets,
Where the working day is done:
The crowds are hurrying home, she knows,
But she only thinks of one!

She sees a room in an old brown house,
With a window long and low,
Where above the hum and the dusty moil
Some country geraniums grow.

She dreams of the life the women have
Who live in such homely place:
Is it the light of the setting sun
That is glowing on her face?

What of the meadows that smile below,
Or the ruddy clouds above?
They are but the gold God gave to set
Round His priceless gem of love.

Let her sit and dream 'mid the rustling corn
Till the golden sky grow gray:
We scarcely notice God's earth is fair
Till something is gone away.

ARABELLA AND HER BONNET.

By HARRIET PRESCOTT SPOFFORD.

SAID Conscience to Arabella: "No, you really do not need it."

"But," said Arabella—a lovely morsel of pink and white—back again to Conscience, "it would be so becoming!"

"The e is your illusion and rose-buds," answered Conscience; "you surely don't want any thing more becoming than that?"

"I've worn it every where," pouted Arabella.

"Well, what is the matter with your blue gauze and silver wheat?"

"It never was fit to be seen, in the first place—a mess of fuss and flummery!"

"You can't say that of the black lace and scarlet geraniums."

"That! It looks precisely as if it were made of odds and ends picked out of the rag-bag."

"But Mrs. General Toggery's taste is universally admitted, and she has one just like it."

"And I detest putting on a bonnet like somebody else's, you know very well; and I don't see why I should be compelled to do a thing I detest just to suit your whims! I never could endure the dowdy little dud, and I haven't worn it at all."

"It is quite fresh, then, for the time of need," said Conscience; "and quite fit for such a day as this, too, when every now and then the wind topples down the clouds that are piling so heavily in the west, and then blows them all about the sky."

"Well, if I should ruin it in a thunder-storm I shouldn't hear any more of it from you, and I've half the mind to go home and get it."

"Make it the whole. You've another besides these, if I'm not mistaken."

"What one, I should like to know?"

"Tell me, then, what has become of that sea-green tulle? Tom said your rosy little face shone out of that like a fairy who had overslept herself, and who woke up in the fields covered with hoarfrost."

"I can't wear it all the time, of course, or he'll think I wear it on purpose because he said so. Oh, I never saw such a lovely lavender! Just look at it yourself a moment. I think I must have it."

"How many would that make?" asked Conscience. "One, two, three, four, five—five in one season; isn't that, I ask you now—isn't that absurd?"

"No, it isn't. It isn't absurd at all, when you want them all."

"For goodness sake," said Conscience, warming up, "how many bonnets does a lady need at once?"

"Enough always to look fresh and nice in, and not to be known by one of them as far as you can see it."

"How many does poor Margaret, the little seamstress, have?"

"I'm sure I don't know. What is that to you? As many as she can afford to have, no doubt."

"Not at all. I'll tell you. She hasn't a single one. She wears that old barley-straw hat that she braided and pressed herself out of the straw they gave her one day in the country before threshing."

"She can have one of my old ones just as well as not; they're not soiled a single speck."

"She wouldn't wear them—nor would they be suitable if she would. And she is not the sort that loves cast-off finery, moreover."

"She can go without, then, if she likes that better!" said Arabella, tossing her pretty head.

"She wore a hood all winter that she knit herself out of the ravellings of an old shawl."

"It looked very nicely."

"That was her merit, not the hood's. But how much," asked Conscience, taking another turn, "does this lavender-colored ful-lal cost?"

"Twenty dollars."

"Oh my! If Margaret had twenty dollars, do you know what she'd do with it?"

"Buy a bonnet?"

"Pshaw! how the bonnets run in your head!

I should think it was enough to have them on your head in the quantity in which you do."

"Well, if she wouldn't buy a bonnet, what would she do?"

"There's her mother drudging her life out. She'd have her away to a holiday in the country, at the same place where she got her barley-straw, I fancy. Then there's her lame brother, ten years old and never has walked a step, never set foot on the earth, and I don't believe he has even so much as seen the beginning of the Avenue—she'd have him a little velocipede."

"It wouldn't be good for any thing at that price."

"Just as good as if it were handsomer, and the lame boy would enjoy trundling along in the sunshine just as much. And then there would be one grand family feast of strawberries—they're cheap now."

"I can give her some strawberries to take home the next time she comes to help Maria."

"And besides all that, little Kate would have a new white chip hat trimmed with a buff ribbon—if Margaret had twenty dollars all at once."

"I'm sure I wish Margaret had twenty dollars."

"So do I. But it will take her forever to earn it—and by that time the strawberries will be all gone—for you'll forget all about them before you get home."

Just then a shop-girl's white hand crept down carefully into the case, and took out the lavender and carried it off. "There! I told you so!" cried Arabella to her interlocutor. "Now there is somebody else who is going to have it—that is all your fault. I should have had it on and half way down the Avenue if you hadn't interfered—when I do so dote on lavender—the very color to subdue so lively a complexion as mine is; it sheds such a softness round the face; it makes a person look so pensive too; and it refines one off so—oh, it's too bad!"

"If you really need another bonnet why don't you buy the material—here's plenty of it—and make one like this yourself? You've studied it thoroughly enough; and any body can make a bonnet nowadays, and for one quarter of the milliners' prices. It is a beauty, certainly."

"Oh yes, just as if I wanted that trouble! Either get too much and have it wasted, or else not have enough, and have to piece and patch till any body might know I'd botched it up myself at home. Besides, I want it this afternoon if I want it at all. No, I thank you!"

"Then you'd better go without as well as Margaret," said Conscience, stoutly.

"Oh, be still!" said Arabella. "How tiresome you are! I don't see why you belong to our family. I declare—really—yes, she is bringing it back!"

"The other party would none of it," said Conscience.

"Is that your lowest price?" asked Arabella, leaving Conscience, and crossing over to the shop-girl. "Will you let me try it on? This is French blonde? And Italian crape? And the real black tea grass?" Conscience came and twitched her sleeve. "How lovely I look!"

said Arabella, turning then to Conscience her blushing face encoined in the miracle of lavender lace and golden straw, and smiling archly afterward at herself in the glass. "Confess that you never knew how pretty I was before!"

"Pretty is that pretty does," said Conscience, grimly.

"Will you send home for me the bonnet that I took off?" asked Arabella of the shop-girl.

"I didn't believe it of you!" murmured Conscience. "I didn't dream you were so selfish; but to be sure I should have known, after my experience of you."

"Any body'd think, to hear you talk," exclaimed Arabella, indignantly, "that I'd murdered somebody, instead of having bought at a sacrifice the very prettiest bonnet of the whole season!"

"At any rate, you're not made of money," retorted Conscience. "You only have an allowance; and you'll only have five dollars left to go till next quarter-day comes; and if you take this you can't go to the Philharmonic Concerts."

"Then I can stay at home. Besides, perhaps Tom will take me. It's of no use talking—I'm going to have the lavender!"

"You'll have to be frightfully economical," said Conscience, snapping the purse together.

"I suppose I can be," replied Arabella, loftily.

"Very well—I've said my say."

"I should think you had, and a great deal more than I ever wanted to hear you say! Good-by—you disagreeable thing!"

And Arabella turned once more to survey herself in the Psyche glass. No wonder she lingered to look at it—it was a bewitching little picture that turned and coquetted with her there, and as for costume, perfect; the filmy lawn of the skirts, with their delicate flutings and quillings, was just one shade more pronounced in color than the lavender of the new bonnet; and a transparent mantle of snowy lisse, with its woven hem and great Arab fold on the shoulders, made the wearer look light and fresh as a morning breeze. But though, in the whole picture, it was, after all, the face that your glance rested on—the apple-blossom face with great blue eyes and hair that was a mere tangle of sunshine and gold—it was the bonnet that Arabella's glance rested on. "What did people ever do before they had bonnets?" said she to herself, now that Conscience was gone. "How exquisite that evening-cloud tint is! and how those sprays of yellow straw take the horrid chestnut out of my hair! I won't call it red if Tom does. Just because Cousin Tom's an artist he thinks it is one of his duties to be always raving about red hair."

After which Arabella, throwing a glance of contempt upon her late bonnet that the shop-girl was tying up in a box, and wondering how any body who wore the lavender could ever have worn that thing, opened a dainty lace sun-shade and tripped out of the store.

"Please give me a cent?" whined a starved and ragged little skeleton, on whom it would have been an impossibility to throw the coin away.

Arabella gathered up her floating skirts from the contamination and hurried by—Conscience had shut the purse so tightly that she never once dreamed of opening it, and she never carried coppers with her, besides. It seemed to her, though, presently, as if Fate, or Conscience, or Somebody, had been at work since she went into the milliner's shop, at work out of pure malice; for, if a series of all the untoward and disconsolate sights of the town had been dramatically arranged for the benefit of her afternoon stroll, the affair could hardly have come off in better style. The first person that crossed her path, after this maladroit method, was a man, some thirty years old, but no higher than her hand; a dwarf, oddly dressed, and wearing upon his back a great advertisement of some firm that paid him the equivalent of a livelihood for the degrading service. Arabella looked at his haggard little face, which the glance of every passer-by seemed to sting to blushes; and just then he raised his timid eyes to hers: they rested there a moment with a sort of happy loitering, as if the flower-blooming face above him were a pleasure to see; but to Arabella, whose mind was full only of the one thing, it seemed as if it must be the bonnet that had caught his eye, and it flashed over her with his wistful gaze—wistful not on any account of lavender and lace, but because of the love and delight lost out of his lot—it flashed over her in a second of time that the twenty dollars that the bonnet had cost would have given this sad soul a fortnight's respite from shame.

But he passed, and Arabella forgot him, and caught with her prettily-gloved hand a bit of blonde that began to flutter too gayly on the strengthening breeze, and saw one of her old cavaliers in the distance, and knew that just then she looked lovelier than ever, when she came plump upon a long, thin, yellow palm that was silently extended to her for charity.

Arabella glanced at its owner—a dark and sal-low woman, with piteous and sunken black eyes—she was plainly dying of consumption, and she held in her arms an atom of a baby but a few months old, as poor, as patient, as piteous as herself. "Oh! what will become of that little child?" exclaimed Arabella. And she had hesitated and almost stopped before she remembered that her purse was shut; then, too, though they subscribed to charities largely at her house, they never gave to street-beggars, except when Arabella herself did so stealthily. She went on immediately, but still the woman's beseeching eyes went with her: she turned and looked back a moment at the two, the woman sitting in the hot sun with her burden at her heart, and with nothing but a tattered shawl over her head; then the frivolous crape of her lavender blew over her eyes again, and she beheld them no more.

Not many steps farther on had Arabella gone when she came very near stumbling over an object that was quickly drawn back; it was the unwieldy limbs of a soldier whose feet had been frozen off in some winter of the rebellion horror; he was resting his aching arm that had all day long turned the handle of a squeaking hurdy-gurdy; he took off his cap to Arabella, and held it for a dime.

If Arabella gave to all these people, as she said extenuatingly to herself, she would soon have nothing left; besides, it was likely that others had given plenty; and she really must economize—and a dime, she had heard her uncle Thaddeus say, spoiled the face of a dollar; still, she would have liked to—and while she was saying it she had gone by. She heard the man begin his weary grind again in a moment more—"When this cruel war is over." How she had sung that song in its day! And Tom had been a soldier too, and she had thought then that nothing would be too good for any one of all the tramping legions that returned; and now she dared not give this man, maimed and crippled in her defense, a single dime, and for no other reason than because she had just paid twenty dollars for a new bonnet. "It all happens just to spite me!" exclaimed Arabella, reviewing the incidents of her stroll as she sauntered on well under a cloud. They were not comfortable reflections that she had, but the footless man was half a dozen squares behind by the time she had finished them, and that at least was comfortable.

As if her heart must be hardened like Pharaoh's this afternoon, it was not a distance of many rods before Arabella encountered a lamentable looking woman who needed nothing but her bloated, burning face to tell the tale of what she was. She was reeling, and to save herself from a fall she caught hold of Arabella's misty lawns, and they gave way of course in a hissing rent. The rent, though, away some pins could remedy, but what could wipe away the touch? Perhaps Arabella's frightened and disgusted countenance plainly said as much, for the woman broke into an inane laugh. But quickly changing her tune: "it's a contemptible face ye have till ye!" cried the wretched thing. "An' it's iver so foine a ledy yez is. But if ye'd been turned out of house and home this morning for the want of tin dollars to pay him the rent ye'd ought to be as high as myself this afternoon, and sleep in the station-house to-night, forby."

Drunk in the streets for the want of ten dollars, and Arabella's bonnet—

With a warmth of vexation and trouble glowing all over her Arabella slipped down a cross-street to escape the bawling voice of the vagrant, to whom it was of no use to give alms while in this condition, and who had turned about as if to follow her—meaning to return to the pleasant Avenue when she had traversed the square directly. The soft afternoon breeze with which she started had lost a portion of its balmy deliciousness, and was beginning to rise round the corners in puffs of dust that fell like a blight upon every thing. The sun, too, was not so bright as it had been, or else its light fell in a drearier kind of way down these dismal by-streets; and lavender, thought Arabella then, all at once recurring freshly to the memory of it, needed all the sunshine that could ever be shed upon it to bring out the bloomy richness within it, like that on the skin of a grape. He hastened to get back upon the delightful Avenue since the mischief was done, the bonnet bought and the money paid, she might as well have her enjoyment out of it, she hurriedly reasoned. But just as she had reached the third corner of the square, as if it had been destined that the lavender should wilt with condemnation, her path met with another obstruction, and this time a formidable one, that met her face to face as she turned the angle, and allowed her no chance to evade it.

It was a cluster of street-followers about a couple of policemen and a tradesman who held a young girl in their custody, and were taking her to her quarters for the night, previous to her appearance before a magistrate to-morrow morning apparently on a charge of theft. Suddenly the young girl tried to break away from the policemen. "Let me go!" she cried. "It is Miss Arabella! Oh, Miss Arabella, save me! Do save me! You know I'm honest! It caught on my shawl! Oh, I tell you truly it did! And it will break my mother's heart—" and her voice was swallowed in sobs.

It was Margaret, the little seamstress, with handcuffs on her slender wrists, and enduring all these indignities! Arabella sprang toward the tradesman. "Indeed Sir, you have made a great mistake. I have known this young woman all my life: she is perfectly respectable: we value her above every thing: and she would no more take a thing dishonestly than I would myself!" she said.

Whether her sweet voice, her winning manner, or the lavender, mollified the tradesman the least trifle possible, it is not easy to say. But certainly he addressed her after a different fashion from that with which he had just been brow-beating poor Margaret—though even then there was no waste of courtesy. He couldn't help that, he condescended so far as to answer her, lifting his hat the while; the piece of lace was found under the young woman's shawl; but as it was only a remnant, if she, Arabella, chose to pay the sum of twenty dollars, the price of the piece, the young woman might go free. He wasn't sure that he was justified even in that, for these things were becoming so common that somebody must be made an example of, but—

Arabella's purse flew open as if by magic—alas! alas! there were but five dollars in it! In vain she offered that sum to the tradesman; in vain she gave him her card, and promised that her father, her cousin Tom, should come and settle with him; in vain she implored the policemen. The tradesman was inexorable. The policemen told her that she only stopped the way; a crowd was gathering; she could do the young woman more good, if the young woman was innocent, by sending her father; and Margaret was moved on.

Scarlet with anger to think how justice could be bought and sold—that both police and plaintiff had stood ready to compound a felony, and she had not the twenty dollars necessary to buy their pitiful small souls—to think, too, of their daring to accuse Margaret, her own seamstress, of a theft—Arabella was pushed aside. She neither thought nor remembered any thing for the moment now but the necessity of hastening home and summoning somebody to poor Margaret's rescue. She did not know her way very well down in these side-streets; they perpetually confused her; the Avenue, after all, was the quickest route home. She almost ran, that she might the sooner reach its paradise of broad sidewalks and gorgeous windows. Her troubles to-day seemed to know no end, and for once in her life she forgot all about herself, and was only thinking of the poor little seamstress and how soon she could be relieved. She was very warm, and much flushed with walking and with emotion, and had grown strangely tired. She began to feel the fatigue; and that recalled other sensations: the wind was so disagreeable; it seemed to her that she must be rough with dust; she no longer was aware of her toilette as a rose might be aware of its petals, but it annoyed her; the corner of a loose awning had flapped her bonnet awry, she was morally sure; the lavender! how she hated it in a sudden fury! And then, in a score of quick steps, just as she turned the last corner into the Avenue, what a revulsion overtook her! for something met her eyes that was a thousand compensations in one. She ceased instantly to remember that wind and heat and vexation and an awning had made her not altogether as enticing a spectacle as when she tripped out of the milliner's store; the instincts of race and sex and habit suppressed every other feeling; she sprang forward to the encounter.

It was Julia Tippecanoe sailing toward her in full feather, happy as that glorious creature only can be when Major Lancer and Lieutenant Low-boy hold guard on her either side. Arabella would not have lifted her hand to her bonnet that moment if it had blown off her head; but mentally she preened and plumed, and triumph was throned upon her eyebrow. For the breathing-space she lost all sight of Margaret; the e was room in that moment only for Julia and the lavender. Julia could not afford such a bonnet, in the first place; and would look like a fright in it if she could, in the second—with her face, which was nothing more than an anatomy! Put—but—what horrible apparition was this?—on Julia Tippecanoe's head, dancing and fluttering like a blossom—the mate—the very mate to the lavender! Crushed to earth, Arabella crept by, forgetting even to smile.

It had been a pretty little twenty-dollar bill in her purse, green and crisp as a leaf of lettuce—and how many times this afternoon had she sacrificed it! And all for what? To have Julia Tippecanoe sail over her head in one that eclipsed it by merely being every thread as exquisite; to have a great awning junc it and flap it all awry; to have herself worried half to death with the emphasis of her wanton purchase gave to other people's sufferings; to have—oh, gracious goodness! what was this, a rain-drop? A rain-drop. A real rain-drop—another, and another—a shower—a pelting, pattering, pouring, drenching summer shower, that was wetting her chignon to its cushion, her bonnet to its very wires, and making the fairy structure as sodden a thing as any old last-year's leaf in a streaming garden path!

What was she to do now? Not a store in sight for her to find a refuge in, not a hack-stand could she see or guess of in any direction, not a car, nor a car-track; every dwelling-house was strange to her. Metaphorically the starch had long since been taken out of her, but now she was limp indeed, for now came the dreadful physical reality. Down dashed the rain, the lightning cut through it, the thunder crackled and roared behind it, and then again a brief but absolutely suffocating sheet, as if a cloud had exploded at one touch, and all was over. Presently a sun-burst, the shining keystone of a rainbow whose arch was springing over the lofty rooftops down that patch of sky at the end of the Avenue, clouds as iridescent as pearl floating over from the west, and then broad blue sky again. But, as if the drenching shower had washed every living thing off from the face of the earth, not a soul was to be seen, neither up nor down the long brick and freestone range of costly buildings; the region looked like a desert; and whether all the people had been thunder-bolted into the ground, or had known wisely where to seek protection, there was nothing to say. The shower had passed, and Arabella had received its downpour all by herself. And Arabella—ah! what an object she was, to be sure! what an unrecognizable object! Did the footmen know it was the lovely lady of pinks and silver, and the two glass slippers, when the slatternly little Cinderella ran out the midnight gates? And the milliner who sent Arabella's despised Neapolitan home—what would she not have given for it now? Had she met her here, would she not have cut this anomaly dead? And it is possible that even Conscience—no; the worse she looked the more familiar would she have seemed to Conscience, that is certain. And Conscience would have known her at that instant as far as the power of an opera-glass extends. For just remember her appearance. The once lovely tint of her toilette had become as dingy as if its materials had been used to sop up the pavement, and the pale purple was running down in a stream across the white marble steps where, when it was too late, she had taken shelter. The delicate flutings and quillings were a mass of strings; the filmy lawns, streaked and dripping, hung round her like mops; the snowy mantle was a worthless wet rag; her soaked and blistered gloves clung to her hands like lichens to the bough of an apple-tree; her charming little boots, long since reduced to pulp, gave her feet a squelching sensation, as if they were treading on enormous insects in a damp cellar; and as for the bonnet, there are no words in either Worcester or Webster to tell its condition. That perfect evening-cloud tint had melted, as evening-cloud tints do; the lace that had shed such a pensive softness round the too happy face stuck to her forehead and her hair now like clots of cobweb; the hair, the lovely hair that had been a tangle of sunshine and gold, hung round her temples and her eyes in thin, straight, dripping elf-locks; and the Black Sea grass, the clusters of whose airy awns and reeds had danced and glittered an hour ago against the edges of the lavender, now amidst the general flattening and ruin seemed to stand erectly round poor Arabella's head, till altogether she looked more like Crazy Jane than like any thing else in the world. "I know I'm an object," wept Arabella, in the inward communings of her moist spirit. "I don't believe a hack will come up this street if I stand here all night. The coachman wouldn't let me in if there did, I suppose, when I'm so wet. I shall begin to mould, presently, I know. Oh! if any body that ever knew me when I was Arabella comes by this way, I shall sink into the ground—and oh! I wish I could!" The salt tears that ran down her face—she knew they were salt, for they ran into her mouth, and she could not wipe them away, since her handkerchief was wetter than the tears—the tears that ran down her face, mingling with some innocent white powder and the dust which the high wind had laid over every thing, making no exception of Arabella's cheeks, were the only items needed to complete the wreck of what she had been. "I know just how I'm looking," sobbed Arabella, still waiting for a coach. "Ringed, streaked, and speckled." And of the two maidens it is greatly to be doubted if poor little Margaret were not for the time being the happier.

There was but one more thing that could cap the climax of that unfortunate. It happened as Arabella stood there, unable to walk with the nightmare of her clothes clinging close round her, and almost unable to move, shaking and shivering, her teeth chattering like castanets, when an elegant little brougham dashed up to the curbstone, and a young gentleman in most irreproachable attire sprang out and ran lightly past her up the steps.

He didn't know her—and it was Tom!

Should she turn her face and creep off before he found her out, leaving that wet trail behind her like a snail's, and bear her anguish alone?

Should she stay and have the servant that opened the door to him order her off the steps as if she were a common drudge? Should she dare to move at all, and by that means attract his attention? Or should she brave every thing and claim his help and take him off before he could go in and be met by some damsel in ravishing raiment? While she cast the alternatives over, and before she could in the least make up her mind, she had cried out, "Oh, Tom! oh, don't you know me?"

The voice arrested him. He could never mistake those liquid bell-notes. But this creature, this caricature, from whence they came! Ah, merciful powers! was this the thing that had cheered and upheld him, and filled his dreams with heaven, during all the struggling and suffering of the days and nights of 'march and battle'? Was this the way she looked in the morning, before coming down in that bewitching little dress, ruffled and flounced like a quill daisy? Was this the way she looked at night, after all the intoxication, the flowers, the furbelows, the flushes of the German, and she was in the solitude of her own apartment? Was this the way she would look about the house, if ever he became any thing but a rich man, and Arabella had to "do her own work?"

"Oh, oh, oh! don't you know me, Tom?" she sobbed again.

In the glance and in the instantaneous transit of his thoughts, Tom, however, had comprehended all the miseries of the situation; if he was in love with Arabella, he had a sense of the ludicrous and a fondness for mystification.

"Beg pardon," said he, coolly, taking off his hat, "but do I know you?"

"Oh, Tom, dear Tom," cried Arabella, stretching out her dyed and trembling arms, "I used to be Arabella!" And her teeth began the castanet movement again.

"Bless my heart!" cried Tom, suddenly full of repentance. "You'll have your death of cold! Just tell me how it was—how—" and, to the amazement of his man, he turned about and caught the wet bundle in his arms, had her in the brougham, and the brougham whirled round and on its homeward way before a word of expostulation from that functionary's part could be uttered.

"I shall spoil the carriage—oh, I know I shall! I'm worse than Undine herself," stammered Arabella, weeping and laughing and catching her breath, like the bit of April weather that she was. "Oh, what a sight I am! Shut your eyes and don't you look at me, Tom! Only I never, never, never, was so glad and happy in all my life!"

"Are you glad? Are you happy?" said Tom. And somehow, in a courage long waited for, he had an arm round her waist again, his irreproachable attire was disregarded, and the little wet bundle was close against his heart, and the little wet face was resting on his own. "You are a beautiful, beautiful sight!" whispered the bold and shy Tom. "And I love you just the same, wet or dry. And I never was so glad and happy in all my life!"

Suddenly, and far too soon, the brougham stopped at Arabella's house, and somebody opened the door. If you'll believe it, it was Conscience. "How wicked I am! I had forgotten all about poor Margaret," cried Arabella, with her first glance, and breathlessly she poured forth the story and besought Tom to hasten to the help of the little seamstress. "I won't let you in now, but you can come back presently, dear Tom, when you have gotten her free," said Arabella. Tom already began to be rebellious against authority.

"It won't make any difference, you know," she laughed, "for I shall have to be up stairs so long dressing. But in an hour my hair will be crimped, and my dress will be as fresh and spotless as a white rose. And I shall be too lovely for you to look upon—"

"Without kissing," said Tom.

But Arabella never heeded that. "To think that I wasted just the money that would have saved her," she said, abstractedly, "on this sozzled, drozzled little dish-cloth!" And she spitefully tore the lavender from her head. "It is only a wreck," said she, sadly.

"Then I take salvage," said Tom, seizing it and pocketing it, and driving away with it on his errand. And hidden somewhere among his treasures he has the little bunch, stiff as a dried flower, to-day.

JAPANESE FUNERALS.

WHEN a death takes place a priest is sent for, who offers up prayers. Friends assemble, all the women dressed in white garments and hoods, white being the color emblematic of mourning and death.

The tablet, with the deceased person's name carved upon it in figures resembling Chinese characters, is prepared during the owner's lifetime; after death the priest gives an additional name, which is also inscribed on the sisak, or tablet. The funeral generally takes place an hour or two before sunset. The body is placed in a sitting posture in a coffin shaped like a tub; a white wand and a pot of powdered charcoal with some lime are placed within, the antiseptic and deodorizing properties of these substances having been made use of for a long time by the Japanese. The grave is made circular, and the inside is smoothly plastered with mortar made with a superior kind of lime; the coffin is deposited within, slabs of stone are placed across, and a temporary wooden structure is erected over it. At the end of fifty days, the prescribed season of mourning, this is removed, the ancestral tablet raised to its place of honor, with the temporal and spiritual names of the deceased, the latter in gilt characters, engraved upon it.

PARIS FASHIONS.

DISINCLINATION to attract observation by the adoption of remarkable and quaint fashions might at one time have applied to our fair ladies. They now, however, plunge into every novelty and variety of costume, and can scarcely await the "invitation" of the fashionable modiste to view the latest eccentricities imported from the capital of the civilized world of fashion. Costumes—Pompadour and Louis XVI.—are much en vogue; and even a bridal dress of the time of Henri III., the original of which was very probably worn by the beautiful Diane de Poitiers, or one of the bewitching escadron of Catherine de Médicis, has recently been produced from the atelier of the greatest of Parisian artistes. It must, however, be owned, notwithstanding their quaintness, that the costumes now generally in fashion, and the stuffs used, are well adapted for morning, visiting, and traveling toilettes, etc.; while for evening toune, silk, tulle, and crêpe remain, as of old, the choice fabrics. At present our ladies have not been induced to lay aside the train, which in a ball-room is as cumbersome to the wearer as it is dangerous to the dancers, in spite of the few innovations introduced into one or two balls in Paris, and which rendered the dancing perfectly successful.

Robes for the most part are worn to show the feet in front, the back being slightly raised from the ground. The front breadth is still quite plain, the back gathered or puckered up. Puffs or bouillonnés, horizontal and perpendicular, are much en vogue; these can also be arranged to suit the fancy of the wearer; in fact any trimmings of the last quarter of a century adapt themselves easily to the present fashion. A band of the material, two to four inches in width, exclusive of the hem, put on with a deep beading fancifully arranged, is placed above the flounce, which also forms the bottom of the skirt in conjunction with the puffs. Muslins, grenadines, etc., are particularly adapted for this style, as these are made with a border specially designed to carry out this effect. The fond of these dresses is white, covered with a small pattern, the border being always in keeping with the same, although more color and design is necessarily introduced into it.

Wheat-ears, flowers, imitations of guipure, even Oriental coloring, compose some of these borders. Alpaca has also become again a favorite material, and is made in all colors—sky-blue, green, violet, gray, and even pink. In the present age of fichus this will be found a most useful article of attire. Satin rolls or narrow gimps are much used as trimmings; uniform colors are universally adopted, no contrasts being considered comme il faut. Black silk is as much worn as ever, in spite of its somewhat triste appearance when in rivalry with the fabrics above-mentioned. It may be, however, enlivened with satin or silk trimmings of any color, this being the only deviation from the rule of contrasts. Paletots, and all fantastical fichus and scarfs, are equally fashionable; while a blouse or Garibaldi of the same material as the dress, or of white or colored muslin, is used to finish the double or simulated-double skirt. Pompadour costumes are not more coquettish than these skirts with a paletot, which, being puckered up at the sides, forms, as it were, an over-skirt. We have noticed a very elegant ball dress composed of gold-colored silk (poult de soie), the front and sides of which were opened to the knee to admit puffs of white tulle arranged in pyramidal form. Flounces of pleated tulle, beaded with a roll of white satin, formed the trimming round these so-called pyramids, and over the whole was thrown a skirt or veil of tulle. The hem of this was covered with a pleat of gold-colored satin ribbon, and trimmed round with a deep blonde, and a fringe composed of marabout feathers; the bodice and scarf trimmed to correspond. Another dress was made of tulle, with a deep-pleated flounce of the same material ascending the front breadth on either side, and forming a tablier, which was composed of similar flounces arranged horizontally. Rose-colored satin ribbon was twisted at intervals over the flounces, and the tablier was dotted over with rose-buds, which seemed invisibly to spring from the tufts of rose-colored satin ribbon. The sleeve is either altogether omitted, or, à la Pompadour, reaches to the elbow.

Bonnets are still composed of lappets of lace and tulle, crossed or fastened under the chin with brooches, flowers, or bows hanging over or under the arm, and fastened like a scarf at the back. Real mantillas or hats are better adapted for the sea-side and country, where they are more in keeping with the costumes adopted. Lace, flowers, and feathers are used in such profusion that the fond of the bonnet is a mere vehicle for the exposition of the same, which most frequently work their way into the plaits and curls of the wearer, through the very small size of this same fond. The diadem, composed of lace, puffs of tulle, flowers, jet, or metals, is the most approved style for the front of the so-called bonnet, while others consist of a mere funchon. The lappets certainly form a most graceful and elegant ornament, and the floating ribbons fastened under the hair behind add to the general effect. These frames for the face—if we may be permitted the expression—of illusion tulle, edged with light blonde, are highly advantageous to the wearer; the less we say on the score of durability the better. Every bonnet has its peculiar characteristics, according to the age and complexion of the wearer, and these depend principally on the arrangement of these lappets, ribbons, etc. Hats are made in all possible forms; no shape seems to be restricted by the arbitrators of fashion. These are also adorned with floating veils or lappets: one we have recently seen made of white chip, trimmed with a wreath of forget-me-nots, and finished with a veil of blue illusion tulle, suspended from behind. We believed the manufacture of artificial flowers to have reached the highest point of excellence, but lately many specimens, hitherto almost ignored in the ateliers, and passed over sneeringly by botanists, are being introduced. Butter-cups in the fullness of their yellow beauty, and thistles with very visible thorns, are among the latest and most approved novelties. Fruits and berries are also most artistically produced, and enrich the choice of ornaments wherewith to adorn bonnets, head-dresses, etc. Arranged in elegant guirlandes or sprays, they very much enhance the appearance of these articles of toilette. We must not omit to mention a branch of the hazel-nut, in all its beauty of color and form.

THE PICNIC.

See illustration on page 632.

PICNICS are in their infancy—to my mind; and I think I know them pretty well. To begin with, eighteen out of twenty are failures, for the sufficient reason that the people who are thrown together are ill-assorted.

A fair intimacy should be the common basis of meeting. The gathering is an undress one essentially. Sans gêne must be the mot d'ordre. Now the government of sans gêne is one of the most difficult and delicate matters in the world. How far it is removed from rudeness, from familiarity, from hail-fellow coarseness, it is not given to all to measure justly. The safe sans gêne is possible only in a company where all are well-bred. One dangerous individual spoils the day. Playfulness degenerates into buffoonery; the laughter becomes loud that should only sparkle and bubble. The neglect of this reflection is at the bottom of half the picnic failures which happen. A comic gentleman intrudes. A bon-vivant lives too well in the presence of the Champagne that lies in the ice-buckets, up to its knees in ferns. A prude finds fault with every thing. An audacious lady shocks the bishop. Your awkward visitor upsets the salad-mixture—for, alas! salad-mixtures have not yet been driven, as an abomination, out of the best-regulated picnics. Hysterics proceed from an over-sensitive damsel. There is the lady who is quite sure she can not sit upon the grass. It is barely possible to escape the pest who screams at the approach of a June-fly, and wants salts after the apparition of a caterpillar. Extravagance in dress is another danger. Fifty—and a very damaged fifty—shows up in a broad hat trimmed with forget-me-nots. A vivacious old gentleman will dance, and put out every quadrille; it is so witty to thrust your toe through half a dozen filmy flounces in one day. Above all, there is the officious man—and on rare occasions, the officious woman. The man disturbs all the appointed order of the proceedings, and seizes the command. A middle-aged nuisance always, he pesters the girls by flirting with them, gives the wrong wines with unflinching assiduity, and is the cheerful gâte-joie of the day. The provoking element in him is, that while he is rasping the temper of the company, he is in the seventh heaven of enjoyment himself. "Haven't we had a delightful day?" is his question to every body. "There has not been a single incident to mar our felicity. The Champagne was iced to a turn—and did you taste that pâté? Yes, I think I remember I had the pleasure of helping you myself. Miss Nimminy sang à ravir [without half a note in her voice]; and as for Miss Pimminy's 'Last Rose of Summer,' I could have kissed her—but don't, now mind you don't, tell her." He must see each lady into her carriage; instruct each coachman. I think there are some of these gad-flies who would run under the last carriage like dogs, if the treat could be arranged. The officious lady is not quite so bad—to the ladies; for I have remarked that ladies are not accustomed, in their most gushing moments, to pay too much attention to one another. The officious lady aspires to direct the dance upon the sward; to select the persons who shall be asked to sing; to decide the moment of breaking up; and to insist that the grass is damp, the air is chilly, this is proper, and that is improper. She is an exemplary person herself, who has obtained a reputation for being difficult to please in the trifling matter of a husband.

How to eliminate all the pests who have constituted themselves picnic presences from future picnics? Surely here is a question to which some sociable and sensible creature may address herself. Picnics are so popular that the art of arranging them has become one of social importance. The notion of etiquette in slippers is not a bad idea. The art of lying on the grass; of dispensing with knife or fork; of making yourself generally useful, with the air of one accustomed to be generally useless—is not to be mastered in an afternoon. As it has been long held a mark of special compliment to a man's manners and power of entertaining to ask him to breakfast, so it should be high flattery to bid him be merry in good company under the green-wood tree. More—there are advances in the art of dining with nothing between you and the pendent caterpillar, in a culinary direction. We now bring an incongruous company to dinner, to eat any thing and every thing in the open. The time will come when we shall know how to select a picnic company, so that there shall not be a hint of discord; and when that time shall be upon us, may picnic-givers have learned the art of composing a menu sous les feuilles, which shall be absolutely faultless.

Our illustration depicts a party of merry picnickers in the sweet summer time, lunching gayly on the grass in the cool shade; and in the heats of August the picture is refreshing. For the next few weeks the scene will be a familiar one throughout the length and breadth of the country.

SWEET May is over: Flora lays aside
Her soberer hues for her most gorgeous dress
Voluptuous June is in her radiant pride,
And all is perfume, smiles, and loveliness!

The homelier tints of spring forsake the skies;
Their simpler garb the woods and fields forget;
It banishes beauties and more flaunting dyes
They now display than white or violet.

The lime-trees' luscious bloom, the queenly rose,
Supplant the fainter odors of the thorn;
The subtle fragrance of the lilac flows
No more abroad upon the breath of morn.

If Modish Nature dons her brave array,
To dance, while Fashion pipes a frolic tune,
Who chides dear Woman, if she owns the sway
Of bright-winged Pleasure in delicious June?

Pie on the sour unkempt philosophy,
That makes on woman churlish, senseless war!
If Eden drooped without her, earth would be
A loveless waste, condemned to bloom no more!

Ten thousand nameless sweets and things of joy
She calls for man, or leads him where they grow:
Yet stay, sweet nymphs, nor think without alloy
Contentment waits on rich attire and show.

See you pale creature on her couch of pain!
Whence comes that languor wan, that hopeless gaze
Of blighted girlhood? She was justly vain
Of her young beauty once, in happier days!

But now she lies in ecstasy of grief
That she must die. Her life's fast-ebbing tides
Run daily weaker—as the sea, with brief
Impulse, flows back until it quite subsides.

She was a milliner of peerless skill,
A matchless judge of color, taste, and dress;
And in her dreams, poor soul, she ponders still Fresh miracles of stylish loveliness.

But in the city's world of din and smoke,
Night after night, for three long seasons, she
In stifling work-rooms toiled till daylight broke,
A very slave to fashion's tyranny!

Poor drooping girl! She made heroic stand—
Till (against disease still battling silently)
Consumption took her by the wasted hand,
And led her to her garret-home to die!

Vain as June is at its radiant height;
Fate, park, and garden claim their flaunting crowd:
Mark! to think that, in the angels' sight,
These fripperies may cost a woman's shroud!

BOUND TO JOHN COMPANY; OR, THE Adventures and Misadventures of Robert Ainsleigh.

CHAPTER III.

I AM CURIOUS ABOUT THE PAST.

THE time came when anxiety to know the story of my own birth grew keener than my interest in the day-dreams with which I was wont to beguile my hours of solitude. It was on this subject that I questioned Anthony Grimshaw as we sat together in the library one autumnal evening, when the wind blew hoarsely in the great oaks and beeches across the moat, and the wood-fire, burning on the low hearth, made a cheery glow in the spacious room, gleaming now on the brown and crimson binding of the books, now on the stout beams and carved oak bosses of the ceiling.

I was nineteen years of age, and older and graver than my years by reason of the monotony of my life and the gravity of my companions. It was not the first time I had questioned Anthony Grimshaw upon the subject of my own history.

"I think you know more than you choose to tell," I said.

"Nay, Robert, I know nothing. I may have my suspicions. But what good would it do for me to talk of such fancies? I might be but to mislead you. All I know is the Lady Barbara brought you here one winter's night in the first year of her marriage. She traveled in a post-chaise with only her maid—a Frenchwoman, whom she engaged on her marriage, my wife speaking no language but her own and being therefore unadapted for residence abroad with an ambassador's lady—leaving Sir Marcus in London, where he was busy with public matters, she said. You were a baby of less than a year old, and as sickly an infant as ever survived infancy. She sent for Martha, who had then been married to me but a few months, and told her that she meant to adopt the child, having Sir Marcus's permission for so doing; which well she might, seeing that she was an heiress and a beauty, and might have married much higher if she had so chosen."

"And she gave your wife no account of my birth?" I asked.

"None that I ever heard. But Martha Grimshaw can keep a secret. I know she has her suspicions, which jump with mine; and that's why she has not been as kind to you as I should have wished. There was a gentleman once lived in this house whose fate it was to carry mischief and misfortune with him wherever he went."

"Who was that gentleman?"

"Roderick Ainsleigh, the only son of my late lord's only sister, Lady Susan Somerton, and Colonel Ainsleigh, a brave soldier and a dissipated spendthrift, whom she married against the earl's wish, and with whom her life was most miserable. She died young, while the colonel was abroad with his regiment, leaving one only child but just nine years old. This was the boy Roderick.

Lord Hauteville brought him here directly after the mother's death; and the next post from the low countries brought home news that the colonel had been killed at the head of his regiment. He had ever been as reckless of his life as of his fortune, and had been oftener under fire than any other man of his age and standing. Thus you see the boy Roderick was doubly an orphan."

"Poor child!"

"'Tis natural you should pity him, lad; but that double bereavement was the most fortunate event in Roderick Ainsleigh's life. The earl, my late master, one of the noblest and best of men, had loved his only sister with extreme tenderness and devotion. Her death and the death of her husband threw the boy entirely into his uncle's hands. My lord loved the child at once for the mother's sake; and the boy's handsome face and winning manners did the rest. Those soft pleasing manners disguised as proud a heart as ever beat in human breast; but I think my lord loved the boy all the more for his daring spirit. It was only in after-years that he found how hard it is to govern a stubborn will, even when self-interest is at stake."

"Was the boy happy here?"

"He had reason to be; for if he had been the earl's son and heir he could not have fared better, or been treated with greater honor by all who lived in the house and all who came to it. I was his first schoolmaster, and taught him just as I have taught you. Often when you and I have been sitting side by side in yonder window—'twas on that very spot Roderick and I used to sit—I have fancied I was twenty years younger, and that 'twas Roderick Ainsleigh I was teaching. But he was neither so diligent nor so obedient a pupil as you, Robert. His mind was quick enough, and he would work hard enough sometimes, in his own impetuous way. But it was all by fits and starts—blow hot, blow cold. I had another pupil who very often shared Mr. Roderick's lessons, and that was Lady Barbara Somerton, my lord's only child; and it was not long before I discovered that the two young people loved each other with an affection that was something more than mere consensuality. Lord Hauteville liked to see them together, and was pleased to find his daughter desired to be wiser than most young women of her age. 'I would have thee as clever as Lady Mary Wortley, or Mrs. Montague, Bab,' he used to say. One day he broached the subject of the liking between his daughter and his nephew, and told me that nothing would please him better than to see his sister Susan's son master of Hauteville. 'I don't care to think of a stranger cutting down the old beeches, or clearing the plantations that you and I planned when we were boys together, Tony,' he said. 'And, tie up the estate as I may upon my daughter, I can't tie up every old tree and every footpath in the wood. And I like to think that the place will be the same for years to come, when my old bones are mouldering in the vault yonder, which it might if one of my own flesh and blood was master. A stranger has no feeling for old timber. Roderick ought to love every tree, for he has almost grown up in the park and woods.'"

"And was Mr. Roderick Ainsleigh very fond of his cousin?" I asked.

"He seemed to love her as dearly as she loved him; and I don't suppose it was all seeming. He went to college when he was nineteen, and I was proud to think that he knew more of the classics than most men of thirty, and would do wonders; but he got into a bad set at the University, and gave himself up to the wild pleasures of that place, which is within a ride of Newmarket, that infamous seminary of iniquity and ill-manners. Nothing but trouble ensued from Mr. Ainsleigh's residence at Cambridge. He incurred debts which would have been heavy had he been Lord Hauteville's sole heir, and my lord paid them, but not without protest and some ill blood between the uncle and nephew. His visits here were few and brief, and it was evident to all of us that Lady Barbara resented the evil courses into which he had fallen. When he came he brought with him college friends, wild young fellows, who attended all the fairs and races round about, lamed my lord's hacks and hunters, and turned the heads of half the servant-maids at Hauteville."

"He must have been a base ungrateful fellow!" I cried, indignantly.

"Ungrateful he most assuredly was. Whether he was by nature base, or only reckless and extravagant under the influence of ill advisers, I can not tell. As a lad I loved him dearly, in spite of his willfulness; but when I saw the unhappiness caused by his conduct as a young man, I was inclined to doubt whether he had ever been worthy of the affection we all lavished upon him. For four years things went on thus, with much trouble for the earl, of which he made no secret, and profound sorrow for Lady Barbara, who maintained a proud silence upon the subject of her grief, but whose despondency was but too obvious to all who loved her, except perhaps to the offender himself, whom she treated with a haughty distance which must have been to the last degree galling to that proud spirit. He for his part affected an indifference to her ill opinion, and even told me in confidence that, since his cousin had ceased to love him, he cared not a dot how badly she thought of him. I would fain have persuaded him that he was still beloved, but he laughed me to scorn. 'Why, she is kinder to her lap-dog than to me,' he cried; 'and when I have tried to entreat her pardon for my manifold iniquities, she has received my apologies with such black looks as speedily silenced me.' One day the storm, long threatened, burst in sudden fury. There was a desperate quarrel between Lord Hauteville and his nephew, in which my lord reproached Mr. Ainsleigh with his ingratitude, and reminded him of his dependence. Roderick Ainsleigh was the last of men to brook such humiliation. He boldly asserted his independence, and in proof thereof declared that he would never again owe a favor to the kinsman who had so degraded him. 'I would rather take the king's shilling than eat the bread of dependence,' he said; 'and I thank your lordship for reminding me that I have no right to the bounties I have enjoyed at your hands. I blame my own dullness for my having so long remained unconscious of my abject position, and am glad to be awakened to the truth, though the waking has been somewhat rough. For the past I must remain your debtor, and I confess the debt is a heavy one; happily the future is my own, and I can promise that it shall cost you but little.'"

"With this Mr. Ainsleigh flung himself out of the room with such an air of offended manhood that my lord confessed he felt himself the aggressor. 'He will come back, Tony,' he said to me, when his nephew had left Hauteville, which he did directly after the interview. 'Sure, he knows I love him as a son, and am but too weakly disposed to excuse his errors, nor can I think that he has ceased to love my little Barbara, though the two do not seem such fast friends as they once were.'"

"And did the young man come back?" I asked, deeply concerned.

"Never since that day has Roderick Ainsleigh crossed the threshold of this house. Whether he is living or dead none here can tell, though there is one who would, I doubt, be glad to know the truth. He went straight from here to Cambridge, and it came to my lord's ears by-and-by that he had lost money to his Newmarket friends, over and above the debts my master had paid, and was in some sort a defaulter. If he had come back I know he would have been received with open arms; but my lord was too proud to invite his return. He had left but a year when his uncle died. The title died with him, and Lady Barbara, as sole heiress, became mistress of the estate. When her mourning was over she went to London to visit the Honorable Mr. and Mrs. Davenant, relations of her mother; and while residing with them she married Sir Marcus Lestrangle, a widower of high family and small fortune, but of much political influence. She spent a few months here with her husband soon after their marriage, and then departed, to return no more except for that flying visit when you were brought hither."

"But was nothing more ever heard of Mr. Ainsleigh?"

"No further tidings of that misguided young man ever reached my ears, except one painful rumor, which connected the flight of a clergyman's daughter from her father's house near this place with the name of Roderick Ainsleigh. How justly I know not. Slander fattens upon the misdoings of the absent. The young man was not here to defend himself against these evil reports, and I doubt not they had some influence with his cousin, Lady Barbara."

"What was he like?" I asked. "I have seen no picture of him in the house."

"Ay, but his portrait was painted. It used to hang above this chimney-piece, but it was taken down and thrust away at my lord's desire when his nephew had been six months absent without any sign of repentance. 'Take that ungrateful boy's face from my sight,' he said; 'it haunts me like a bad dream.' Would you like to see Roderick Ainsleigh's face?"

"Yes, that I should, mightily."

The old man crossed the room and opened a cupboard in the wainscot beneath one of the windows.

"Light a candle, Robert," he called to me as he groped on his knees before the open cupboard.

I took a candle from the chimney-piece, and lighted it by the blaze of the wood-fire.

"Bring your light here!" he cried; and I went to him, and held the flickering candle before a frameless picture which he held upright upon a table near the window.

"'Tis a good twenty years since that has seen the light," he said, wiping the dust from the mildew-stained canvas.

It was the portrait of a man in the dawn of youth, a dark handsome face with a bright smile, but a look of indomitable pride in the eyes, which were black as a Spaniard's.

"Have you ever seen such a face as that, Robert?" asked my tutor.

"I can scarce tell," I answered, thoughtfully; "but the features seem familiar to me."

"Seem familiar; ay, lad, and so they must. Think again, Bob. Where have you seen that face?"

"In the glass!" I cried, with a great start. "Oh, for God's sake, Anthony Grimshaw, tell me the truth, if you can!—was Roderick Ainsleigh my father?"

"In good sooth, Robert, I can not tell. I have told you all that I know. But you and my late master's nephew are like as—I'll not say two drops of water, for there is little waterishness in your dispositions—you are like as two flames of fire."

CHAPTER IV.

I AM INTRODUCED TO MY BENEFACTRESS.

I MIGHT have brooded long on Anthony Grimshaw's strange revelation but for the rapid succession of events which followed within a short time of the conversation I have recorded.

After an enchanted sleep of nearly twenty years the castle in Hauteville woods suddenly awoke to life, and the monotonous calm of our existence was exchanged for all the stir and clamor which accompanies the sound of many voices, the tread of many feet, and the bustling industry of a full household.

It was upon a lovely evening in June that the spell which had so long held Hauteville Hall was suddenly broken. Not a word, not a whisper of rumor's busy tongue, had prepared my guardians or myself for the startling transformation. Anthony Grimshaw's indifference to the political events of his own time had kept him ignorant of ministerial changes at home, and of our diplomatic relations abroad, or he might have apprehended the possibility of Sir Marcus Lestrangle's recall from Madrid, where he had been our plenipotentiary for some years.

Mr. Grimshaw and I were walking on the terrace in the pleasant summer sunset, while my tutor's stern partner was occupied with her incessant needle-work by one of the windows of the oak parlor. Her sharp gray eyes watched us as we paced to and fro, and I doubt not it vexed her to see us in such friendly communion, as it most assuredly vexed her to find me impervious to the slights she put upon me, and indifferent to her ill-will. Again on this evening we talked of Roderick Ainsleigh, of whom I had indeed often spoken since I had seen the portrait hidden in the library-closet.

"Surely there can be little doubt of his death," I said, "or some tidings of him must have reached you in all these years."

"It would seem likely, unless he has gone to push his fortunes abroad, as he may have done, under a feigned name, perhaps. He was ever a rank Jacobite, and got himself into no little trouble here and at Cambridge on that score. It was his nature, or his humor, to oppose those who loved him; and as the earl was a staunch Hanoverian my young gentleman must needs toss off his wine to the king over the water. If he was living in '45 I would wager he was among the rebel crew that disturbed peaceful Englishmen in that year. He loved fighting and riot and intrigue, and would have refused to serve the best of rightful sovereigns if there was but a wrongful one to plot and fight for. I doubt there are always a number of these rebellious spirits, these innate revolutionaries, to create and foster rebellion. Few men ever have life's highway made so smooth and easy for them as it was made for Roderick Ainsleigh; but, you see, he preferred to scramble through brake and briar, and lose himself in a forest of guilt and sorrow."

"You speak of him bitterly."

"I can not well refrain from bitterness, though I loved the lad well, and took rare pride in his teaching. But he broke my old master's heart, and went near to break Lady Barbara's; for I doubt if all her fashion and grandeur at foreign courts have ever made her as happy as she was in the old days, when she and her cousin Roderick used to study the classics together, and stroll in the garden yonder on summer evenings."

"She must have been very beautiful in those days," I said, "if she was like her portrait in the picture-gallery."

"The portrait barely does justice to her features and complexion. But there was a sparkling brightness in her countenance which no painter could ever seize. It was such a changing face. A landscape in oils will give you the face of the country-side and the steady sunshine of a midsummer noon, but not the play and flicker of the light that comes and goes upon the meadows twenty times in a minute. She told her sorrow to no one when her cousin left Hauteville, but the changeful brightness of her beauty faded from that hour."

"Was the marriage with Sir Marcus Lestrangle a love-match?"

"I doubt it. The Somertons are not given to change, and I do not think Lady Barbara could so soon have forgotten her cousin. But she was alone in the world, and an heiress, and doubtless felt her unprotected position."

We talked some time longer of the house which my tutor had served so faithfully, and in the service whereof he hoped to end his days. The sun sloped westward behind a line of dense foliage that looked black against the vivid golden light. Patches of roseate brightness illumined the westward side of the great brown trunks of rugged elm and oak, and shone still brighter on the smooth silvery bark of the beeches. Belated crows sailed across the tender upper gray, making for their nests in the oldest elms. Thrush and blackbird sang their vesper-hymn, and pensive from some mysterious depth of foliage sounded the song of the nightingale. The distant water-pools reddened in the reddening sunlight, and the stillness and calm glory that belong to this one hour alone possessed our souls, as we stopped in silence to lean lazily upon the marble balustrade of the terrace and watch the sinking sun.

While we thus watched a sound so unfrequent as to be startling roused each from his reverie.

It was the sound of carriage-wheels—the wheels of not one only, but several vehicles. Anthony Grimshaw and I regarded each other in silent amazement, and then the old man hurried to the end of the terrace whence he could obtain a view of the broad graveled drive leading to the great gates.

I followed closely on his heels, to the full as eager as himself.

Three carriages were winding slowly up the hill; the foremost a handsome traveling-chariot with four horses, and smartly-dressed post-boys; the two others clumsier vehicles, each drawn by two horses.

"It must be Sir Marcus or my lady!" cried Anthony; "who else could come here with such a train? Run, boy! bid Martha have the doors opened, and the shutters in the library and saloon, and a fire lighted in the great hall, for it strikes deadly cold in summer-time. And tell Betty and Sue to stir themselves. The carriages will be at the gate in less than five minutes."

"I'll open the shutters with my own hands!" I cried, and ran off to the oak parlor, where I dashed open the half glass door, and burst into the room, to the horror of Martha Grimshaw.

"What now, you unmannerly creature?" she asked. I told her who was at hand. She start-el from her chair and stood before me deathly pale and trembling. Never had I seen her so affected.

"My lady!" she exclaimed. "It can't be."
"But it is, Mrs. Grimshaw. Who else should it be? There'll be wax-candles wanted for the saloon; 'twill be dark in half an hour. Shall I run and bid them open the gates?"

"Yes, yes," she answered, in a strange, absent way; and I left her still standing rooted to the ground, with a scared, pale face.

By this I perceived that there was one person in the world of whom the steward's wife stood in awe.

The bell in the Gothic archway sounded with a great clanging stroke as I ran to call the maids. Betty came flying to the gate, and Anthony Grimshaw appeared at the same moment with a ponderous bunch of keys, ready to perform his office of seneschal. Susan, the second maid, went with me to open the shutters of the great saloon. We lighted the wax-candles scattered here and there in crystal candelabra, and the feeble lights twinkled faintly in the dusky chamber. I went on to the library to open the shutters there, while Susan staid behind to kindle the logs on the wide stone hearth. I heard the sound of several voices, and the echoing tread of high heels on the marble floor of the hall; and then from the half open door of the library I saw Mr. Grimshaw usher the unexpected visitors into the saloon.

Two ladies and a gentleman followed him into the dimly lighted room. The ladies were so huddled and muffled that I saw but little of their faces. One was of a commanding figure, the other slender and graceful as the tall white lilies in the Italian garden. The elder lady sank into an arm chair, with a sigh of fatigue, and flung off her black silk hood. Yes, this was my Lady Barbara, as beautiful as the portrait with which I was so familiar, but of a more developed and regal beauty. Her dress was of a dark crimson brocade, her shoulders and arms veiled in a cloud of black lace. She wore powder, which became her admirably; and her full round throat, of marble whiteness, was encircled by a broad band of black velvet, clasped with a gem that seemed to emit a brighter flame than any of the tapers twinkling against the mirrors on the walls. Never, except in pictures, had I seen a woman of high rank, and for the moment the vision somewhat dazzled my unaccustomed eyes.

The younger lady also removed her hood, and I beheld a pale, fair face, framed by loose unpowdered auburn hair. Such pale and fragile loveliness showed poorly beside the blaze of Lady Barbara's beauty. But I felt rather than saw that this young lady was beautiful.

The gentleman yawned aloud, and leaned with a listless air against the carved-oak chimney, amusing himself by kicking the smouldering logs with the toe of his boot.

"Damp wood, and a room that feels like a vault; and, I conclude, very small probability of supper. You should really have written to apprise your people of your coming, Lady Barbara."

The speaker was a young man, tall, slim, good-looking, and dressed in a suit of cut velvet, with point-lace ruffles and cravat. He wore high riding-boots, and a court-sword dangled at his side. My only acquaintance with this species was derived from Pope's "Rape of the Lock," and this gentleman reminded me of Sir Plume.

"It was my humor to come unannounced," replied my lady, somewhat haughtily; and then she addressed her steward in a much sweeter tone. "You will not let us go to bed supperless, will you, Anthony?"

"Indeed, no, my lady; if a pair of chickens and a dish of broiled ham, with strawberries from the garden, and a bowl of cream from Betty's dairy, will content your ladyship—and this gentleman."

"Nothing could be better, my good Anthony. But you must not let our sudden arrival disturb you. We have brought two coach-loads of London servants, and all they want is to be shown the way to the kitchen, and the geography of larders, pantries, and still-rooms, which, I remember, is rather intricate at Hauteville. Sir Marcus will not be able to join us for a week. This lady is Miss Hemsley, my husband's niece; and this gentleman is my step-son, Mr. Everard Lestrangle. But where is Martha? I shall be glad to see her, and to settle what rooms we had best occupy."

Mrs. Grimshaw entered the saloon as her mistress spoke. She had changed her black stutf gown for one of stiff rustling silk, and wore a filled muslin handkerchief, fastened with a diamond brooch. Never before had I seen her so attired. She saluted her mistress with a profound courtesy, and bade her welcome to Hauteville.

My lady acknowledged her compliments somewhat coldly, as I thought.

"How is your charge, Martha?" she asked. "Your letters have been of the briefest, and gave me little news of him."

I knew it was of myself she spoke, and an irresistible impulse impelled me to approach her. There was a kindness in her tone which invited my confidence. "Here is a friend," I thought.

I had just lighted a pair of wax-candles, in heavy bronze candlesticks, which stood on a writing-table by the hearth. With these in my hands I entered the saloon, and carried them to the table by which Lady Barbara had seated herself.

"O God, a ghost!" she cried, half rising from her chair, and looking at me with wide-open eyes of horror and surprise; and then, looking back into her chair, she murmured, faintly, "You never told me he was so like. You should have prepared me for this, Martha."

"My father would scarcely feel flattered by your emotion, Madam," said Mr. Lestrangle, with a sneer.

"I have no secrets from your father, Sir," my lady answered, proudly; and the gentleman's sarcastic smile vanished as she looked at him.

"It is possible my jealousy is keener than my father's," he said, not without a certain significance of tone.

Lady Barbara turned from him with an air of supreme indifference, and addressed herself to me.

"Your face reminds me of the dead, Sir; but you are not less welcome to me. What is your name?"

"Robert, Madam."

"What else?"

"I have no other name, Madam."

"And you have never taken the pains to seek one?"

"No, Madam. When first I came to this house Mrs. Grimshaw told me I was nameless. I have asked no further questions."

I might have added that I had been reminded not once but twenty times a week of my abandoned condition, and that such epithets as fawning, beggar, castaway, and even coarser terms of reproach, were but too familiar to me.

"Indeed," cried my lady, with a glance at Mrs. Martha which boded ill for that personage. "Mrs. Grimshaw volunteered information upon a subject of which she knew little. She is fond of giving information." This was said with a most bitter emphasis; and then, turning to me with a sweet protecting smile, Lady Barbara continued: "Your name is Robert Ainsleigh, and you are my kinsman. I fear you have had a somewhat desolate boyhood in this deserted house; but I placed you in the care of my old friend Anthony, because I knew you would find in him a kind friend and an accomplished tutor."

"And I have found both, Madam," I answered, promptly; "as good a friend as a fatherless lad ever knew, as patient and learned a master as ever earned the affection of his pupil."

"I am glad to hear you speak so heartily," replied my lady. "While I remain at Hauteville you will live with me and my family, and it will be for yourself to determine your future career."

She extended her hand, and I dropped on my knee, as I raised the fair hand to my lips.

The gentleman lounging against the chimney-piece gave a little sarcastic laugh.

"Egad, Lady Barbara, your country cousin is a courtier by instinct. I warrant he will soon eat a toad with as good a grace as if he had hunted tufts at the University and graduated at the Cocoa Tree."

I wondered at so much animosity from a stranger, but it was my ill-fortune in life to find more than one bitter enemy ready-made like this, and to receive direct injuries from those I have never consciously offended.

LONDON CORRESPONDENCE.

WHATEVER credit other countries may attribute to us with regard to our artistic skill and talent as a nation, we are not a little proud of the perfection to which we consider we have attained, more especially in oil and water-color painting. The National Gallery, the Kensington Museum, and other institutions in London, contain many of our national chef-d'œuvres, which remain permanently there; but every season there are various exhibitions in London of these things, which are open for a few months only, and are very eagerly looked for and patronized. The principal of these is the Exhibition of the Royal Academy, which I propose to tell you about in another letter, and the New and Old Societies of Painters in Water-Colors. To give you some idea of what we are doing, in this branch of art, I will dwell a little on this New Society of Painters in Water-Colors. This is the thirty-fourth annual exhibition, and the collection this year is certainly above the average. It contains in all some three hundred works by different artists, among them J. W. Whymper, Henry Tidey, John Chase, J. H. Mole, Skinner Prout, H. and E. Warren, Louis Haghe, E. H. Corbould, M'Kewan, William Bennett, Benjamin Green, C. Callermote, H. B. Roberts, and others of equal celebrity.

Among the pictures which are most likely to attract public attention are Salome Dancing before Herod, by Edward Corbould; The First Bouquet, by C. Green; A Silver Wedding, by Louis Haghe; Seven A.M., by G. G. Kilburne; and The Woman of Samaria, by Henry Tidey.

Water-color paintings have arrived at a rare perfection; the coloring is so rich and full that, covered as they are with glass, you mistake them for oils. The greater part of the collection of which I am speaking consists of subjects taken from everyday English life. Now and then the rich old dresses of a few centuries back are called into play, and the peeps of scenery, landscapes, interiors, and old foreign scenes, are if possible more lovely than ever; but it is in everyday life our artists most excel. Ours is such a matter-of-fact age; romance is a thing of the past; art has now taken possession of the prosaic commonplace which most surround all of us, and casts the charm of poetry about them. The gems of the collection, however, are Edmund Warren's works. No words can give a fair idea of the exquisite beauty, warmth, and light which he contrives to throw into his pictures.

In these days, when the many vexed questions about woman's mission and woman's work are so rife among us, it is pleasant to notice with how much success women tread certain paths in the great labor market. The fair sex have sent a vast number of works of art to this New Society of Water-Colors, and of a high order, too.

Most of them are fruit and flower pieces, but there are many exceptions. Rosa Bonheur has sent a beautiful picture, Deer at Fontainebleau. Mrs. Elizabeth Murray's are all sketches of foreign life, rich in coloring; among them, Idleness, an Italian peasant; A Spanish Boker, in a Spanish dress, with castanets; and A Gipsy Forge at Seville, a large, ambitious picture, crowded with figures, and of great merit. A work of Mrs. Clarendon Smith's—The Little Blue Shoes—is so very touchingly conceived that it is sure to be a general favorite. It depicts a young and pretty woman seated at a cabinet, with the shoes in her hand. The verses best tell their story:

"O those little, those little blue shoes,
Those shoes that no little feet use;
O the price were high
That those shoes would buy,
Those little blue unused shoes."

But I must not longer linger on the many pretty pictures in this collection. There is plenty going on in England just now, and I must try and tell you a little of what we are doing. In another month the Parliamentary session will be over, and before it reassembles there must be a re-election—a re-election under the new Reform Bill, which will, it is thought, bring about greater changes than was anticipated when it was drawn up. A general election of this kind is a great event, and it forms now the one topic of conversation. The elections can not, however, come off until November or December. Meanwhile those now in power are giving princely entertainments. The new Foreign Office was inaugurated on Wednesday by a reception given by Lord Stanley. It was densely crowded, and the new building was greatly admired. It will now be at once used for the public service. You may remember that in one of my earlier letters I told you of a great reception given there by the Prime Minister some months ago; then it was only partly finished, and only a few of the rooms were thrown open. Improvements in our government offices are greatly needed, and this is a step quite in the right direction. The old ones are mostly dark, dingy, and inconvenient.

The Queen is now at Windsor. Last Saturday, the thirty-first anniversary of her accession, she held a review of some twenty-six thousand volunteers in the fine old park adjoining the castle. Grand stands were erected, and there was a large show of carriages; indeed, the greater part of the fashionable world in London were there. The weather was every thing that could be desired. There was perhaps more than the usual difficulty in getting the corps and the company up and down by train, and some of the former were so late in arriving that the review did not begin until five, instead of four.

There was a large number of the Royal family with the Queen, among them Prince and Princess Louis of Hesse (Princess Alice of England) and one of their children; they have just arrived from Germany for their yearly visit. Last year they came when the fêtes were going on for the Sultan of Turkey, and the Princess did the honors most gracefully. The review was purely a review and not a sham-fight. The Queen, as soon as she appeared on the ground in an open carriage drawn by four white horses, inspected the two lines, then all the corps marched past, and then a few evolutions were gone through, which soon became very vague and uncertain to spectators, inasmuch as the smoke enveloped every body in an impenetrable cloud.

This summer has been a most unprecedentedly fine one, and the consequence is that morning garden parties are the rage. Wherever a sufficiently large piece of ground can be found to play the game of croquet—never mind how great the difficulties—there people assemble to play it, their hosts providing them with tea, cakes, strawberries and cream, claret-cup and cider-cup ad libitum. It always seems such a pity to me that the many delicious drinks you have in America are not more general here.

The Queen has herself followed the fashion of garden parties, and on Monday a large sprinkling of the nobility assembled in the grounds of Buckingham Palace from four to half past seven. Two huge tents had been erected there, in one of which the Queen took up her position, accompanied by members of her family. Here the Tyrolean singers, who are quite the fashion now and appear in their national costume, performed.

In the other tent were refreshments, which were also laid out on the lower floor of the palace—the band of the Life Guards played also. The dresses were very magnificent; it was of course full morning dress with bonnets. The young girls wore mostly white muslins over colored silks; the gentlemen had to wear in dress-coats with morning dress, and appear in their stars and orders with a rather curious effect.

This week, too, there has been a wonderful morning fête given at the Wellington Barracks by the officers of the First and Second Battalion of the Grenadier Guards. Soldiers are famous for doing things well; but they really outdid themselves on this occasion. Apropos of royalty, I must tell you a curious fact, which is going the round of the papers now. The Controller of Her Majesty's household has £904 a year. In old days the holder of this office was entitled to the left wings of the fowls which appeared on the Royal table. This, however, has now been bought off by the payment of the odd £4.

G. A. Sala has just written the life of Lord Brougham. Since his death the public press has teemed with accounts of the great man's life and deeds.

English people feel they can not do enough for Longfellow. You have had our Dickens with you, and treated him nobly, and we would fain do the same by your great man. The honorary degree of the University of Cambridge was bestowed on him, and the public orator made a pun in the usual Latin speech, when asserting that poetry drew men from low cares ad Excelsiora—which brought down a torrent of cheers from the undergraduates.

The Crown Prince of Denmark is with us still, although it seems that the supposed intended marriage between him and our Princess Louise is not to be, the Prince being now formally engaged to the Princess Louise of Sweden. He received the B.C.L. degree at Oxford at the recent commemoration, and he is very warmly greeted indeed wherever he is seen driving about with his sister and her husband. To-morrow there is to be a grand fête at the Crystal Palace, Sydenham, in his honor, two concerts by the stars of the day, and some fire-works.

A very extraordinary trial is now in every body's mouth. A Mrs. Borradaile is suing a certain Madame Rachel, a well-known dealer in cosmetics, etc., by which she declares herself able to make her clients "beautiful forever" (this has now become a cant saying among us here), for money said to have been obtained under false pretenses—the false pretenses being that she was to marry Lord Ranelagh in consequence of her improved charms. A series of letters are brought into court, which the plaintiff seems to have supposed to have come from her aristocratic suitor. It is premature yet to pronounce any opinion thereon; but the letters are of so amatory a nature, and the trial altogether so personal and exciting, that it creates universal interest. It behooves one to be careful how he discusses these questions, for Risk Allah, who was last year tried for murder in the Belgian courts, and acquitted, has brought an action against the Daily Telegraph for a glibbed and exaggerated history of the trial (a most interesting history nevertheless), and the paper has had to pay heavy damages.

Lord Shrewsbury, one of our most puissant nobles, has passed away from us this last week, and his body has been lying in state at one of his country houses. On his death-bed the marriage service was performed between his daughter and Earl Brownlow. This would not, however, have been a valid marriage, so that the service has since been repeated. Who says we have passed the age of romance when such things are?

Prince Alfred has just arrived safely in England. ARDERN HOLL.

DRESS OF THE BRETON WOMEN.

THE dress of the women varies a good deal, but generally consists of a close fitting cloth bodice of some bright color, with sleeves of a different hue, both turned up and ornamented with cloth of a third color. A close cap or hood, sometimes violet, though often green, is the most common head-dress. To enter more into details—the dresses, so far as they possess any uniformity, consist of a very full skirt of dark cloth, and a wide apron with large pockets. The sleeve fits loosely to the arm, with turned-back cuffs and colored edges; the bodice is cut very low, and open in front with a broad stripe of colored embroidery or binding, and buttons only joined just at the waist, with a lacing of yellow cord. The chest is covered with a tight breastplate of cloth, also bound and embroidered. The different kinds of caps are endless. In many villages also the whole dress is of one color; in others the sleeves, body, and breastplate are carefully contrasted. The form of the collar varies with the cap. "Can a maid forget her ornaments?" applies to Brittany. Nearly every Breton girl wears a silver or gold cross tied round her neck with black velvet. Some of the better class of the girls eligible for marriage have several black velvet ribbons with bead ends streaming from under their caps. We may here advert to a custom round Josselin which, if practiced in English circles, would save a good deal of annoyance, and prevent much misunderstanding. It is this. The girls appear on fête days in red under-petticoats with white or yellow borders; the number of these denotes the portion which the father is willing to give his daughter; each white band, representing silver, signifies a hundred francs of rent, and each yellow band means gold, and stands for a thousand francs per year. Yellow was originally worn by the women when in mourning. At present, however, many wear black like the English; but still frequently in Lower Brittany women follow the funeral train of their husbands in caps died with saffron. Yellow stuffs have recently become rare in Brittany, and hence probably the change in the custom. Many of the old women wear a short head chain with a ring at the end fastened to their left shoulder, through which ring they stick their distaffs when working. Both the men and women when in full dress discard the sabots, or wooden shoes, of working days, and appear in neat black leather shoes with silver buckles.

GENTLEMAN'S FASHIONS.

See illustration on page 636.

THERE is little change as yet in the fashions. Those for summer only following the impulse set by the spring. Our engraving gives a general idea of the various styles of short coats worn: these and the over-coats being the only garments which offer much variety. Black continues to be worn on dress occasions. Numerous styles of light summer cloth are used for morning, walking, and business suits, chiefly in small designs. Fancy vests are striped, figured, or watered, and are bound with galloon to match, and trimmed with metal buttons. Short coats or vests always have fancy buttons, and are mostly stitched on the edge; though they may be bound with galloon of the same color. Vests of the same material as the pantaloons are stitched round the edge.

THE HOUSEHOLD ANGEL.

By FITZ HUGH LUDLOW.

CHAPTER X.

LILY swooned but for a moment, and that rather from the mental shock than the physical. When she revived the blood was streaming down her face, and her curls were dabbled in it; but her first thought was for her father, who seemed dead indeed. She could not see that he breathed, and he paid no heed to her imploring cries. "Perhaps he really needed it!" she thought, "and I have been a cruel girl and killed him." But listening closer she got a little grain of comfort by hearing his heart beat, and then his unconscious lips uttered a low sigh. She tried to rise that she might find her way to the low level of the brook and wet her handkerchief to bathe his head—never thinking of her own, from whose ugly cut the blood was still steadily running—her own, which ached only less than her heart. But she could not stand on her feet; she sank on her knees again, and as she felt herself growing fainter with every second she began to wonder whether this was not what she had heard of, like so many other terrible things, from the doctor—whether, all alone in the woods there, she was not going to bleed to death. The thought seemed curious rather than fearful. She had thought of dying much more than many adults—yet never with the morbidness of model-biography infants; she was not weary of the earth, but she had been accustomed to the idea of leaving it as only a journey to the home of Him who dearly loved little children. Now that her mother had left her, and the night's disappointment had weakened her hope of ever finding her again, she felt sure that her father would not linger long in a world which was empty of her, and lacking both of them her young tendrils were unclasped from support she had grown up by. So she thought of her bleeding to death without terror, and to the last gave the fullness of her solicitude to her father alone. "If I should die and papa should live," she asked herself—"and they found me lying beside him with this cut on my head, wouldn't they think that he'd killed me?" In this she drew again on her memory of horrors related by the doctor, who had talked over in her presence a murder-trial in which he had been called as an expert, when the accused was condemned on circumstantial evidence no stronger, though it was afterward found that the man beside whom he lay drunk in the morning had fallen instead of being struck during the night. "I could hardly be happy up in heaven with Jesus if I knew they were being cruel to dear papa for having killed me on earth," thought the little girl; "and even if they didn't kill him he would kill himself if he woke up and thought he'd killed his little Lily. But you didn't kill me, darling; I fell and hurt my head on a stone, and if every body hadn't been cruel to you and broken your heart, you never would have laid your hand on me except to pet me, for you always loved me, even when you were sickest and saddest, darling, didn't you? But they sha'n't think you killed me—and you sha'n't think so either if you ever wake up again, lovely papa. I'll go away, and lie down a good way off, and when they find me they'll say I fell and cut myself."

This train of reasoning passed much more rapidly through her mind than I can write it, but not so fast as the blood flowed and her strength ebbed with it. She felt that she must act quickly. Holding her handkerchief to stay the stream lest it should drop from her face upon her father's, she pressed one parting kiss on the dear lips which had never uttered one word now left in her memory except heavenly tenderness—said "Good-by, darling papa!" and summoning all the life that remained in her began creeping slowly away on her hands and knees. If she had strength to reach a clump of elders growing just where the banks narrowed below the pool—if her sight held out to crawl around it she would be on a smooth, grassy hill, and could easily slide down it to the meadow-level of the brook, where the woods were cleared away, and she could die in the moonlight. This was all she asked for herself—it would be pleasanter to look up into the shining sky and "see the chariot coming," than to fall asleep on that rock under the dark branches.

She had almost reached the clump of elders, and was on the narrowest part of the ledge between the thicket and the brink, when the moonlight went from her eyes like a blown-out candle—her little elbows bent under her, and without a pang or a cry she rolled over the rocky wall.

The road from Owlville to Hawke's Bluff is a poor and little frequented one. It runs through one of the most thinly-settled portions of Kentucky, over a succession of sterile, gravelly hills, which seem to have been dropped during the drift period for the especial purpose of keeping before the eyes of the settlers in the adjacent districts of the Cumberland Valley a contrast which shall teach them how much they have to be thankful for. From the top of the series a traveler looks on every side into boundless meadows of inexhaustible fertility, and vineyards which, with Old World management, might put Burgundy to shame. Yet the tract itself raises barely enough corn to keep from starvation the lean pigs of such unfortunate white trash as impecuniosity has driven to settle here, and in former times these gentry (the two-legged ones, I mean) had the reputation of eking out their incomes by other than the obviously unremunerative pursuits of agricultural and pastoral life. Some of them, as good judges of horse-flesh, reached a lofty position, in the days when misplaced affection for a neighbor's livestock brought people in Kentucky to the top limbs of cottonwoods. Others exhibited a degree of artistic taste in the engraving line, which, but for the unfortunate circumstance of their having no connection with any recognized bank-note company, would have elected them to another American academy than the sort in which demission of one's membership is only possible after a term of years. Still others were in the occasional habit of detaining travelers longer than was necessary for a good look at the scenery in hollows between hills whose summits would have afforded a much better view, and charging them heavily for the privilege with a horse-pistol to enforce the claim. These industrious citizens, in spite of occasional thinnings made in their number by Justice Lynch and the Courts of Assize, had contrived to give their district, geographically known as Hog Scramble, a moral name of so much worse odor than that at the date of this recital few people ever used the particularly bad road between Owlville and Hawke's Bluff unless compelled by absolute necessity. Until two years previous such a necessity had existed in the fact that Hawke's Bluff Landing was the point nearest to Owlville at which steamboats touched on the Cumberland River. Now, however, an excellent turnpike turned the cold shoulder on Hog Scramble, giving the Owlville people a passage to the river at Bennettsburgh, nearly five miles shorter, and at this new riparian town most of the boats touched as well as at Hawke's Bluff.

So unusual was it now for any one to travel the Hog Scramble road at all—so unusual, unless with large escort, in the night—that the sight of a double buggy upon that road with but a pair of occupants at three o'clock of a full moonlight morning would have surprised any one from Owlville had such been awake and there to see. If he had, he would have seen it but a few minutes later than the conclusion of my last chapter.

The driver of the vehicle was a fine-looking man, about thirty-five years old—of Spanish complexion, hair and eyes, with a drooping mustache, magnificent in shape and size, and a broad-brimmed slouch, which threw his face into such deep shadow that only his next neighbor could have recognized him even in this bright moonlight. By his side sat a pretty boy, whom, but for the fact that his cheeks showed not even the faintest prophetic down of manhood, you would have pronounced twenty or thereabout. His golden hair waved German-student on his neck, bright and glossy as a woman's. Unlike his companion's negligé style of attire in every thing but a slouch, which was, in its smaller size, the other's counterpart, his dress was a velvet jockey-suit of the most recherché cut; he wore dandified little boots of patent-leather, a Roman scarf pinned with a gold horse-shoe, whose nails were brilliant, and an elaborate watch-chain, imitating in the same metal as the pin the whip of a master of the hounds. His large blue eyes, faultlessly regular features, exquisite teeth, and dazzling complexion made him one of those men who hourly escape affront by not hearing people say, "He's pretty enough for a girl," and he was just saved from weak effeminacy by the expression of his eyes and mouth.—The former, though amiable and confiding, wore a profound thoughtfulness which bordered settled melancholy, and the latter a sadness and firm purpose almost stern.

Some Genius, either with the view of keeping easily discouraged natures off the Hog Scramble road by adding another to its long list of disagreeables, which should halt them and give them one last chance to reflect before they risked their patience, their pockets, and their persons by its further pursuit, or of stimulating antagonistic minds to enter it by an additional obstacle to overcome, had erected a toll-gate on it about a mile out of Owlville.

Here the driver stopped his buggy, and by repeated yells of "Halloo, the house!" succeeded in resuscitating, sufficiently to open the gate, a shock-headed cider-drunkard of advanced years, who waddled out, bringing with him the peculiar sour, bung-holey atmosphere of his class, and grumbled for five minutes, while he was making change, at the willful eccentricity which had led one man in particular to disturb another who was nice and drunk in bed, or any man in general to select the Hog Scramble road for a pleasure drive at three o'clock in the morning.

"What the devil," hiccupped old Suggs, "err you doin' out here this time? Didn't know any o' them Hog Scramble folks ever took no medicine except a raw-hemp neck-poulter!" Joe Gooch's wife goin' to have another young un?"

"This young friend of mine wants to reach the early boat that don't stop at Bennettsburgh. Going to take him over to Hawke's Bluff—that's all," answered the driver, politely. "Never mind the change—in a hurry—good-night, Suggs. Cheer up! lasses, g' long!" and the buggy was out of sight while the bung-holey atmosphere still lingered round the gate.

"Damn his old bleary eyes!" ejaculated the driver, in a tone of vexation. "He knew me!" "I was surprised you told him where we were going," said the other, in a low, soft voice.

"Wouldn't have done any good to lie to him. He never's drunk enough not to find out every body else's business, and as he always takes for granted people are lying to him, the surest way of throwing him off the scent is to tell him the truth. Ten to one he thinks we're going up to a notorious horse-thief's—that Joe Gooch he spoke of—to make a cheap bargain for some extra fine animal he can't warrant title for; and even if he believes us in this case, I don't care—we'll be in New Orleans before any body thinks of coming this way to look for us. By Heavens, that Hawke's Bluff idea was a good one, darling!"

And bending over, the driver pressed his lips upon those of his girlish-looking comrade.

"Were you cold sitting all day in that dark cellar under the old Roost?" he continued.

"No; these clothes keep me warmer than the dress that's natural to me. I was more afraid than cold; my teeth chattered every time I heard a ring at your bell."

"No reason for fear. Old Polly's been a servant in the Dalmager family since she was born. She's mum as death; besides, she really thinks you're a boy run away from a cruel schoolmaster, and is as much enlisted as I am in the idea of taking you home to your only surviving friend. Oh, my beauty! How well you look in that suit, though! I declare I hadn't any idea that even a New York tailor could make one to fit you so, and send it by express, without ever setting eyes on you, just by a measure you took yourself! I shall be almost tempted to have you wear it occasionally after we get to Paris. It would be the very thing for the Carnival Bal Masqué, though I'm afraid that before morning I should be slitting somebody's weasand out of pure jealousy, if I ever let you enter the Grand Opera coulisses in that tempting Epicene raiment!"

"Oh, darling Derrick! don't be afraid of that. I wouldn't for the world go to a ball in these things. I never want to see them again as long as I live after I get beyond the necessity of wearing them. I want to forget every thing but you that belongs to this terrible hour."

The young comrade shuddered, and clinging to the driver's free arm, buried in his bosom the golden head that looked so girlish, with a sigh that came from the heart's very bottom.

"Do forget then, sweet love! By to-morrow morning every association which could recall the bitter past will be many a mile behind. Other earth and trees, other waters—all except the sky itself will be changed. The bitter servitude of an unworthy marriage—contact with a nature that is like moonshine, and milk, and ice will no longer make life one long, dull, dead pain to my darling's pure wine, and honey, and fire. A new heaven and a new earth will be yours, beautiful, beautiful one! My heart seems lifted up on wings when I think that I am the sun that warms it; my love the air that gives it breath."

Again he clasped his comrade passionately to his bosom, while the strong, fleet bays, regardless of the rocky road, struck fire at every stride from their well-shod hoofs.

"And how long will it take us to reach Paris?" again spoke the low, soft voice eagerly.

"To-morrow at eight o'clock we shall be on board the Blue-Grass Belle. She has no cargo to take in (I have had full inquiries made for me of her New Orleans consignees) after she reaches Dufton; so to-morrow afternoon we will be beyond the danger of any acquaintance coming on board. Till then you will have to look at our beautiful river from your state-room windows; after that, if no one does come (and may the acquaintance who does be blown up the next time he goes down the river!), we'll have the whole boat to ourselves. It don't touch land at all on the Ohio or the Mississippi. We'll stop in New Orleans only long enough for you to change back into the dress that belongs to you and provide the trifling outfit necessary for the sea voyage—nobody of course thinks of buying clothes when he's going straight to Paris. A week from to-morrow the regular New York steamer sails, calling at Havana. We stop there instead of going on to New York—have a delightful fortnight among the palms and oranges, with time enough to see all there is to see on the entire island, and avoid the risk of meeting any body we know (and such people are always turning up if you especially don't want them!), which we would run if we went on to New York. Twice a month a steamer leaves Havana for Havre—we take that and twelve days land us in the Champs Elysées. Let's see—one, two, four, six—yes! in less than six weeks we shall be at home—at home, darling! in our cozy little appartemens, with your boudoir furnished à ravir, our trim little maid and valet, our gray, respectable old concierge tolling his keys solemnly than the bell of any Yankee meeting-house, our charming little déjeuners à la carte at eleven o'clock, and you in your lovely morning robe fresh as a rose, pouring the coffee; our rides in the Bois, our joyous evenings at the Opera, our sunny mornings at Versailles, our sweet days and nights—yes! our whole lives long with each other—all in heavenly Paris—genuine yet poetic as if just stepped out from one of Meissonier's frames or Dumas's pages!"

"Our whole lives long with each other."

So spoke the eloquent driver; and there was no voice to say,

"Et après?"

"Dost like the picture, my beautiful Pauline?"

She only answered by looking into his face with one of those glances which would have betrayed the woman had her masculine disguise been even a greater miracle of the tailor than it was, and worn with the aplomb of a Mrs. John Wood or a Dejazet. One of those glances which none but a woman gives, and only a woman can give. A glance of such utter absorption in the object looked at—such happy, tyrannous subjection of self to another—such unreserved giving away of self, soul and body, life that now is and that which is to come, to be loved and led, cherished and used for all times and purposes, even if to be trampled on and slain shall befall the giver. A glance of surrendered will and partaken destiny, of unquestioning worship, of immeasurable peace, of faith without flaw—of woman's love! Such a glance as must make any man shudder if he have not fathomed his own heart well and seen, not that he has the same thing to give back, for that man has not, but that in all that heart there is nothing he will not give. A glance that makes its receiver responsible for treasure beggaring a kingdom.

"PUNISHED! O GOD, PUNISHED!"

Derrick saw it and did not tremble: for, right or wrong, however wicked he might be to others in being true to her, he knew that he gave her all the love a woman's heart could ask. Passionately he caught her to his breast and kissed her again and again.

Then he resumed the conversation, telling her of the arrangements he had made to sell all his property in Kentucky, and have the funded proceeds sent to him in Paris—of his determination to make that his permanent home, and never to return to America any more.

"It will be like what Mr. Pulpduster talks about, dear," said he, laughingly; "we shall be born again! We shall begin a life as new as if we had come into another world. I long for it so! My past has been so terribly, bitterly lonely. I never cared to live from day to day till I knew you, and now 'my life is to me more dear because 'tis dear to some one else!' Six weeks more, and we shall forget that there ever was a time when we were not each other's. O God! the days before I knew that you could be taught to love me—and saw that oat kissing you like a great, meek, slobber-chapped boy kissing his aunt, while I was burning if I touched your finger-tips—I'll forget them! Sweet, sweet! It's like a heavenly dream to think they're past forever, and the bliss I waited for so long is right at my lips—never, never to be taken away, by night or day, any more!"

In a rapturous delirium the lovely creature lay with her head on her lover's breast, and for a mile they rode silently through the moonlight, feeling it heaven simply to be near each other—to touch each other and thrill all through without one rude, inadequate syllable of human speech to break the spell.

Descending into a green valley—the first fertile strip they had crossed since beginning to climb the arid hills—a beautiful brook appeared across their way, running out of a chain of dense woods on a hill about a furlong to the right. As the chant of its waters came chiming into their sweet reverie, the lover's dreamer was aroused, and asked what stream it was.

"It is the last of the old associations we have to break away from," answered Derrick. "I'm sorry we couldn't have passed it without your knowing—it's Garnet Run."

"What—here!" cried his companion, in a startled tone.

"Oh yes. This road makes steadily toward the brook from the time we leave Owlville; when we cross it we're not a mile from the old house we bid our last good-by to yesterday morning. That fringe of woods that shuts the horizon up there is part of the Dalmager demesne. 'The Pool' is only a few rods inside its edge. The Run must be fed by some new springs up there, I think, for immediately after it issues from that narrow chasm below the basin it becomes quite a deep, smooth stream, very different from the brawler it is above; and with the exception of this one rocky ledge across it where you hear the water singing right by the bridge, it remains a steady little river down its whole course till it empties into the Cumberland. It's very rapid, but so even that, when I was a boy, I often used to make a raft of old posts and sail all the way from our woods to this bridge without once bumping bottom."

The beautiful eyes grew sadder as they drew nearer the stream, and seemed fascinated so that they could not withdraw themselves. As the horses' hoofs struck the bridge, Derrick divined his companion's thoughts, and called his horses to "come up," that he might hurry her out of the brook's painful presence. But suddenly—lying wedged in between the bank and the cattle-gate that swung from the bridge's floor to the surface of the water—a strange white object at once caught the eyes of both, and, with a cry of terror, the lady seized her lover's arm.

"Oh, stop! stop!" she implored him. "What is that? See—for God's sake, dear Derrick, stop and see!"

He reined his horses and looked across the bridge-rail. The bank shelved over the water, and the recess beneath it, further obscured by the gate-boards, was so dark that, with the moonlight reflection from the surface of the stream throwing a dazzling cross-light into his eyes, he could but dimly get the outline of the object.

"I should think," said Derrick, after a moment's pause, "from the looks and the likelihoods, that it was one of my lambs drowned in the Run. They often get in from the woods, trying to leap the Pool. I shall have to fence that Pool!—well, that is, my successor had better. Poor little thing!"

"No! Look, Derrick! That white's not fleece! it's too long—see it ripple up and down with the stream—it's a garment of some sort. Oh, Derrick, it's a dress! My God, it's a child's dress!"

They leaped from the buggy as far as they could, pale as snow—their hearts leaped into their throats and stood pulseless.

"Yes," spoke Derrick, presently, with a tremor in even his deep bass voice—"yes, I believe you're right; it's a child!"

He leaped from the carriage and fastened his horse to the bridge-rail, Mrs. Kearney following him before he could return to help her down. They clambered over the fence at the road-side and ran to the water's edge. Derrick, holding on by the end of the gate, swung himself over the in-shelving bank and caught at the white object which lay fluttering in the ripples to find it what they had thought. Then he stretched himself out prone, and, looking under the bank, saw—O God! what a sight for him!

With her little face white as her garment, but lying quite out of water on a broad, smooth stone—with a little crimson thread oozing from an ugly gash near the temple, and the waist of her dress caught on a splintered branch projecting from a floating biller of drift-wood, wedged between the bank and the gate—lay Lily Kearney.

"What is it? Oh, Derrick, quick—I am going wild with fear! What is it?"

There was no time to prepare her mind for the answer. Tactless and tactful alike: the most merciful hearted lover, unless, like Christ, he held the keys of death, the most ensanguined assassin, and the most besotted boor must have found themselves on the same level of helplessness before the problem of breaking this news. Must have done so, with a groan of speechless agony, Derrick did—pulling out the little drowned lamb that was not of his fold, and laying her down on the meadow grass at her poor mother's feet.

The wretched woman uttered the piercing shriek that has gone up, rending all ears and hearts since Eve and Abel—the cry that makes the whole earth Raina—and fell, soul-stricken, dead as her child.

But such sorrow can not really die. A little uneasiness in an involuntary muscle, a little laceration of some tiny vessel, a little disorder in an insensible gland—to these death is granted—quick, certain, merciful. But the greatest agonies of life—pangs contrasted with which the rack were a bed of down—to these come no boon of extinction; their only respite is a moment's unconsciousness with a tenfold awful waking; and they even seem to confer on the sufferer the Kehama gift of an inexorable vitality. So, almost before Derrick could sprinkle on her face a handful of water from the Run, the poor mother revived to her unbearable punishment. Who but a mother's self shall paint, or reading, understand, the torture which she felt as she sat pressing her pale, broken Lily to her breast, rocking to and fro, and moaning:

"Punished! O God, punished! My lamb is dead, and I have killed her!"

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

SOME general items respecting the graduating class of Yale College may be of interest, even to our lady readers. From the College Courier we learn that the total height of the 106 men who graduated is 607 feet 4-56 inches. The average height is 5 feet 8-76 inches. The tallest man is 6 feet 1 inch. Three others measure within half an inch. The shortest man is 5 feet 34 inches. The whole class weighs 15,152 pounds; average, 143 pounds. Aggregate age, 2394 years, 6 months, 17 days; average, 22 years, 4 months, 17 days. The oldest graduate is 29 years, 8 months; the youngest 19 years. In regard to professions elect, the record stands thus: Law 32, theology 18, business 13, medicine 5, teachers 3, civil engineers 2, editors 2, fruit-grower 1, undecided 30. Twenty-four expect to teach during the first year out. As to personal appearance, the descriptions given relate chiefly to the color of the hair, and the style in which the mustache—if any—is worn. Seven, however, wear eye-glasses, and three wear spectacles, which record speaks well for the eye-sight of the majority. And lastly, quoting from the matrimonial statistics, we find that the number engaged is 19; once engaged, but not now, 2; engaged to three girls, 1; engaged to two girls, 3; arrangements not quite completed, 21; not reciprocated, 7; unsuccessful, 4; indifferent, 5; vow of celibacy, 3. Several "not accounted for" remaining, the inference is that they are "in the market," it being Leap-Year.

Among the accidents which occurred on the Fourth, one of peculiar sadness took place at Sanbornston Bridge, New Hampshire. A little girl, five years old, was firing India-crackers in company with some other children, when her clothing took fire, and before assistance could be rendered she was so badly injured that, after three hours of intense suffering, she died. She was an interesting child, and the event cast a gloom over the entire village where she lived.

The sudden death of Mr. Vassar, the generous founder of Vassar College at Poughkeepsie, overshadowed the usually joyous exercises of Commencement Day. He died at the college, while attending the annual meeting of the board of trustees, even while he himself was addressing them. He has left a beautiful monument to his memory in the college for young women which bears his name, and which is admirably organized and managed. Previous to Mr. Vassar's death $500,000 had been placed in the hands of the trustees to enable them to carry out the designs of the founder. An additional sum is left to the college in his will of not less than $325,000, of which $50,000 is to constitute a "Lecture Fund," for the employment of celebrated lecturers not connected with the faculty; $50,000 for an "Auxiliary Fund," to aid indigent young women in their education; $50,000 is to be a "Library, Art, and Cabinet Fund;" $75,000 to pay a bond given by the trustees; the residue of his estate, or about $100,000, a fund for the improvement of the buildings and grounds.

"All sorts and patterns of good girls and pleasant women," remarks a recent writer, as a sort of apology, after having lashed the whole sex unmercifully, "are very dear and delightful; but the pearl of great price is the thoroughly natural and unaffected woman—that is, the woman who is truthful to her core, and who would as little condescend to act a pretense as she would dare to tell a lie."

The cubic contents of St. Paul's Cathedral are, in round numbers, 5,000,000 feet, the edifice itself containing 2,000,000 feet. This vast edifice is thoroughly warmed by the use of the Gurney stoves, thirteen of which are placed in the crypt, and have large gratings over them through which the warm air ascends, while others are provided with downcasts for the cold descending current to be warmed. The average cost of the fuel consumed during the winter months is not more than five English shillings per week. There is seldom a variation of more than 20° Fahrenheit in any part of the Cathedral, the average temperature being about 54°.

The "freak of nature" recently described in a Wisconsin paper as "roses in full blossom on an apple-tree," inspired an Eastern farmer to search his apple-trees for roses, and he found a couple, as he thought, one of which he sent to the editor of the New Bedford Mercury, in proof of the fact. The editor whereupon remarks: "We believe it is just as much a rose as the one of Western growth, and that both are fine specimens of a double apple-blossom."

A great sale of autograph manuscripts of Sir Walter Scott's novels and poems is announced to take place soon in London. There are also proof-sheets of many of the novels, and about eighty notes, written on business during the progress of the works through the press. The proof-sheets are curious, for on them Sir Walter made his corrections and alterations. He wrote rapidly and carelessly, trusting to revising, when the proof was before him.

A submarine lamp has been invented in France, which consists merely of a common oil-lamp, supplied with compressed oxygen from a reservoir at the bottom. During a recent experiment a diver kept one under water twenty-five minutes, and the light was so powerful that he could distinctly see to write with a diamond on glass within a radius of six feet.

An Indian paper gives an account of a "suttee case" which has recently occurred. A woman living in the Cawnpore district received tidings of the death of her husband, a Brahmin, at Mhow. She showed great emotion, and soon announced her intention of sacrificing herself. The Pundit of the family being sent for, advised the test to be applied—viz., that her hand should be placed over a lighted lamp to see if she could bear the pain. The lamp was brought, the widow herself placed her hand over the flame, and kept it there until it was blackened and blistered, declaring that she felt no pain; she was then declared worthy to perform the sacrifice. The next morning some of the family started with the widow for Bithoor, for the purpose of performing funeral rites for the deceased husband. On arriving at the field the "suttee" mounted the pyre, and gave instructions that her son should set fire to it. This son, a youth of about eighteen years of age, fired the grass. On the flames rising, the "suttee" half rose from her sitting posture, on seeing which the spectators murmured in dissatisfaction, but the woman immediately resumed her seat, and signed with her hand that she had no intention of evading the sacrifice. Shortly after some of the by-standers threw on more wood, the flames rose and surrounded the victim, and the sacrifice was consummated. The spectators then brought flowers and offerings of various kinds, threw them on the embers, and dispersed. The district superintendent subsequently arrested all who took part in this sacrifice, except the chief offender, the widow's son, who escaped from the district.

The following "item" is going the rounds: "A lady in New York, not long since, received a visit from a friend, who, in the course of a conversation, remarked, 'What a beautiful carpet you have!' The lady having heard 'Brussels' used in connection with handsome carpets, supposed it to be the maker's name, and replied, 'Yes, it is one Mr. Brussels has just sent up!' Very likely this is entirely true; but, true or false, it will be extensively quoted as proof that New York ladies know very little. But here is another "item" which matches it, and should go along with it. A week or two ago a party of richly-dressed ladies, accompanied by a stylish young gentleman, were strolling through the Academy of Design. While standing in front of one of the pictures, one of the ladies referred to her catalogue and said, 'This is 'Helen on the Walls of Troy.' 'Yes,' remarked the young gentleman, 'that is near Albany, I believe!' To go back, however, to Brussels carpets. It is pretty generally understood that this kind of carpet derives its name from Brussels, the capital of Belgium, which place is also celebrated for the manufacture of lace, looking-glasses, carriages, and many other commodities. Brussels carpets, however, are manufactured in many places—in France, England, Scotland, and America. They are made upon a ground of linen web, which is concealed by worsted threads interlaced with it. These threads are usually of five different colors; in weaving these run the length of the web, and the pattern is formed by bringing to the surface rows of loops of the desired colors. A round wire is passed through these loops until they are made firm. Four colors always lie beneath the one that appears on the surface, and thus the carpet is thick and heavy. The Wilton carpet differs from the Brussels in having the loops cut before the wire is removed, thus giving it a velvety appearance. Various methods have been devised to simplify the processes of making Brussels carpets. Sometimes threads are dyed in colors, in the succession they are required; sometimes the carpet is woven plain, and printed with rollers afterward. But, of course, these varieties are far less durable than the genuine Brussels.

Green wall-paper is believed to be very injurious from the arsenic used in making it. A scientific journal says: "We have analyzed wall-papers which contained from ten to fifty grains of arsenic to every square foot."

"Poor Humanity," a novel by the author of "Christie's Faith," and other entertaining works of fiction, has been dramatized in London. The art of compressing a lengthy novel into the space occupied by an ordinary drama is not an easy one; but if the result in this instance does not satisfy the critic, it appears to suit the ordinary play-goer. There are plenty of striking scenes, and each act is worked up to an effective climax. The dialogue of the novel has, when practicable, been transferred bodily to the drama. The play has been warmly received at Surrey Theatre.

When Willie tumbles off a chair and bumps his head the first thing mamma does is to ask him where he is hurt, and the second is to hush his crying. Now, it is seldom of any use, in the first moment, to ask for the hurt spot—the longer the child is telling where it is the harder he cries. And a French physician writes a long dissertation upon the advantages of groaning and crying in general, by which performances, he assures us, nature allays anguish. Therefore the crying of children when in physical or mental pain should not be so much deplored by parents, nor systematically repressed, since it is a natural relief to the nervous system. Parents and friends may be more indulgent to noisy bursts of grief if they regard the eyes and mouth as safety-valves.

It is asserted that the fine green leaves of the red raspberry, gathered in a fair day, and cured in an open room, are not inferior to the China teas; and, furthermore, if they are shipped to China and back, that they will be superior.

The Sultan's emeralds are said to be the largest in the world—one weighs 1050 drachms. The pearls in the imperial treasury are unique in form, and some are as large as pigeon's eggs. One of them, shaped like a pear, and white as snow, is no less than two centimetres in thickness. Among the rich jewels of great value is a brooch, ornamented with 280 large brilliants.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

YEARLY SUBSCRIBER.—One of our best furnishing houses is making a specialty this season of calico morning dresses that are sold at $4 50 and $5 when completed. Such as you allude to are made sacque-shaped, the body and skirt in one, with a sloped seam down the centre of the back and under each arm. Coat-sleeves and turn-down collar. Pearl buttons down the front. Pockets with flaps slit downward. Bind the skirt with braid that has been well shrunk. Bias hems and facings are seldom well ironed, and the plain binding is quite sufficient on thick calico. A band of striped calico of the color of the figure in the dress will serve for trimming, or a wide braid of white mixed with a color. Border the sleeves top and bottom, also the collar, pockets, and belt. Fasten the belt permanently at the back, making a pointed lap in front buttoned with two buttons.

Cut the plaid muslin as a sacque by the same pattern as the calico, but half a yard or three-quarters shorter in the skirt. Finish out the length with a wide flounce with a three-inch hem at the bottom, and a ruffle at the top edge gathered by a cord. Trim the coat-sleeve with a ruffle or with cambric edging. Be careful that the shoulder seams are not very long. The trimming at the top of the sleeves makes the shoulders appear broad enough. Long shoulder seams are uncomfortable and unfashionable. Wear a colored belt and large ribbon bow at the throat. If your neck is short and fair cut the dress very low in the neck, and wear a black velvet ribbon tied at the back with long ends or clasped with a locket in front. Caution your landlady against putting too much starch in your muslin.

COMMON SENSE.—It is not "a vulgar error to suppose that plants are unwholesome in a room at night and wholesome by day." This, on the contrary, is a scientific fact, which is thus explained: Plants in the daytime purify the atmosphere by taking the carbon of the poisonous carbonic acid gas (carbon-oxygen) produced by the breathing of animals, and leaving the oxygen essential to all respiration of living beings. During the night, however, plants give out this poisonous gas of carbonic acid, and consequently corrupt the air. Care, therefore, should be taken to avoid sleeping in a close apartment where there are plants.

ANNA.—The sulphur bath alluded to by you is made by mixing five ounces of sulphur of potash with as much hot water (98°) as can be contained in an ordinary bath tub. It is to be used as any other warm bath.

GENTLEMAN.—Large umbrellas of white alpaca are occasionally carried by gentlemen on Broadway. They are very much used at the watering-places. Those of white gingham and linen are more serviceable than alpaca.

COUNTRY GIRL.—Neck-ties, or large bows, or loose sailor's knots, are worn at the throat with wide linen collars. Striped ribbon, or a solid color of a becoming shade, is selected. The ends are raveled out to form fringe.

EFFIE.—We are sorry that we are unable to oblige you; but a little reflection will show you that it is impossible for us to give in our Supplements special patterns that may be called for. These patterns are arranged in Europe, with a view to giving the greatest possible variety, and are forwarded some time previous to their publication. You see, therefore, that it would be impossible to give particular patterns in the next Number, as we are often requested to do. Our great variety of patterns covers a wide range of useful articles, and is calculated to meet the needs of the majority.

MENAGE.—If a man marries a woman owing debts he is bound to pay them, but only to the extent of the property he acquired by the marriage; but the woman, on the other hand, is not bound to pay the husband's debts under any circumstances.

STUDENT.—The passage is a quotation from Lord Bacon, and will be found in the preface to his Essays. "I do now publish," he says, "my Essays, which of all my other works have been most current; for that, as it seems, they come home to men's business and bosoms."

TRAVELER.—No passports were ever necessary for traveling in England; and they are, we believe, no longer required of English and American travelers, either in France or in Germany.

X. Y.—In saluting, the first recognition is conceded to be the lady's privilege; it is supposed to be a politeness to leave to her the right of accepting or refusing the acquaintance. Where, however, there is intimacy, there need be no question as to who is to offer the first courtesy. Both may do so simultaneously.

B. A.—Sugar is nutritious, and an essential element of all human diet; but this is no reason why it should be eaten in excess, although it probably has a worse name than it deserves, and does not do all the harm it is supposed to. Its bad effect is negative rather than positive. The eating of sugar in excess does its chief mischief by satiating the appetite, and thus preventing it from seeking that variety of food essential to health. It also, from the readiness with which it is converted into acid, often injures the teeth and weakens the digestion.

CASTLE.—No; decidedly no.

JONES.—You are wrong: your story is a good one to tell to the marines, but there is no such law. It is an old superstition that, upon an order to take the body of the debtor, a corpse can be taken in the coffin, and we have often heard this same story of the friends of the departed contributing to pay the cruel creditor, and releasing the corpse. There is no property in a dead body, and the coffin belongs to the executor.

CHARLES F.—You must give us more particulars before we can undertake to give an opinion.

A SUBSCRIBER.—We refer you to our answer to Effie.

KALLISTON.—To the beautifying influence of BURNETT'S KALLISTON thousands of ladies owe the preservation of their complexions during the season. Apply it in the evening, and it will undo all the mischief the wind and sun may have done to the skin during the day. Tan, freckles, morpew, redness, prickly-heat, blotches, etc., vanish under its cooling, purifying operation, like mists wafted away by the breeze.—[Com.]

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly-invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by News-dealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

FACETIÆ.

Two French actresses recently engaged in a violent altercation, in the course of which the question of age was broached. The younger was just getting the better of her adversary when she suddenly paused, and pathetically exclaimed: "Oh, Ciel! Ciel! what have I done? Abused her—called her such names! I never knew who was my mother, and she might be!"

HE NEVER SMILED AGAIN.

He never smiled again—his lips
Were never wreathed with dimples merry.
His mirth had suffered an eclipse,
And he looked melancholy, very!

He never smiled again—his face
From that sad hour was fixed so grimly,
Nor sign of joy you there could trace,
But only sorrow shadowed dimly.

He never smiled again—beneath
Their cruel power what griefs restrained him?
He'd been a martyr to his teeth—
But, oh, it was not they that pained him.

For he had lost them every one—
Ay, one by one, his jaws they quitted;
'Twas then his business was done—
He went to get his mouth refitted.

And certain wicked dentists had
(I think it right the world should know it)
Put in a set so false and bad,
He never smiled lest he should show it.

A CANDID BANKRUPT.—At a recent examination of a bankrupt, it was observed that he kept a great number of banking accounts. "I see," said the learned judge, "that you have had six or seven bankers; what could you want so many for?" "To overdraw them, to be sure," was the frank and candid reply.

In a certain family a pair of twins made their appearance, and were shown to their little sister of four years. It happened that whenever a rather prolific cat of the house had kittens the prettiest were saved and the rest drowned. When the twins were shown the child by their happy father, she looked at them earnestly, and at length, putting her little finger tip on the cheek of one of them, looked up, and said, with all the seriousness possible, "Papa, I think we'll save this one."

YOUNG ADDERS.—A Boston teacher, who in a fit of vexation called her pupils a set of young adders, on being reproved for her language, apologized by saying that she was speaking to those just commencing arithmetic.

MELTING.—To plunge a young lady six fathoms deep in happiness, give her two canary-birds, half a dozen moonbeams, fifteen yards of silk, an ice-cream, several rose-buds, a squeeze of the hand, and a promise of a new bonnet. If she won't melt, it will be because she can't.

QUITE CLEAR.—A Sunday-school boy was recently asked what conscience is. He replied, "An inward monitor." On being pressed for the definition of a monitor, he replied, "One of the iron-clads." We have not heard conscience compared to iron; but have repeatedly heard the expression, "He steels his heart against conviction."

DRESS MATERIAL FOR THE SEA-SHORE—Surge.

An old salt sitting on a wharf, the other day, very soberly remarked: "I began the world with nothing, and I have held my own ever since." A terse and suggestive biography.

A Kentuckian becoming incensed at the boastfulness of an Englishman as to the superiority of British inventions, exclaimed—"Pshaw! They are of no account. Why, a house-painter in my neighborhood grained a door so exactly in imitation of oak, that last year it put forth leaves, and grew an excellent crop of acorns; and another fellow, up in Iowa, has just taught ducks to swim in hot water, and with such success that they lay boiled eggs!" The Englishman from that time exhibited a modest and subdued air.

A NEW FEATURE IN HATS.—A couple of countrymen, looking at some new hats at one of our hatters, were delighted with a sample that had a small mirror on the inside of the crown: "it being put there," as one of them said, "so that a fellow can always tell just how his hat fits him."

"How many regular, steady boarders are there in this house?" asked a census taker of a servant-girl. "There's fifteen boarders in all, Sir, but not more'n four of 'em is steady persons, Sir."

The wicked-est man in New York must be a tallow-chandler.

CARD-BOARD COTTAGES.

THESE beautiful little specimens of architecture are just being introduced here among the lovers of light and tasteful fancy work.

The material employed is perforated card, and the model for copying may be selected from any drawings at hand of pretty suburban villas or graceful cottage residences.

Having selected your model, first cut a pattern out of paper of the two gables and one side together in one piece, not forgetting, if there are dormer windows, to include the fronts of them in the pattern. Mark carefully with a lead-pencil the outline of the pattern upon fine perforated card, and then cut it smoothly out with scissors or penknife, allowing a margin along the peaks of the gables about a quarter of an inch for turning down.

Next mark out with a pencil the shapes of doors and windows, and with a sharp penknife cut them smoothly, following the rows of holes, and not forgetting to leave the divisions in the windows to represent panes: the narrow strips between the rows answer nicely for these.

For cottages such as we are supposed to be describing the windows will look well with only four panes of glass. Diamond-shaped panes can be made quite as readily as square when the style of architecture calls for them.

Have ready a little thick white gum-arabic, and prepare the mouldings for the windows and doors by gumming together narrow strips of card, cutting in every third row for the widest, and in every second for the next, with the width between two rows for the top layer; these may be cut the proper length and joined very neatly in the corners when gummed in place around the outside edges of the windows. In some cases the dividing lines between the panes may be cut wider and moulded in this way, and they may be very much varied to suit the shapes and designs of the buildings under consideration.

This will probably keep the walls firmly in place; but if not, strips of white paper gummed on the inside corners may be added; then, in order to form a margin by which the whole structure may be fastened to the board used as a foundation, a strip of plain white card, one inch wide, and just the length of the side, may be folded lengthwise and gummed along the lower inside edge, so that, when placed upon the foundation, the other folded half of the strip will rest flat upon the board. This being also gummed or glued will cause it to stick firmly to the base in an upright position.

After setting up the walls the roof is next to be cut out and fitted, and this may be done easily if a paper pattern be first accurately prepared; this latter precaution will prevent all danger of waste in the card-board through mistakes. In cutting the shape allow for a suitable margin for the projecting eaves, and an ornamental drooping edge on the gables. Now mark the card through the centre of the roof to form the peak just as the corners were done, and bend it properly. Next, mark the drooping gable edges and turn them down, cutting out a triangular piece in the centre, which will make it fit properly in the points. The little openings around the dormer windows must be cut out, and then the roof will fit down nicely; the edges of the gable walls which were turned over may now be gummed on the upper side, and the roof pressed down upon them, which will hold it firmly in place. These drooping edges over the gables may be cut according to one's fancy—scalloped, pointed, or with figures cut out and plain edge, and they add very much to the beauty of the design.

The dormer windows having been cut with the side, need only to be bent at the sides, and tasteful roofs, with drooping edges like the gables, gummed neatly on. The chimneys may be made square, with a top put on to extend a little beyond the sides, but not turn over the edge. Several layers should be gummed on the sides and top so as to form panels and moulding, and then being cut to fit the point of the roof, they can easily be fastened on by the gum.

If there is to be a piazza or veranda, the pillars may be made by gumming together several strips of card of different widths, each strip being narrower than the last, until it approaches a square. If bases are desired, a square piece of the card, with graduating smaller ones above it, until the size corresponds with the thickness of the pillar, is then to be gummed on; for a small cottage or villa they are much prettier and more graceful without a base, and prettiest and lightest-looking of all are the graceful little supports for the roof formed of a narrow strip of card, say a quarter of an inch wide, cut in open-work figures. They are much more in keeping with the kind of architecture than any thing heavy.

The floor of the piazza is made by marking and bending the card so as to form steps on the front edge, and on the back a margin to gum against the wall. The roof is put on in the same

Thus, for large windows heavier mouldings will be required, and for small ones two layers will look better than three.

Having completed this part, we must next gum on pieces of mica over the windows on the inside, and over these may be placed pieces of colored paper, buff, blue, crimson, or green, according to taste, but all of one color; or, if preferred, some arrangement to represent lace curtains can be substituted; uniformity throughout will, however, have a better effect.

When all the mouldings, etc., are finished, the walls may be set up. First fold the card for the corners of the house, marking it with a penknife (not cutting through) on the inside; this will leave the outside angle smooth and unbroken, forming neat, square corners.

The two gables and one side of the house are now ready: next prepare the other side, cutting and finishing it to correspond with the first, but allow card enough to turn in about a quarter of an inch on each end. Fold this margin so as to make neat corners like the others, and put a little gum on the outside of the portions turned down, when the side may be slipped into its place, the gummed parts fitting inside against the gable walls, and thus holding all together. If done neatly, it will hardly be possible to discover where it has been joined.

way, only that the outer edge can be turned up, and, if cut prettily beforehand, will form a fancy railing around the top, finishing it as an upper veranda or balcony. The little supports described may then be gummed on the front, and thus the piazza will be completed.

Any other little ornament that the model may call for, or that may suggest themselves to the fancy, may now be added. The panels of closed doors can be well represented by laying on graduated strips in the way described, and the roofs of bay-windows by piling on layer after layer until the proper shape is obtained.

The color of the card used may either be white or colored, according to taste; if stone-color is preferred, two shades should be employed, and the mouldings should be made of the darker shade. The white is, however, most admired, and the contrast between the bright colors in the windows and the purely white walls is very pretty.

Graceful little summer-houses and rustic bridges may be made in the same way, and when the artist has completed one specimen he will be sure to try something further, as the beauty and novelty of the production will surprise and delight him.

Remember always to use the finest card; that with large holes will make coarse work.

The board on which the cottage is placed may be afterward ornamented with moss, or merely sanded. A simple walnut stand will, however, look very well.

When completed it will be better protected from dust by being kept under a glass shade.

TO A LADY

WHO DECLINED AN INVITATION.

"You would not go with me," you said;
It would not do, it was not proper;
Which put to my request a stopper.
I went alone—at home you staid.
Yet, thinking afterward upon it,
I voted it an awful bore,
That you, and I, and many more,
Without a word to quiz and con it;
Could not a simple journey make,
Could not a trifling visit pay,
That we should be constrained to say,
In whispered words, with hearts that quake—
"How would the babbling neighbors talk?
How would each gossip shake her head?
Just think of all the scandal bred,
If you and I should—take a walk!"
A strange, stiff world, that every act
Must thus be measured out and weighed;
That we should have to be afraid
Of how our neighbors take the fact.
That men may not say "This I do,
Because I will, and it is right;"
But ask, in a perpetual fright,
"How will the world the action view?"
That we may not, in word and thought,
Be governed by an innate sense
Of right and wrong, and so dispense
With all the puny trammels brought.
By a close keeping to the way
Which custom marks. That we may not Leave it behind, unheeding what
The babbling neighbors think or say.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 8, 1868.

A GOOD WORD FOR CRINOLINE.

A LITTLE while since it was predicted that crinoline, which had filled for so long a time such a large space in the world, was gradually sinking away, and was destined to disappear altogether. Had this been the case, it would again have been thrown whence it was taken, into the lumber-room of Time, with the cocked hat, laced coat and bag, knee breeches, buckles, ruffles, and other cast-off finery of our ancestral beaux and belles, only to reappear after a certain interval of time, for new fashions are but old ones furbished over again. As it is, our great-grand-daughters will no doubt bring out from the store-house of antiquity the skeleton crinoline of their great-grand-dames, and create a new soul within its ribs of death; and a future generation of female beauty will doubtless shelter its charms beneath the same ample skirt, provoke in the confidence of power the ardent host of lovers, and finally, after the many approaches, zigzags, parallels, parleys, summons, and negotiations of a regular siege, will, in spite of its triple defenses of whalebone, surrender. The everlasting comedy of fashionable life will be played a hundred years hence in the same old costume, though with a new cast.

Though the time may yet be far distant, the world, perhaps, will some day have to resign itself to the temporary absence of hoops or crinoline. That tyrant, Fashion, may issue against them his edict, which no one dare refuse to obey. Length and width will be forbidden, and we shall have to submit to the short and scant. We are glad to learn, however, that this calamity is averted for the present, and shall be pardoned, we hope, a protest, which is rather medical than æsthetic, against any attempt to do away with crinoline.

Hoops, in the fullest exaggeration of their periphery, are responsible for a good many minor accidents to glass and crockery. They are undoubtedly sometimes worn too large, and at unsuitable times. They certainly are not entitled, for one payment, to two seats in the omnibus, and to all the inside of the carriage, while coat and trowsers are obliged to ventilate themselves on the seat with the coachman. Bridget, who is hired for the convenience of her employers, though she may not think so, swells herself, unquestionably, to an irrational circumference, and, already too big for her place, becomes bigger still. Modesty, too, is occasionally shocked by a revelation of limb which reduces fastidiousness to silence, and prevents all comment.

All these inconveniences of the hoop are, however, owing to its abuse, and not proper use. If kept within moderate proportions there is no article of female dress more agreeable to the wearer. Were it not for the undoubted obligation of non-resistance to fashion, women would never willingly forego the hoop, but cheerfully seek refuge within its light and airy cage from the oppressive weight of manifold petticoat with which they were once accustomed to overlay and smother themselves. Worn as the hoop should be, with supports from a waist, its weight, and that which it may bear, is not only sustained by the hips, but the upper part of the body. Thus the burden is equally distributed, and a wholesome balance of power established between the organs of the abdomen and chest, and their various muscles. The affections peculiar to women, to which the weight of petticoat, bearing with an excessive downward pressure upon the lower part of the body, was supposed to give an increased tendency, are not at all favored by a hoop properly made and worn.

If fashion is destined to pronounce against crinoline we shall regret it, but console ourselves with the hope that the interval of its obscurity may be unusually short, and that it will soon reappear, if not in all the fullness of its broadest exaggeration, in those moderate dimensions which render the hoop so convenient and healthful an article of dress.

NURSING THE SICK.

IT has been truly said that a sick person has a better chance of restoration to health with a bad doctor and a good nurse, than with a good doctor and a bad nurse. Nursing, in fact, intelligently understood and properly applied, will do more toward curing disease than any system of medicine whatsoever. Now that medical science has discovered that drugs are always evils which are rarely mitigated by an occasional predominance of good, their administration should bear but a small part in the treatment of the sick, and nursing a proportionately large one.

Disease is but the effort of nature to get rid of some pernicious influence which disorders the body, perverts its functions, and inflicts it with pain. This natural process can seldom be much aided by a drug, however skillfully administered, and is sure to be greatly obstructed by a medicine given improperly. The main thing to do is to do nothing, but to leave nature to perform her own work freely. This, however, does not imply idleness on the part of the doctor or the nurse. All the vigilance and skill of both, and especially of the latter, are required to keep off what may disturb, and supply what may promote, the natural operation going on in every diseased body.

The labors of the nurse, indeed, are severe and constant. For example, repose is essential to most sick persons, as is indicated by their prostration; and to secure this what care and watchfulness are necessary! The slightest sound disturbs, and the gentlest touch ruffles it; for disease generally gives a preternatural impressibility to every sense. There are the ventilation, light, and temperature of the apartment to be regulated; the diet to be prepared, and the personal cleanliness to be attended to. There are a thousand other cares necessary in order to leave nature alone with disease, and give it a fair chance in the struggle for life or death. The nurse—though she may no longer be obliged, with watch in hand, to mark each slow division of time with a pill, a powder, or a draught, and thus vex in vain her own patience and torture the sensibility of the prostrate sufferer—will find in other more rational duties full occupation.

The nurse, now that she has more to do with the treatment of disease than the doctor himself, should have some acquaintance with those laws of nature whose operation it becomes her duty to watch, and no woman's education can be complete without it.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

To Agatha leaving town.

MY DEAR AGATHA,—I wonder if our grand-parents—mine at least, for they carry our question somewhat further back than yours—used to hold a family council every spring to consider the comparative attractions of the various watering-places, after much meditation decide whither to betake themselves, and then, shutting up the house, go solemnly forth in the dog-days and live in hot, noisy hotels, in trunks and bandboxes, in bureau-drawers that wouldn't open, in whitewashed cells ten by twelve feet; paying enormous sums of money for detestable food; dressing and undressing a dozen times a day, in mortal terror of Mrs. Grundy; gossiping, backbiting, drinking mineral-water, and bathing; and returning home in September with the proud consciousness of a well-spent summer? My vivid conviction is that my grand-parents did nothing of this kind. Long before the Erie Canal was built they did, indeed, go in their own carriage to Niagara; and a picturesque and severe journey it was through that now amazingly flourishing country of Western New York. And they made summer visits to country friends. But the days of my grand-parents were the days when people staid at home; when Saratoga was not, and invalids went to Ballston; when a few Southern families went to Newport; when Sharon was known only to the Indians, and all the innumerable retreats, famous and unknown, to which we betake ourselves were still the forest primeval or the undiscovered hamlet.

But I don't think that wisdom died with my honored grand-parents. They knew not steam, nor gas, nor the telegraph, nor the house-furnace, nor the full blessing of water. It was a virtue then to arise from the feather-bed in the bitter winter morning and break the ice in the pitcher and wash in the not yet frozen water. There are people who call it manly now. I ask you whether it is likely to be cleanly. There are those who regretfully compare the modern register in the floor with the ample, snapping, singing, splendid wood-fire in the spacious chimney, glittering upon the burnished andirons, the oak or walnut core beating with intense heat as the flame declined. But that is not the comparison. Let the register be tried by the dumb, black stove, and try the wood-fire with the Cannel or the best Liverpool coal. Take into the account the trouble of the wood, the unsteadiness, and the other differences, then strike the balance, and see if modern times are so far astern. Romance is much in the distance. The castle is captivating while it is a form of poetry and is sung by long tradition. But how about living in it? Should we not prefer one of our best modern houses with all the conveniences? What a romantic hero Richard of the Lion Heart appears as he rides flashing to Palestine! But how would Sir Robert Napier have liked to wear chain-armor to Magdala?

So, my dear Agatha, because I stay in town, you must not suppose that I think all the Sir Roberts are fools because they do not wear chain-armor; or, to put it in another way, that I am of that Vulpine school which holds that short tails are the only wear; or—if I can contrive to explain myself this torrid day—you must not think that I am laughing at you for going out of town because my grandmother staid at home. This worship of your grandmother passes for conservatism nowadays. "My dear, don't wear an easy dress; your grandmother didn't." "My dear, sit in a straight-backed chair; your grandmother always did." "My dear, don't smile on Sundays; your grandmother thought it was wicked." "My dear, where is the patch upon your forehead? your grandmother always wore a patch." The truth is, that your grandmother did a great many ridiculous and uncomfortable things, because she knew no better. But she was not to blame, for science had not made it possible to do otherwise. But if you do them, you are ridiculous and uncomfortable without excuse.

It is, of course, very foolish to leave a comfortable home in the sultry weather, and make yourself unspeakably uncomfortable at a great expense, as so many and many worthy people do. But that is not the alternative. It is certainly very wise to leave a huge mass of brick and stone, heated over and over again by incessant batteries of the dog-star, so that every morning you get up to the dear old heat of yesterday and last week, and run away to breathe the briny sea air or the clear cordial of the hills. I make myself indeed very comfortable here. The walls are thick; the air draws through the house; the rooms are high; the beds are elastic. The matings upon the floor and the muslin over the picture frames have a cool and refreshing aspect. There is plenty of Croton in the pipes, and of ice in the refrigerator. The market is at hand with every kind of green thing, of meat, of fruit, and I will not deny that there is a bottle at hand, in a wine-cooler, beaded with frigid dew. In the evening there is a scuffling of feet along the pavement, reminding me of people who are enjoying themselves. There is the little Italian boy with his shrill, metallic voice and his guitar, which wafts me away, away to the shores of Baïæ and Salerno. There is the street-band playing the last waltz, or the old waltzes—even the Duc de Reichstadt's—and jiggling off into Champagne Charley. There is the distant drone of the hand-organ, the rumble of the street car, the fire alarm, the welcome cry of ice cream; and as I sit in my linen coat, fanned by the evening breeze, and listening to the evening sounds in the street, I do not indeed think that all which my grandmother did not know and do is not worth knowing and doing; but I do feel that he who stays in a comfortable house in town through the intensest heats is not wholly without consolations and satisfactions.

Nothing is surer than that a change of air and scene is healthful and renovating. Even my friend, Mrs. Margery Honeysuckle, who lives in so pleasant a spot upon the Hudson, or North River (do you happen to remember that it was called North River by the early settlers, who called the Delaware the South River?)—even Mrs. Margery, I say, goes off in the summer with her children to change the air. "We live in this moist air all the year," she says; "and by July it gets to be so heavy that the children droop. So I carry them up to the hills to a little village that I have found, the name of which I shall not mention, nor the means of reaching it, because I have no intention of letting Mrs. Grundy take lodgings there. We have it all to ourselves; and we come home in the autumn brown and hearty and jolly."

Now I don't think it would be very sensible in Mrs. Margery to go to a famous watering-place, with chariots and horses and henchmen of every kind; a place where she must appear in wonderful raiment every day, and where the children must be perpetually upon parade. It seems to me that the excitement of such a life would more than destroy its benefits. It is often very comical, but it is a comedy in which I do not advise my friend Agatha to take a part. Queen Elizabeth was said to have had three thousand dresses, and it is some such quantity of costume that is required of the performers in this play.

You will perhaps remember Mrs. Semiramide, who died last year, by no means an old woman. She was a famous watering-place performer; but the comedy was a kind of tragedy for her after all. She was Psyche Brown, old Brown's daughter, the curiosity-shop man. But Psyche's heart was set upon a golden throne, and she knew how to win it, whether it were worth the winning or not. She laid siege to Solomon Semiramide, and finally carried him by open assault. She was married in May, and departed in July for a tour of the watering-places. Her object was to use the money which she had captured with Semiramide to secure a recognition by "Society;" for that suspicious goddess had regarded Psyche doubtfully, owning her beauty and her cleverness, but not quite sure that she would answer. Psyche's plan of campaign was to ingratiate herself into the confidence of Society at the summer resorts, where the rigors are somewhat relaxed. She would be affable and witty, and her toilettes should be unexceptionable. She would show that she understood things, and Society would succumb. She looked in her glass, she looked in her mind—she smiled, and counted victory as already won.

Mrs. Solomon Semiramide carried trunks innumerable. She had a fresh morning dress for every day—a fresh dinner and evening dress. The resources of her wardrobe were apparently exhaustless and certainly overpowering. Every morning at nine o'clock she breakfasted, and every morning at nine o'clock there was a little throng of ladies in the breakfast-room and of lounging gentlemen about the door, to see the newest marvel. Nothing could be more exquisite, more tasteful, more captivating than these morning dresses, nothing more beautiful and striking than her dinner toilettes. And all was carried off so cleverly! She wore each dress as if she had never worn any other, and chatted, and smiled, and bowed, and walked, and drove always in the gayest spirits and with the brightest wit. The men wrote to their friends to be sure and come. The landlords were in doubt whether they ought not to present her her bills. The newspaper correspondents invented new adjectives to describe her. But the women—ah! dear, dear! Ma in Hispania! The campaign was perfectly successful except in the one vital point, and there it was a total failure. "Society" was in fact crushed. The very duchesses, and countesses, and marchionesses, whose favor the lowly Psyche hoped to win, found themselves utterly outshone by her. Her dazzling succession of toilettes extinguished all their glory. Their newest devices were capped at their first appearance by Mrs. Semiramide's; and how did those old heathen furiously rage together when they reflected that on Friday they must wear the old dress of Monday, while this dreadful woman would arise as fresh and new from her dressing-table as a constellation from the horizon. The suspicion of Society became almost hate; its doubt grew to disdain; and the beautiful Mrs. Semiramide, by the very spell which she hoped would open the golden gates of social recognition, had closed them upon her forever.

She is gone, but the king never-dies. She has left many and many a successor, whom I sometimes see when I go to the summer retreats, or behold driving by my window upon the way thither. Mrs. Semiramide was unreasonable. Dear Agatha, I know that when you travel upon that road your manners will be different. May your summer wanderings be happy, and bring you back with fresher roses!

Your confident friend,
AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

INDIA GOODS.

A FANCY for India goods is one of the caprices of the summer. The French Empress, with characteristic love of variety, has clothed herself in the soft, fleecy India muslin, in Corah silks, and pongee, and of a sudden they are the fashion. Thus a new prestige is given to a host of beautiful materials which merchants sigh to remember they once possessed, but sold for a song to get rid of them. These quaint antique goods, so long out of use, are now as anxiously sought after as if they were the last novel emanations from the looms of Lyons. At present the supply is short, and it is necessary to go to the India stores to find a variety from which to select. There they are shown, tied up in bundles, wrapped about with gay bandanas and Hindoo kerchiefs, and from their folds is emitted that faint odor which clings to every thing brought from the Eastern seas.

INDIA MULL.

The real India mull is of the soiled-looking, yellowish shade of white which is thought to enhance the beauty of fine lace. It is entirely without starch, and is as sheer as linen cambric, which it very much resembles in appearance. Among the white dresses universally worn this summer India mull and French nansook are the materials most in favor. They should be trimmed with Valenciennes lace and worn over dresses of glacé silk. India mull is seven-eighths of a yard wide. The price varies from seventy-five cents to two dollars a yard.

CORAH SILK.

Corah silk is a glossy India foulard, of wiry material that is not easily crushed. It is of the pale nanken shade now in vogue, and called by the French écru, or unbleached. It is a yard and a quarter wide, and is worth $3 a yard. A dress pattern contains eight yards.

PONGEE.

The name "pongee" is given to various poplin mixtures of silk and linen, or Lisle thread; but the real Delhi pongee is all silk, a light material, as cool as muslin, and pleasant to the touch. It is of a bright buff color. Twenty yards are required for a dress, as it is only half a yard wide. The price is $2 50 a yard. It makes very stylish traveling dresses, and is in favor for watering-place and sea-side suits, as the moisture does not affect it. The umbrella is of the same silk as the dress, and should have a bamboo stick.

TUSSORE SILK.

Tussore is a heavy foulard silk of a pretty fawn color. It is brought out in ten-yard pieces, at $3 a yard.

FOULARD.

One of the pleasantest fabrics for summer wear is the genuine India foulard. It has none of the disagreeable harshness of the Japanese foulard, but is soft, smooth, and cool, and falls into graceful folds. There is great variety of pattern this season in this goods. It is shown in stripes, dots, chintz patterns, and in solid colors. Foreign correspondents speak of the bridal white foulard and of shot or chameleon foulards. Pistache green and straw color are seen together, and pearl gray with blue. Foulards will wash, but should only be entrusted to a skillful laundress.

WASH SILKS.

The checked and "thousand stripe" India silks can not be too highly commended. They wash like muslin, and the wear is endless. The price is $1 40 a yard. The genuine article is shown rolled over a stick, and is very light and cool. For morning dresses and demi-toilettes they are very pretty, with the addition of a black lace apron or a white organdy fichu.

PINE-APPLE CLOTH.

This thin fabric is made from the fibres of the pine-apple, and is exceedingly durable. There is no more desirable goods for midsummer dresses. It was formerly objected to because the colors are not very decided; but vivid colors are not fashionable at present, and the delicate shades of green, and lavender, and rose-color on white, so often seen in this beautiful gauze, are especially stylish. The prices range from seventy-five cents to $2 25 a yard.

WHITE DRESSES.

During the heated term white dresses are chosen for all occasions. There are piqués, muslins, grenadines, Chamberly, sultanes, and goat's-hair, made into morning dresses, promenade suits, dancing dresses, and trained robes, all of the universally worn white. Muslins are trimmed with tucks, puffs, ruffles, and Valenciennes worn over colored silk. Bunched-up tunics are made over short skirts and with trains. Infant's waists and fichus, Watteau paletots, and Marie Antoinette mantles of sheer muslin are ornamented with rosettes of ribbon and fringed sashes. Frills and flounces of every quality of muslin may be bought ready-made and fluted. The fluting shears are scarcely thicker than a knitting-needle, and the effect is similar to the old-fashioned crimping. Thin muslin flounces are also arranged in box-pleats.

A white organdy has a trained skirt with ten-inch flounces scalloped at the lower side and edged with Valenciennes. The fullness is taken up in inch-wide box-pleats. A wide puff forms a heading, above which is a row of Valenciennes insertion. A tunic, similarly trimmed, is caught up with a bow in the back, and forms an apron in front. Infant's waist and sleeves of puffs and lace. This is worn over blue silk. The cost, complete, is $275.

A short dancing dress of lavender silk, with seven narrow flounces, had an over-dress of India mull, edged with a row of wide Valenciennes. The back breadths are longer than the front, and gathered into the front seams, forming paniers. The puffed waist is cut square, very low in front and back. Sleeves puffed to the elbow, with fall of wide lace.

A nansook morning dress has an untrimmed round skirt of medium length, a compromise between short dresses and trains. The French waist, gathered into a belt, is tastefully trimmed with bretelles of inserted puffs, extending over the shoulders and narrowing toward the belt. Full coat-sleeve, with puffs on the wide cuff. Pink ribbon bow at the throat. Sash, with four loops and ends at the side. Pompadour slippers, with large pink rosettes.

Piqué is prettily ornamented with guipure medallions, or clusters of lace representing flowers, true-love knots, and stars, lined with colored silk or with Chamberly. They are sold at from $1 50 to $2 a dozen.

A visiting dress of white poils de chevrès, or goat's-hair, has a round skirt trimmed with an eight-inch flounce of butter-cup-colored silk. The lower edge of the flounce is scalloped and bound. A quilted ruche forms the heading. The upper skirt, trimmed with a narrower ruffle, is shaped like a reversed tunic, long in front and but three-eighths of a yard deep in the back. Bow and short sash behind. Coat-sleeves. A round mantle, that does not conceal the figure, is looped in the back by two bows and ends of the goat's-hair ruffled with silk. Rice-straw toquet, trimmed with a wreath of butter-cups, and blonde veil. Etruscan gold jewelry. Buff gloves and boots. Parasol of the silk with which the dress is trimmed. A second goat's-hair dress has five narrow flounces bound with blue. The upper skirt is en paniers. A narrow pointed hood is cut in the same piece as the back of the short jaunty jacket. Chemise Russe of nansook and Valenciennes. White chip hat of the Continental shape, trimmed with white and blue forget-me-nots. White silk umbrella lined with blue.

SHORT MUSLIN DRESSES.

Instead of the ponderous style of long, flowing dresses for morning, short gored skirts and sacques are adopted. These are convenient, as they are suitable for breakfast and for morning promenades, exchanging the fancy slipper for a walking-boot, being the only alteration necessary. Muslins, lawns, linens, cambric, and Chamberly are made in this way, trimmed with ruffles of the same. A short suit of buff Chamberly, made by a tasteful modiste, was sold at $15. The sacque should not be full, but must have a cool, négligé appearance. The seams under the arms are all that is necessary to give it proper shape. The under-waist should be prettily trimmed, and belted with a ribbon belt the color of the skirt.

HINTS ABOUT SLEEVES.

The two pieces of a coat-sleeve should not be cut together. Many ladies who make their own dresses spoil the sleeve by shaping the upper and under portion precisely alike. The upper part should be an inch and a half broader than the under piece. It should also be longer, and held next the sewer, that it may be slightly full in the under part as it is sewed. At the arm-hole the front should be a convex curve, while the under part is concave. The sleeve should not be straight, but rounded to fit smoothly on the arm when half bent, as that is the position most frequently assumed.

The sleeves of wash dresses are now shaped like the ordinary linen under-sleeve so much worn. Cut an ample coat-sleeve long enough to reach half-way between the elbow and wrist, and finish out the length with a deep, loose cuff. The cuff must be interlined to make it hold starch, and is fastened with two buttons on the outside seam, or closed to run the hand through.

BATHING COSTUMES.

Morocco boots with cork soles and linings are made for bathers. Those of moccasin shape, without heels, are preferred. A black oil-cloth cap with a visor to protect the face from the sun, and turn the water, and a bag net for the hair, is the best water-proof arrangement for the head. Bathing suits made with trowsers and blouse waist without skirt are objected to by many ladies as masculine and fast; but experience proves that they do not expose the figure more than a wet clinging robe, and are much more comfortable in the water, where all superfluous drapery should be dispensed with. For this reason the fancy costumes with double skirts are clumsy and unbecoming. All wool serge and flannel are the materials that cling least to the figure. Cotton and linen goods are penetrable at once by moisture, and are therefore objectionable. A toilette Russe for bathing is in good taste. It is a gray flannel Russian polonaise, buttoned diagonally in front, and trimmed with wide black braid. Trowsers and boots, or moccasins, of the same. A black oil-cloth hat with rim, and leather tassels hanging at the side. Very pretty suits of plaid and self-colored flannel and serge are sold at from $8 to $15. They are made with yokes and full waists, and trimmed with braid of a contrasting color. Trowsers should be full and gathered into a band at the ankle.

PERSONAL.

MR. EMERSON is said to have made the remark that he has done a fair day's work, with his head, when he has written twenty lines that may be considered finished and creditable to his reputation.

The new United States Senator from Louisiana, Hon. WILLIAM PITT KELLOGG, was originally from Montpelier, Vermont. He is now Collector of Customs at New Orleans. He is the second "William Pitt" in the Senate, the first being WILLIAM PITT FESSENDEN.

The Alpha Delta Phi people were quite complacent at Amherst the other day, when, after the Alumni exercises, the Rev. HENRY WARD BEECHER was made a member of that mysterious and solemn organization.

Mr. DISRAELI is never more happy and effective than in the language of compliment. He knew that his motion to grant a pension of £2000 per annum to Sir ROBERT NAPIER would afford him the opportunity of saying neat things, and he said them so admirably as to extort the admiration of his great opponent, Mr. GLADSTONE. Could any thing have been better than when he said, "Sir ROBERT NAPIER has planted the standard of St. George on the mountains of Rasselas, and led the elephants of Asia, bearing the artillery of Europe, over African passes which might have startled the trapper and appalled the hunter of the Alps." But the practical difficulties of the expedition were quite as well defined by a soldier, who, having been told that he was marching upon the tableland of Abyssinia, replied, "The table must have been turned upside down, and we're a-marching over the legs."

The profound respect entertained for ROBERT CHAMBERS, ex-champion of the Thames and the Tyne, may be inferred from the fact that at his funeral, that took place four weeks ago at Newcastle-on-Tyne, upward of 50,000 persons were present, and 3000 walked in the procession, which was headed by a band playing the "Dead March" in Saul.

President WHITE, of the Cornell University, writes home that he has had the good fortune to engage Professor GOLDWIN SMITH as Professor of English and General Constitutional History at Cornell University; also JAMES LAW, of Belfast, Ireland, as Professor of Veterinary Medicine and Surgery. Both gentlemen are to become residents of Ithaca immediately, and will devote themselves to the service of the University from its commencement.

Judge HOLMES, of Missouri, who has written a clever book to prove that Shakspeare did not write Shakspeare, has been appointed to the Royal Professorship of Law in the Harvard Law School.

JOHN ALLEN, who has been much written about in the papers, as being "the wickedest man in New York," has proved himself not to be so by formally promising to President ACTON, of the Board of Police Commissioners, that on or before the 1st May next, he will abandon his present dance-house business. Mr. ACTON says, "John has good points, lots of 'em; he really wants to be a man; he was up here with me an hour and a half last Sunday morning talking about these matters." This man has a little boy, and he wishes him to be a good boy. That is what is the matter with John, probably.

Miss CUSHMAN has not come back to reside; only to pass the summer. She was in Washington a few days ago, and had a pleasant interview with Secretary SEWARD. She will neither act, give readings, nor sell her wardrobe. After doing the watering-places and visiting old friends, she will in November return to Italy.

The KING of BAVARIA ordinarily couches himself at about daybreak and gets up at noon. His father was rather rough with him, compelling him to go to bed at 9 P.M., sharp. His mother, the queen dowager, is still a very handsome woman, who does not look older than thirty-five. The other day a Frenchman was with the young King, when the Queen suddenly opened the door, but, seeing a stranger, retired immediately. "That must be your Majesty's sister," said the Frenchman. "What makes you believe so?" inquired the King. "Oh, she bears such a strong resemblance to you, Sire," "Bah," said LOUIS II., "it is my mamma."

It is said of the late EDWARD EVERETT that when he was preparing a lecture or address, he arranged every thing carefully, with a view to the best possible effects. When about to deliver a speech at Lexington, in commemoration of the battle of the 19th of April, 1775, he inquired whether any one who had fought on that occasion was still living. Being informed that one old man survived, he called upon him, and, after some conversation concerning the events of the Revolution, he said: "In my address I shall make an allusion to those who fought in the battle of Lexington. I want you to sit in front of me, and when I begin to allude to those heroes I want you to stand up." The old soldier obeyed his instructions; but as soon as he rose from his seat, Mr. EVERETT extended his arm, as the statue now does, and exclaimed, "Sit down, venerable Sir! Sit down! It is for us to stand in your presence." The aged man obeyed the direction, but in the simplicity of his heart he was quite bewildered by such contradictory orders. He had no idea how effects were produced in oratory, and he afterward said to a friend: "I don't know what Mr. EVERETT meant. First, he told me to get up, and then when I got up, he told me to sit down."

M. GUZOT has just published the third volume of his "Meditations on the Christian Religion." The conclusions to which he arrives are, that the Christian religion and liberty are not only reconcilable but necessary the one to the other; that the Christian religion and science have nothing to sacrifice and nothing to fear the one from the other. He concludes his preface in the following language: "I have seen much and acted a little in my long life; I have taken a part in the business of the world; I have quitted it, and now only contemplate it. For twenty years I have been working at my tomb. I went into it living, and have made no effort to come out. I have at once experience and disinterestedness. If it were given to me to be still of use to the two grand causes, which, in my view, are but one, the cause of the Christian faith on men's souls and the cause of liberty in my country, I should await, with gratitude in the bosom of my repose, that Aurora of the Eternal Day, which, says Petrarch, fools call death."

"Quel che morir chiaman gli scioocchi."

We regret to see the announcement of the death of Mrs. General HOOKER, which took place at Watertown, New York, on the 15th ult. She was the sister of the Hon. WILLIAM S. GROESBECK, of Cincinnati, one of the counsel of President JOHNSON in the impeachment trial.

JUNIUS BROWNE furnishes the Chicago Tribune with a sketch of GEORGE RIPLEY, formerly a Unitarian minister, later a Brook Farm Communist, editor of the American Cyclopaedia with C. A. DANA, and for many years past literary editor of the New York Tribune. When in the community he and DANA had only one hat between them. He is well off, deriving, as does DANA, between three and four thousand dollars a year from the sale of the Cyclopaedia. Soon after the Tribune was started he bought two shares of stock at the par value of $1000 each, borrowing the money for the purchase. He is now the owner of five shares, worth, according to the latest quotations, $31,250. He does not work very hard, and is a very pleasant and fine-looking gentleman, a little after the old-school pattern, with gray curly hair, very neat, even fastidious, in his dress, a rather aquiline nose, and fresh complexion. Always smiling through his gold spectacles, he is fond of a pleasant story, a fluent talker, though a slow writer.

Admitting it to be accurate, the description of King WILLIAM, of Prussia, given by a Yankee correspondent, exhibits any thing but the right sort of person who is now "monarch of all he surveys" in that Kingdom. "The Berliners," he says, "will tell you first that he is a very plain man, that he sleeps on a hard bed in a plain room of the palace—in short, that he is a born and bred soldier. How that he is niggardly of his wealth and spends very little of his income, which exceeds three million dollars per annum. That he does not favor building new palaces or refitting the old ones, but, if he makes an outlay of his private means, it is upon his army, and that very little of the money ever gets back into the pockets of the people. He has no thought for the welfare of his subjects, and has not the first element of statesmanship in his composition. The direction of affairs is left to his ministers, who seek for personal ends rather than for the good of the state. And so there are murmurings of discontent; and the gayly uniformed officers and soldiers, that give Berlin the appearance of a great camp, are regarded as so many interlopers, who eat the bread of the people and keep the masses in poverty."

BISMARCK (the same writer continues), is more the King than the King. Hats come off when he rides "unter den Linden." The Prussians have had good evidence of his abilities, and appreciate them. While the King is planning the arrangement of the leg stripes for his soldiers, the great Count is negotiating with the powers that be, and always for the good of Prussia. He lives in a plain row of buildings on Williams Street, with a thick shaded garden of lime-trees in the rear, in which he often walks to obtain relaxation from the cares of overwork. Look into any shop-window in Berlin, and there is his photograph. It is said that he cares very little for the King, but that the King cares much for BISMARCK.

A gentleman who has been on a visit to Mr. JOHN STUART MILL, the distinguished English philosopher and member of Parliament, speaks of him as "a slight gentleman, of medium size, elegantly and fashionably dressed, with the air of a man who has been accustomed to regard the formalities of the courts, yet unassuming and kind. He speaks in a voice tremulous with infirmity, which, with his delicate organization, convinces you that, however well he may do with the pen, he has not the capacity for public speaking. His countenance is extremely refined and intellectual. His head is massive, less so than WEBSTER's, but of a finer texture, and the physical so subordinate in its development that you feel it must be a perfect servant to the cold desires of the mind. Mr. MILL spends but a portion of the year in England—the remainder in the south of France, on account of his health, which he said the addition of political with literary duties had rather overtaxed. It is on account of these combined duties that he has not been able to visit the United States, which he has long had a desire to do, and where he has many friends."

United States Senator CONKLIN, from this State, married a sister of Governor SEYMOUR. Governor SEYMOUR is a nephew of the Hon. HORATIO SEYMOUR, of Middlebury, Vermont, who for twelve years represented that State in the United States Senate.

Whether it was at Potsdam, at which residence of the Crown Princess of Prussia the Prince of Wales is said to have first met his future bride, or whether it was elsewhere, the historian has not as yet seen fit to divulge, or whether at some royal picnic or other entertainment; but the story as to the way in which he "popped" and how the Princess "yes-ed" is thus: "The Princess rose to depart. 'You would,' said ALBERT EDWARD, 'make a fortune in England by reading Shakspeare.' The maiden answered, 'If your Highness thinks so, why not engage me to be reader to the English Court? I am sure you could well afford to pay me.' 'That,' said the Prince, 'depends entirely upon the price you may put upon your transcendent powers.' (At this point it is difficult for an inquiring mind to resist a disposition to wonder whether ALBERT EDWARD was as yet aware of the identity of the lovely young lady whose powers of reading the works of the world poet had so greatly fascinated him, or whether his susceptibilities were leading him on into one of the little flirtations in which he is believed to have had a somewhat perilous tendency to enter with the unknown owners of pretty faces; be that as it may.) 'Oh,' said the Princess, smiling, 'I would not be greedy; you might engage me to read for life for the moderate sum of—let me see—well, for five-and-twenty shillings.' 'Five-and-twenty shillings!' exclaimed the Prince; 'you are too modest in naming such a sum as five-and-twenty shillings.' 'Not a bit too modest,' said the Princess, archly, stepping over the grass; 'five-and-twenty shillings amount to something handsome; on reflection you will find that it is an English sovereign and an English crown.' Off went the royal maiden; she was scarlet with blushes, a tear was on her cheek, she wished she could recall her words, she thought she had been too bold. But ALBERT EDWARD stood transfixed—the little god had lodged a thousand arrows in his heart; for many days and nights he might have sung:

"When I sleep I dream,
When I wake I'm weary:
Rest—I can get none,
For thinking of my dearie."

Nuptializing continues to be the fashion in Washington in Government circles. No sooner has Senator HENDERSON fairly become a Benedict than Senator CONNESS is announced as being ready to follow—the latter gentleman being about to wed Miss HILDETH, the beautiful and highly accomplished niece and ward of General BUTLER.

Mr. A. T. STEWART has been made the subject of a little waggery by the Hon. THADDEUS STEVENS. Not long since, in Washington, he was called before the House Committee on the tariff, and urged a reduction of the rates on foreign woollens. "Here," said he, "is this coat; I had to pay thirty-five dollars for this!" smoothing down its breast and skirt with his thin hand, as though the price was ruinous. "I had to give seven dollars for this vest!" taking hold of its lapel and exhibiting its quality, with a like expression of great extravagance. "It's too much—too much altogether!" Old THAD STEVENS was present, refreshing himself as usual with his plate of oysters. "So you think the tariff should be reduced, Mr. STEWART," said he, in the interim of the disappearance of the bivalves—"that clothing and other articles of personal apparel should be lower, do you?" "Yes, certainly, yes!" wheezed Mr. STEWART, in response. "Thank you! thank you! Mr. STEWART, for your valuable opinion. It will aid us, doubtless. But"—with a merry twinkle of the eye, as Mr. S. was moving out of the room—"good-by! We may never meet again; I fear we never shall! Let us hope, however," continued old THAD, "that as long as you stay you may be sure of a comfortable living!"

CHAPTER I.

AT THE PIED LAMB.

THREE years ago—that is to say, in the year of grace 1865—the little German principality of Lippe-Detmold came perhaps as near to being the realization of an ideal "Land of Cockaigne" as ever did any sublimary territory. It may still, for aught I know, be a pleasant residence, combining many advantages for those whose leisure is large, and whose means are not so. But the beginning of the little story which I have to tell concerns the state of Lippe-Detmold three years ago, and deals with the fortunes of some humble and obscure individuals who then resided in that tiny principality. Very beautiful and rich woodlands adorn the country, and afford an immense revenue to its ruler—a revenue which, in Germany, it would be saying very little indeed to term princely. But the woods and forests, although forming perhaps the chief boast and riches of Lippe-Detmold, are by no means the only signs of material prosperity to be found there. In every one of its few small hamlets and villages the stranger may perceive great barns of a very peculiar construction—which I shall presently have occasion to describe more particularly—with vast high roofs, and quaint inscriptions carved in wood over the doorways, importing that within is heaped goodly store of grain, and hay, and straw, food for man and fodder for beast, and always making reverent acknowledgment of the truth that "the earth is the Lord's, and the fullness thereof," after a simple, pious, thoroughly German fashion. Farming, therefore, as well as forestry, is understood and practiced in Lippe. Perhaps a Norfolk proprietor of a thousand acres would scarcely deign to regard the small patch of corn-land, carved out of the skirts of the woodlands, as worthy to be termed a farm; and possibly an English agricultural laborer, accustomed to steam-plows and patent threshing-machines, might stare with contempt at the rude implements by whose aid the Lippian peasant tills his mother earth, and piles up great heaps of food in his granaries. But nevertheless, three years ago plenty smiled in the farmsteads of Lippe-Detmold, and peace brooded softly with sleepy, folded wings over the land. Political peace and social security were there. As to domestic peace, which depends not on "amicable relations" with great governments, nor on the mild sway of a sovereign, however light his yoke, that, I suppose, suffered the same occasional flaws and interruptions in this model state that it is subject to in other communities of the sons of Adam.

If external circumstances could have insured harmony in any assemblage of men, surely one might have looked for it among the little company gathered together in the Speise-Saal—eating-room—of the Pied Lamb inn at Horn, on one frosty September evening in the year 1865. Horn is a small and singularly picturesque townlet, about seven or eight miles from Detmold. Its one long, wide street contains a series of treasures for the artist, in the shape of old houses with towering steep roofs and carved gable-ends. The inn of the Pied Lamb is not one of the most picturesque of these tenements, having its front facing the street, instead of, as in the majority of cases, its narrow gable-end, and bearing a comparatively modern and smartened-up air. But there are worse places in which to spend the dark hours of an autumn evening than the long, low Speise-Saal of the Pied Lamb. Any lack of artistic merit in the fittings of the room was more than compensated for, in the eyes of its habitual frequenters, by the decided air of comfort—as comfort is understood in Horn—which pervaded it. The floor was strewn with fine white sand, that cracked under one's footsteps; a towering white earthenware stove, that filled up one end of the apartment, sent forth an oven-like heat which gave a baked flavor to the atmosphere; and breathing was rendered a yet more difficult process to unaccustomed lungs by reason of dense clouds of tobacco smoke that hung heavily in the air, and curled slowly around the thick, clumsy beams of the ceiling. But the place was undeniably very warm, and gave admission to as little of the outer oxygen as was at all compatible with human existence. So the inhabitants of Horn found the Speise-Saal of the Pied Lamb an extremely comfortable, and even luxurious place of resort. I have said that if external circumstances could insure harmony among men, the little company assembled there on the autumn night in question might have been expected to be very harmonious. They were all near neighbors and old acquaintance; they were warm; they had just partaken of a hearty supper; they were enjoying the ambrosial fumes of their pipes; each man had on the long, narrow table before him a tall glass filled with beer, while behind him there hung, fastened to a nail in the wall, a leather cushion covered with knitted work, so placed as to afford a comfortable rest for the back of his head; thus combining ease with cleanliness, and preventing the blue and white stenciled wall from receiving any soil or sign of having been rubbed. Outward circumstances were surely favorable to placidity and good-fellowship, but yet there were sounds of dissent and discord to be heard amidst the stream of noisy gutturals that was being poured forth by the various members of the party. Let us look and listen a while, and thus gather a little preliminary information as to some of the chief personages concerned in the simple tale I have to tell.

First let us glance at the host, Herr Quendel, landlord of the principal inn at Horn, and in his own and his fellow-townsmen's estimation a man of mark and authority. A man of weight he certainly was, being enormously fat and unwieldy. He had a shapeless clean-shaven face, a closely-cropped head of grizzled hair, which grew in so regular and marked a form on his forehead as to look at first sight like a gray velvet skull-cap, and a deep, grating voice. Next to Herr Quendel, who occupied an arm-chair nearest to the stove, sat Herr Peters, the apothecary of the town. This gentleman presented a laughable contrast to Quendel in his outward appearance. Peters was tall, and lean, and sandy-haired, wore glasses, and had hanging about his garments an undefined, but distinctly perceptible odor of drugs. That is to say, the odor of drugs was perceptible in Peter's garments under ordinary circumstances; but in the Speise-Saal of the Pied Lamb the smell of tobacco smoke victoriously asserted its supremacy over all other smells whatsoever. Next to Peters sat Simon Schnarcher, the sacristan, or Küster, as the Germans have it—by many years the oldest, and by many degrees the sourest and sharpest-tempered of the party—a keen-eyed, yellow-skinned, bald-headed old fellow, with thin bloodless lips, a nose like a hawk's beak, and a back so bowed as to present almost the appearance of a hump. These three worthies were engaged in eager discussion, and bore in fact the chief part in what talk was being held. The rest of the company—consisting of farmers, small shop-keepers, and a stray commercial traveler—uttered only occasional grunts of assent or dissent, and enjoyed the loud word-combat that was going on in their presence with a placid sense of being snugly out of harm's way in their stronghold of silence, such as one may imagine to have been the predominant sentiment in the breast of some smug Roman citizen looking down on the perils of the arena from the secure elevation of his seat in the Coliseum.

"But I say," cried Peters, the apothecary, in a high, thin voice, "I say that the world won't stand still, whatever we may wish!"

"It is our business, Sir," said Quendel, majestically, "to make it still, and keep it still."

Grunts of approbation from the prosperous farmers. The commercial traveler fidgeted slightly on his seat, and played with his pinchbeck watch-chain. He had not been driving a thriving trade in Horn, and possibly thought the doctrine just enunciated by the landlord scarcely calculated to extend his business connection.

"Still, still, still, I say," repeated Quendel in his deep, rough tones, and looking like the incarnation of immobility in his own ponderous person, "let us alone. Let us be at peace. Let us enjoy the blessings of Providence in quiet and thankfulness. The world is well enough, if we would but let it alone. I find it a very good world indeed, and I have lived now some five-and-fifty years in it, and not altogether in an obscure position either."

"Surely, surely, Herr Landlord," replied Peters, humbly, "there is no doubt that you are a man much looked up to, none more so in the principality. But what I mean is, that if the world won't stand still—and I'm afraid there's no use in our trying to make it—why, our business ought to be to—guide, to direct the movement, as it were, into a right channel."

"And I," snarled old Schnarcher, "don't agree with either of you. I say and maintain that so far from encouraging new-fangled notions—so far from even letting things stay as they are—it is our business, and every man's business, to push them back into the old grooves."

"And how far back, Sir, would you push things into the old grooves that you talk of?" broke in the commercial traveler, impatiently. "I suppose you wouldn't quite go back to the beginning of the world? Would 1848 be your limit, for instance?"

Schnarcher glared at the speaker from under his bushy white brows. The eyes of all the assembly were turned upon this daring stranger. To them he did seem very daring.

"How old may you be, Sir?" demanded Schnarcher, with much deliberation.

"How old? Well, I don't see what that has to do with it, but I don't mind telling my age. I'm six-and-thirty—quite old enough to remember '48."

"And I," rejoined Schnarcher, still glaring steadfastly at the other, "was seventy-nine last Pentecost."

With that he turned his back full on the stranger with the air of one who had victoriously put a stop to any further attempt at argument from him.

There was a low murmur of admiration throughout the company. No man could have told why the fact of old Schnarcher's having been seventy-nine last Pentecost should be considered to have completely graveled his opponent, but each man had a vague idea that it was so. The commercial traveler shrugged his shoulders disdainfully, but said no more. Public opinion was too strong for him. After a while the sacristan resumed:

"We're all astray. New fashions and new notions are the ruin of us. The boys' heads are turned with them, and nowadays it seems that the boys are to rule the men. That used to be thought neither according to sense nor Scripture in my time. But I suppose we shall 'progress'—pouf! I hate the sound of the word!—until we come to be governed by babies in swaddling-clothes."

Old Schnarcher spoke with intense bitterness, and his sunken eyes sparkled angrily, and the grim laugh with which he finished his speech was not a pleasant sound to hear. There was a short, uneasy silence. Nearly all present were aware that the sacristan had lately been at variance with his grand-nephew, an orphan lad, whom he had partly educated and brought up, and whose rebellious behavior was a peculiarly sore point with the old man. Now this grand-nephew—Otto Hemmerich by name—was personally a great favorite with the little community at Horn. Simon Schnarcher, on the other hand, although a man of unimpeachably correct and orthodox principles, was not much beloved. Which state of things was certainly very strange, seeing that old Simon was always in the right, and poor Otto always in the wrong!

Herr Quendel poured forth an unusually large volume of smoke from his mouth, and remarked, as though the sacristan had been expressly discussing his nephew's behavior, "And how is Otto going on now, Herr Küster? I haven't seen him for some time past."

This abrupt descent from generals to particulars was not calculated to soften the acerbity of old Simon's temper. "Otto!" he repeated. "What, my boy Otto? Oh! he's all right enough, thank ye. Otto Hemmerich, eh? Now what put him into your head, I wonder?"

It was Simon's constant practice not only to ignore the fact that his grand-nephew differed from him on certain important points, but to assume, with dogged persistency, that any such difference of opinion between them was too wildly impossible a thing to be conceived. Presently he went on again:

"Ah, now I'd wager it was my talking of babies in swaddling-clothes set your mind running on Otto. 'Tis but the other day he was a baby himself."

"Lord, ay!" rejoined Quendel, solemnly. "How the time goes! Now he's as strapping a Junker as any in Lippe."

"And it seems to me," said Franz Lehmann, a weather-beaten farmer, "it seems to me no more than a week ago—though it must be ten good years, as I reckon—that his father, the head-ranger, was carried home one morning from the forest with three of his ribs broken, and his side bleeding and torn by the antlers of a stag, and his rifle twisted up just like—like—"

"Like a cork-screw," suggested the host.

"How the boy took on, to be sure!" said Lehmann.

"Took on!" echoed Peters. "Nobody knows how he felt it. Nobody but me knows how that motherless boy nursed his father, and sat up with him night after night, and gave him his physic, and placed his bandages, and—Talk of women! That twelve-year-old lad was a better nurse than fifty women."

Peters was a bachelor, and somewhat of a misogynist.

"Fifty!" exclaimed Franz Lehmann. "Well, I don't know about fifty! But women ain't bad to have round you when you're sick. My old woman looked after me, and cocked me up last winter when I had the rheumatism in all my joints, and I tell you there were times when I couldn't bear any hand but hers nigh me. No, no, women can nurse, mind ye!"

"And they can cook—some of 'em," said Quendel, musingly. His voice was almost tender as he spoke. There are reminiscences which have a softening influence on the least susceptible.

"And if a man's a bit of a fool to begin with, they can make a bigger fool yet of him," observed Schnarcher, with a ghastly grin on his puckered face.

Somehow, there had come to be a shade of constraint and ill-humor over the company, which nothing but a temporary separation would dissipate. One by one the guests rose to go, each man first putting on his hat, and then immediately taking it off again in parting salutation.

"Have you any commands in Detmold, Herr Landlord?" asked Peters, pausing at the door. The apothecary had eased his spare form in a long coat with a sheep-skin collar and cuffs, and peered out from beneath a cloth cap which left but little of his face visible save his sharp pink nose.

"BUT I SAY," CRIED PETERS, THE APOTHECARY, IN A HIGH, THIN VOICE, "I SAY THAT THE WORLD WON'T STAND STILL, WHATEVER WE MAY WISH!"

"In Detmold? Ay, ay! Are you going to Detmold?"

"Yes, to-morrow, to buy drugs."

"I wish, Herr Peters," said Farmer Lehmann, "that you would do us the kindness to take a little bit of a parcel for our Lieschen. My wife has put some fal-lals together that the child needs, she tells me."

"Surely. I shall be driving by your place on my road, and I'll call for the parcel. Good-night."

Old Schnarcher hobbled out side by side with the apothecary. They walked together for some distance up the wide, dark, silent street. "Lehmann's Liese," muttered the sacristan, bitterly. "There's another of 'em."

"Another of what, Herr Küster?" was his companion's not unnatural query.

"Another of the pretty sly minxes that make fools of their betters."

"Lieschen is a right, good, honest little maiden," protested Peters. His general misogyny did not prevent him from making exceptions in favor of certain individuals of the sex.

"Bah!" cried the old man, savagely. I can not render on paper the sound he uttered. It was more like the bark of an angry dog than any thing else. "Don't tell me! They're none of 'em good for much, but the pretty ones are the devil!"

Peters took this outbreak very much as a matter of course. He possessed a clew which enabled him to understand Simon Schnarcher's bitter humor. To make the reader understand it also must be the object of my endeavors in the following chapter.

CHAPTER II.

UNCLE AND NEPHEW.

OTTO HEMMERICH's father, the head-ranger, had married in a way that had gravely offended his uncle, old Simon Schnarcher. The head-ranger had lived a bachelor until he was close upon thirty years old, and had then wedded a pretty penniless peasant girl.

The sacristan of the parish church in an obscure, insignificant German town was not likely to be a rich man. But by dint of saving and scraping throughout the course of a solitary life, Simon Schnarcher had gathered some money together, and was popularly supposed to have gathered more. He had inherited a house and a piece of garden-land, and lived upon his own small domain. His connection with the church, and the rigidity of his Protestant orthodoxy, were considered in Horn to be extremely respectable. He had, too, that strong faith in his own wisdom and the foolishness of almost every body else which helped him, as it has helped many another man, to impose his will upon those around him. So that altogether Simon Schnarcher was little accustomed to meet with opposition either in word or deed. But one day his nephew and presumptive heir fell in love; and being in love, became at once insensible to the Solomonic precepts and authoritative advice with which the sacristan favored him on the subject of marriage.

In brief, he took to wife little Lotte Müller—Little Lotte Müller, whose brown bare feet were acquainted with every tangled path in the forest, and whose short, agile figure he had often furtively watched as she carried food to her father, the charcoal-burner. It was a connection entirely distasteful to Schnarcher, and he looked upon his nephew's marriage as a piece of unspeakable folly. Hemmerich, on the contrary, always declared that marrying Lotte had been the one wise action of his life. At all events, wise or unwise, he never once repented it up to the day of his wife's death. But this did not prevent old Simon from considering the marriage a very foolish one all the same. His nephew had been bewitched, he said, by a pretty face and an artful assumption of gentleness and simplicity. It was in vain to urge that Lotte the matron continued to be as simple and as gentle as Lotte the maiden had been. That was her cunning, said Simon. "It would be well then if other folks could be as cunning! Lotte's cunning makes my life sweet and my home happy," retorted Hemmerich. And then the uncle and nephew had quarreled seriously, and had ceased to speak to each other. After eight peaceful, happy years of married life, Lotte died, leaving to the care of her bereaved husband a little son named Otto. Many of the least personally selfish among women have a keen, shrewd eye to the main chance on behalf of those whom they love. For herself Lotte Hemmerich desired nothing. For her husband and Otto she could be almost greedy. The estrangement between Hemmerich and his uncle had given her many an uneasy and self-reproachful thought.

Had it not been for her, Hemmerich would still have been the heir to all the sacristan's savings. And when her son was born these regrets became intensified. But all her efforts to bring about a reconciliation between the uncle and nephew were unavailing. Hemmerich resented the terms in which Schnarcher had spoken of his wife, and the old man would neither recall his words nor yield an inch in any way. After his wife's death the head-ranger was still less inclined to seek his uncle with words of humility on his lips. To have done so would have appeared, he fancied, like a slight to Lotte's memory. He devoted himself exclusively to his boy, refusing to be separated from him even for a moment. The little Otto was his father's companion in all excursions through the wild woodland country which the nature of his avocations required him frequently to traverse.

Many a moonlit night saw them threading the forest paths side by side. Sometimes the little one was perched on his father's shoulder; but more often his short, pattering footsteps rustled ankle-deep in fallen leaves, and his shrill, childish voice, mimicking the hunter's cry, awoke the sylvan echoes and startled the drowsy deer from their lair.

A strong vein of romance ran through Hemmerich's character. He was a man of some education, and had the love of reading which may be said to be almost a national characteristic of Germany. Active as his life necessarily was, there were many hours of the long winter evenings when the lonely lodge in the forest sent forth a bright red glow from its windows, and in the shine of the flaming pine-logs sat the head-ranger, with his boy on the hearth at his feet, the father reading or reciting aloud some old ballad or more modern poem, while the son employed his strong, skillful young hands in cleaning a pet rifle, or in manufacturing some cunning spring to snare the woodland creatures. Hemmerich had, too, a store of legends. Many were such as are to be found throughout Germany, stories of wild huntsmen and magic bullets, of witch meetings and ghostly apparitions. But these were not Otto's favorites. He had not the dreaminess that formed part of his father's nature. The legends Otto loved were those which related the exploits, the vicissitudes, and final triumph of the German hero Hermann. The story of the Teuton chief's patriotic resistance to the Romans, and of his great victory over Varus, was one to which the boy was never weary of listening. And often in the summer dawn he would climb the commanding height whereon the Hermann's denkmal—monument—stands, and watching the sunshine creep over the wide plain spread beneath him, make high resolves in his boyish heart that should the day ever come to test his patriotism, he, too, would be ready to fight and fall for fatherland.

This wild forest life was Otto's until he was nearly twelve years old; and by that time he knew the haunts and habits of every sort of bird, beast, and reptile that dwells in the great leafy solitudes of Lippe-Detmold. Then came a change.

And accident, which it imports nothing to my story to relate in detail, brought the sacristan into contact with his grand-nephew, and the old man performed on that occasion an unprecedented act of generosity. He permitted the lad to fill his pockets from the ripe red store of apples on a tree in his own garden, and sent Otto home to the hunting-lodge in the forest, where his father dwelt, to give an account of the interview, which surprised the head-ranger not a little.

Men seldom avow their motives. And the good motives are quite as often disavowed as the bad ones. Simon would not have confessed it, but the real cause which produced in him the unaccustomed effect of kindness lay in a strong resemblance that young Otto Hemmerich bore to his great-aunt. The wrinkled, crabbed, grasping old sacristan had once been a young, smooth-cheeked boy, whose shortcomings were hidden, and whose selfish faults were condoned, by a kind, motherly elder sister, named Dorothea. Now little Otto, in some expressions of his frank face, was the living image of his dead great-aunt, this very Dorothea.

After the boy had gone home Simon Schnarcher sat musing until his pipe was cold. And there appeared before him out of the mist of the vanished years a sweet grave face and a girlish figure, to which a large family of younger brothers and sisters habitually turned for help and comfort in every trouble—from a stocking that needed darning to an unfortunate attachment.

"Dorothea was a good woman," murmured the sacristan. "There are no women like my sister Dorothea nowadays. I'm glad that boy doesn't resemble his mother's family."

Little more than a fortnight had elapsed when the tidings came into Horn that Head-ranger Hemmerich had been attacked and badly wounded by a stag, and that he lay on what the doctor pronounced must be his death-bed. Otto's devotion to his father was the theme of talk for many a mile round. The doctor, in the course of his daily visits, sounded Otto's praises unwearingly, and thus there was much sympathy aroused for the motherless lad, and many speculations were afloat as to what would become of him when his father should be dead. These speculations were set at rest in a manner entirely unexpected by the good people of Horn. The day after his father's funeral Otto Hemmerich was installed as an inmate in the sacristan's somewhat gloomy house, and within a fortnight he had become a regular attendant at the principal school of the place, and had apparently settled down unresistingly into a life as different as it is possible to conceive from that which he had led hitherto.

How all this had been brought about neither Schnarcher nor the boy ever troubled themselves to relate, and there was consequently a good deal of disappointment among the gossips. But the matter had been very simple, and the reader may be put in possession of it in a few words.

The old man had visited his dying nephew, and had offered to adopt and educate Otto—should the boy be left fatherless—to make him his heir, and, in short, to place him in the position which Hemmerich had forfeited by his marriage. The situation of his son had been Hemmerich's chief anxiety. He was not afraid to die, but he was afraid to leave Otto unprotected in the world; and he suffered some pangs of conscience, which gave him more pain than his wounds, from the consideration that Otto's education had not been such as to fit him to help himself. The sacristan's offer was at once gratefully accepted by the dying man, who declared, and truly, that it had taken a load from his heart. But it was not found quite so easy to induce Otto to acquiesce in this arrangement. He shrank with the horror of some wild, untamed creature of the woods—and such in truth he was—from the idea of being shut up in a city. To him

Horn was a city—nay, more, a prison. All arguments based upon his own welfare and interest fell powerless upon the weeping boy, who clung to his father's hand, and implored him not to send him away.

"Not as long as I last, my Otto. You shall stay with father to the end."

"But you won't die, father!—I'm sure you won't die! And if you were to be taken away, I don't care what becomes of me. I would rather be left alone here in the forest."

Then Hemmerich explained how great an anxiety the thought of his son's helpless condition had been to him, and how Simon Schnarcher's offer had relieved his conscience of a heavy load. "I haven't done my duty by you, my Otto," said he; "but you must help me to do it now, like a brave boy as you are. And besides, your blessed mother always wished so earnestly that my uncle and I should be reconciled."

"I will do whatever you tell me, father," whispered Otto, after a pause. And when the time came for fulfilling this pledge the boy kept his word to the letter.

Otto never uttered a complaint; and indeed his great-uncle was agreeably surprised by the quiet, almost stolid way in which he accepted all the somewhat stringent regulations that were laid down for his conduct, and by the implicit obedience with which he endeavored to comply with them. But no human being knew or guessed the sufferings undergone by the lonely boy during the early days of his new life. Perhaps Herr Peters, the apothecary, came nearer than any one else to understanding him. There had grown up a sort of intimacy between the apothecary and Otto when the latter was in the habit of coming frequently to the Apotheke in Horn to get medicines for his father; and Peters comprehended somewhat of the suppressed feelings which the lad hid instinctively from unsympathizing eyes.

"Some birds can't live in cages," said the apothecary, looking at Otto's downcast face, and shaking his head. But boys are not birds; and thoroughly healthy children of twelve years old do not—Heaven be praised!—pine away and die of grief. So Otto Hemmerich grew and thrived, and gradually reconciled himself to his new existence. But the old free woodland life never lost its hold on his heart. Not a holiday passed, wet or dry, without his revisiting some of the well-loved forest-haunts that his father had taught him to know. For book-learning, to say truth, Otto Hemmerich showed no special bent; but in all sports or employments requiring personal courage, strength, or dexterity, he reigned supreme over his school-fellows by virtue of undisputed superiority.

Simon Schnarcher's theory of the education and bringing-up of young people did not, as may be supposed, err on the side of soft indulgence. Absolute, unquestioning obedience he exacted from his grand-nephew; and the lad's docility and natural sound-heartedness were such as to enable the sacristan to boast loudly—behind Otto's back—of the successful results of old-fashioned strictness in training and educating children. By degrees old Schnarcher grew to look upon Otto's good qualities and extended popularity in the neighborhood as being the direct results of his—Schnarcher's—profound wisdom. "Ah," he would say, shaking his head solemnly, "if Otto's father, my poor nephew Hemmerich, could but have had the advantage of being brought up by me, things would have gone differently, I promise you. You won't catch Otto disgracing himself by marrying a barefooted peasant-wench!"

Once some such word escaped him in Otto's presence, and the boy rose up instantly with such a fire of indignation in his young face as made the old man quail for a moment—albeit he had a stubborn will and tough nerves of his own—and declared that another word of disrespect to the memory of his dead mother would send him forth from that house forever, though he had to beg his bread on the highways.

"Tush!" cried Schnarcher, "you're a fool, boy." But he deemed it prudent to say no more about Otto's mother.

This was the first occasion on which old Simon Schnarcher had had a glimpse of the reserve-force of courage and decision that lay quietly beneath Otto's habitual gentleness. The feeling with which he discovered the existence of these unsuspected qualities was, strange to say, not altogether one of displeasure. Contest was very agreeable to Simon's nature. He looked forward with some zest to the task of battling with, and overcoming, his nephew's spirit. The idea that the victory might possibly be the other way never once entered his head. However, matters went on peaceably enough until Otto reached an age at which it was necessary to decide on his future calling in life. Then Schnarcher informed him, as one who pronounces an irrevocable decree, that he was to go into the church, and that the necessary funds would be forthcoming to complete his education with that view. "But, uncle," returned Otto, "I can not be a pastor; I have no taste for preaching and teaching. I know I could not be a good pastor, and I will not be a bad one." Astonishment made the sacristan quite meek for the moment.

"Might I inquire, Sir," he asked, with deceptive calmness, "what business in life you do intend to follow?"

"I should like best to be a Jäger, a huntsman and forester, like my father. But I will do whatever you desire as far as I can. As to being a pastor, that I can not do."

The storm that followed needs not to be described, but once more Simon retreated from the conflict, telling himself that it was absurd to argue with a mere boy, and that his will would surely prevail in the end. With this idea Otto was sent to college. Going to college in Germany is quite a different matter from being matriculated at Oxford or Cambridge. It implies—to mention one difference alone—no such social status as is, speaking broadly, understood among ourselves in the phrase, "a University man." Otto went to Halle, and returned to Lippe-Detmold from Halle; but he was as far as ever from consenting to embrace the profession on which his uncle had determined for him. Then the old man's heart became full to overflowing of bitterness and disappointment. He found himself baffled, and by one whom he had cited as the model result of his own training. In his anger he recalled Otto's words, "I will do whatever you desire as far as I can."

"If you are not a pastor you shall be a tradesman," said Simon. "There can be no scruples of conscience against that!"

The sacristan lost no time in going over to Detmold to see an old acquaintance of his there, a bookseller and stationer. It was agreed between them that Otto should be bound to the bookseller for three years as his assistant, and Schnarcher returned in triumph to announce this arrangement to his grand-nephew. For not only to the outside world, but to Otto himself, Schnarcher kept up the fiction that all was going in accordance with his will. "I have changed my mind about you," he announced with autocratic brevity, and the young man made no protest against the form of words. He did desire to obey his uncle as far as he conscientiously might do so. In refusing to become a pastor, it is possible that his conscience may have been invigorated by a strain of the family obstinacy.

Affairs were in this position on the September night when I introduced my reader to the Speise-Saal of the Pied Lamb. And Herr Peters's thoughts were running much upon his friend the sacristan's family affairs as the apothecary drove the next morning out of Horn behind his corpulent, old white pony.

CHAPTER III.

A LIPPE-DETMOLD FARM.

THE road from Horn to Detmold lies in great part through a country rich with noble woods. It winds along with gentle rolling undulations of hill and dale, skirted by beech, oak, pine, and birch trees. September had dyed the varied foliage with lavish wealth of color. The sun shone brightly out of a pale blue sky, and there was enough autumnal crispness in the air to make the sense of motion exhilarating. Herr Peters, the apothecary, jogged along pleasantly behind his plump pony. The roads were hard and smooth, so that the wheels of the clumsy chaise rolled over them very easily. In fact it would have given the pony more trouble to walk than to trot; therefore the pony trotted. Peters was very glad that the old Schimmel chose to go somewhat briskly, and I may say felt grateful for his steed's unwonted alacrity; for both man and beast knew right well that the Schimmel would not under any circumstances be incited to mend his pace by flogging.

I have said that the apothecary's thoughts were running on Simon Schnarcher's family affairs. He thought of the sacristan's angry bitterness in last night's talk. He thought of Otto, and wondered how the young fellow would endure life behind a counter in Detmold. He reflected that the new arrangement would content neither uncle nor nephew; for it is scarcely needful to say that old Schnarcher's pretense that there was not, and never could be, any question of disputing his will, imposed on none of his old friends and neighbors.

"Otto wants to be a forester, like his father," said Peters to himself. "Simon wants him to be a pastor. But the sacristan compromises matters by making the lad a tradesman, which pleases neither of them. Simon Schnarcher is a long-headed man, but in this I think him wrong. In his place, if I could not please myself, I would please the lad, instead of vexing both myself and him for nothing." But in so saying Herr Peters showed very little knowledge of human nature in general, and of his friend Schnarcher's nature in particular. In the midst of his meditations Peters arrived before the house of Farmer Franz Lehmann, and pulled up the pony rather suddenly. The Lehmann's house was an admirable specimen of a kind of dwelling which, as far as I know, is peculiar to Lippe-Detmold and the country immediately adjoining the little principality. In my first chapter I said that I should presently have occasion to describe with some minuteness one of the great buildings which give a distinctive character to the rural architecture of Lippe, and I can not better fulfill that intention than in placing before my reader, with what vividness I can command, a picture of the singular old homestead wherein the family of the Lehmanns had dwelt for generations.

A great, nearly square, timber-framed, brick building, low at the overhanging eaves, but with a sloping roof so extraordinarily and disproportionately vast as to run up to the height of a tall, three-storied house at its sharp apex. This roof is of bright red tiles, just sufficiently weather-stained and moss-grown to be picturesquely mellow in their tone of color. The cross-timbers of the house beneath are black, and rudely, though lavishly carved, the interstices between them being painted a warm cream color. The building, although nearly square, is not quite so, and stands with its narrowest side, or gable-end, toward the road. In the middle of this gable-end yawns an enormously wide and lofty arched doorway, the centre of which is precisely beneath the topmost angle of the towering roof; and the long lines of tiling slope rapidly down on either hand, and terminate in projecting eaves not more than ten feet from the ground. The reason for making so seemingly disproportionate an entrance as the great arch with its heavy wooden folding-doors is not apparent until you step within the threshold, but then it becomes at once obvious. The whole centre of the building is a large and lofty barn, piled high with hay and straw and store of grain. It is, too, a store-house for farm implements, and so huge are its proportions that a harvest wagon laden with sheaves, and drawn by three or four sturdy horses, can pass easily through the doorway, and stand beneath its ample shelter. From the barn, which entirely occupies the central length and breadth of the building, is the only possible ingress to the dwelling-house. On the right hand and on the left are doors and windows giving access to the living and sleeping rooms of the family. Nearly all the light and air which reach these apartments gain admission through the wide-open double doors of the barn. Nearly all the light and air; but in the special dwelling which I am endeavoring to describe there was a range of small lattice casements under the eaves, into which the last low rays of the setting sun managed to penetrate. The majority of these barn-dwellings have absolutely no exterior windows whatsoever. And the existence of Farmer Lehmann's casements was by many persons considered to be rather a disadvantage than an advantage.

"It is so snug when there are no windows outside," said the Lippe-Detmolders, "and the barn keeps the house right warm. There is no stove so good as a barn full of straw." Which was doubtless all very true, granting—that the Lippe-Detmolders mostly assumed—that fresh air is neither necessary nor desirable. However, in a purely picturesque sense, no one could deny that the little diamond-paned lattices, half buried in vine leaves, improved the aspect of the dwelling immensely. Farmer Lehmann's was an old house, and the vine trained over one side of it was old too, and rich in leaves, if not in grapes. The aspect of the farm-yard would, I fear, have disgusted an English farmer. There was a great dung-hill at one side of the door, and an indescribably filthy pond, wherein some fat ducks disported themselves with obvious enjoyment. Three or four mild-eyed cows with steaming nostrils stood knee-deep in litter by the closed cattle-shed. A mastiff lay blinking in front of his kennel, and barked now and then at the passers-by in a lazy, muffled voice. A family of lean, long-legged pigs was busily investigating the delicacies of a heap of heterogeneous scraps flung out from the kitchen; cocks and hens promenaded, with the self-sufficient air peculiar to their species, in and out and about the barn; and on the high-peaked roof a tribe of patriarchal pigeons cooed and sunned their shining wings. Over the doorway was carved an inscription, which, as it is a fair sample of many similar inscriptions in the country, I may here translate: "Within is goodly store of food for man and beast. Behold, nowhere shall you find a garner fuller filled, or more overflowing with abundance. Gerhard Lehmann and Marthe Sieger, his wife, built this dwelling, and placed this inscription to the honor and glory of Almighty God, in the year 1679. He openeth His hand, and all things living are filled with good."

The sound of wheels on the hard road, and the barking of the old mastiff, brought Franz Lehmann to the door, and he advanced to greet Peters.

"Welcome, Herr Apothecary. I take it friendly of you not to forget us. So-ho, old Schimmel! You'd better drive right into the barn, Herr Peters. The threshing-floor is clear now, and 'tis ill standing still in this sharp air for either man or beast."

In this view of the case the fat pony appeared to coincide, for he immediately set off unguided for the shelter of the barn, taking the shortest line for the attainment of his object, and thereby tilting up the chaise and Herr Peters in it at a dangerous angle, as the wheels bumped heavily over heaps of refuse, and splashed through the duck-pond. However, steed and driver arrived safely within the great warm barn, and there Peters alighted to pay his respects to the Haus-frau. To this end he accompanied the farmer through one of the little low doors that opened from the barn, and passed into a long, stone-flagged kitchen. It was lighted on one side by three of the outer vine-draped casements, and on the other by two square, unglazed apertures near the roof, which were at this moment almost blocked up by a towering pile of wheat-sacks in the barn. On the floor were ranged a quantity of wide, shallow baskets filled with ruddy apples; and at an oaken dresser stood the Haus-frau and two sturdy maidens, peeling, coring, and cutting up the fruit, which was handed to them as they needed it by a barefooted little goose-herd, temporarily pressed into the domestic service. The farmer's wife dropped her knife and wiped her hands on her apron before offering one of them to her visitor.

"Ach je, Herr Peters!" she exclaimed, with as much astonishment in her voice as though she had not been expecting him all the morning, "now this is kind! I have the parcel ready for Lieschen—a small parcel it is—only a couple of neckerchiefs, real Manchester print they are"—I would that I could convey to my reader any idea of the sound Frau Lehmann made in uttering the word Manchester—"and two pairs of worsted stockings—a bit darned, it's true, but my own knitting, and real warm for winter wear; and I'm sure the child will be thankful to you, Herr Apothecary, for taking the trouble to carry them to her; for as to me, there ain't much chance of my getting to Detmold this side Christmas, and all the hams to cure, and—only see—the apple compôte but just begun, as one may say!"

Frau Lehmann uttered all this with great rapidity, and in the high cackling voice peculiar to uneducated German women; and when she paused for breath she wiped her hands once more on her cotton apron. She was a bony, active, hard-featured woman, with a shrewish light in her gray eyes, and her serving-maids were obviously afraid of her.

"I will do your errand willingly, Frau Lehmann," said Peters; "the more so that little Liese was always a favorite of mine from the first day I saw her."

"Ah, poor little maid," broke in the farmer, "how small and strange she looked among us all that first evening I brought her here! But she was so sweet in her temper and so soft and handy in her ways, that—"

"There, there, that's Franz Lehmann all over," said the mistress of the house, sharply. She was tying an extra string round the parcel to be sent to Detmold, and gave it as she spoke so sudden a jerk that it snapped. "Franz Lehmann, once he gets on one of his hobbies, will talk and prose and dream for an hour, and the precious minutes galloping away all the time, and every thing to do and to see to. Liese was small and strange then, sure enough; and she's small and strange now, for that matter! Nobody in all this world but Franz Lehmann would have thought of saddling himself with other folks' children, as if there wasn't mouths enough to feed already, and the boys especially, eating one out of house and home."

The little goose-herd, knowing himself to be one of the omnivorous boys in question, was so overwhelmed with confusion at being thus publicly alluded to, that he let fall an armful of apples, which rolled swiftly in various directions. And under cover of the consequent confusion, Peters made a hasty farewell and withdrew, bearing the parcel for which he had come. Lehmann accompanied him to the chaise, and walked at the pony's head as far as the high-road. The farmer broke silence only when they had reached the boundary of his own land.

"You won't take any notice of what my old woman says about Lieschen, Herr Peters?"

"Not at all," said the apothecary; but he had not a very clear idea of his own meaning.

"You see my old woman she's—she's an excellent body. Not a better wife in the principality. There ain't many housewives that would be as kind to a stranger's child, brought home to her without 'with your leave,' or 'by your leave,' as she has been to Lieschen. Are there, now?"

"N—no," answered Peters, the misogynist, "I don't think women mostly are kind to other folks' children."

"Well, there it is, you see, Herr Apothecary. We never had no little ones of our own; not to live, that is. Our only babe, she didn't stay many days in this world, and it well-nigh broke Hanne's heart. She has a sharp way with her sometimes, has Hanne; but, dear Heaven! if you had seen her then. Well, then, you understand, when I brought home little Lieschen, and said, 'Wife, this is the child of a dear dead cousin of mine, and we must give her shelter and home with us,' why, she just looked at the little one, and burst out a-crying, and got up and went away without a word. When she came back again she fed and tended the child right motherly, and she's done well by her ever since."

"I suppose Lieschen went to service at Detmold quite of her own will, then?"

Franz Lehmann's honest face grew a shade graver as he answered, "Yes; of her own will? Yes. It was better for her not to stay at home. Lieschen never was fit for hard country work, and my old woman keeps her lasses pretty tight to it. Then Hanne said I should spoil the maiden, and make a fool of her. Mayhap I might. But what I really think," added the farmer, confidentially, lowering his voice, "is that it fretted my old woman a bit to see me so fond of Lieschen. She was—"

"Jealous," suggested Peters, with a nod.

"Well, jealous, if you like, but in a queer kind of a way. My belief is that every time I patted the child's head, or took her on my knee, Hanne thought of her own little daughter, and what she might have been if the Lord had spared her to us, and felt somehow as if I was robbing the little dead babe—poor lamb! by—There, I can't speak it out clear, but I've got it all in my head like print."

However little the apothecary might agree with Frau Lehmann on most points, he could not but sympathize with her impatience of her husband's tendency to prose. Franz stood bareheaded, with his hand on the pony's mane, and his blue eyes placidly staring at vacancy, apparently unconscious of a keen north wind which made Peters sink his face deeper and deeper into his sheep-skin collar. Peters was a mild and irresolute man. He wanted to proceed on his journey, but he did not know how to arrest the flow of Lehmann's slow, musing utterances. The old Schimmel, however, was neither mild nor irresolute, and having by this time finished munching a mouthful of hay surreptitiously extracted from a truss in the barn, and feeling, moreover, rather chilly, he rid himself of Lehmann's hand on his mane by a vigorous shake of the head, and started off down the road at a round pace. The chaise had rolled some distance before Peters could pull up the Schimmel to listen to something which the farmer was calling after him.

"Heart's love to my little Lieschen. And hark ye, Herr Apothecary, you must promise to come and eat roast goose with us this winter. You've never tasted my old woman's apple compôte! Real good she makes it. Don't forget."

"Apple compôte!" muttered Peters. "I'd rather have peace and quiet to sweeten the roast goose than any sauce yonder shrew could make. I know she'd turn the fruit sour only by looking at it." But he nodded a sort of assent, and waved his hand to the farmer, who was still standing bareheaded in the road. And then the pony, whose small stock of complaisance was now exhausted, broke into a determined trot, and went steadily at his own pace until they reached Detmold.

A DRAWING-ROOM BALLAD.

In the dawn of a golden morrow
May Marguerite went away;
Naught of sin or sorrow
Had touched that perfumed clay.

Each morning sweeter and whiter,
In the city dark she grew;
Here, as in places brighter,
The clouds rain down such dew.

The splendor and power of Nature
Rank'd little in her sight;
She was a city creature,
Smiling by candle-light.

The nooks where Love might meet her,
Fashion from sunshine shrouds;
Yet her hue than roses was sweeter,
Her motion was like a cloud's.

Wherever the gas glared brightly
May Marguerite tript and flew,
O'er the flower'd carpet as lightly
As if it blossom'd and blew.

Under her gentle seeing,
In her delicate little hand,
They placed the Book of Being,
To read and understand.

The Book was mighty and olden,
Yea, worn and eaten with age;
Though the letters looked great and golden,
She could not read a page.

The letters flutter'd before her,
And all look'd sweetly wild:
Death saw her, and bent o'er her,
As she pouted her lips and smiled.

And weary a little with tracing
The Book, she look'd aside,
And lightly smiling, and placing
A flower in its leaves, she died.

She died—but her sweetness fled not,
As fly the things of power—
For the Book wherein she read not
Is the sweeter for the flower.

PARIS CORRESPONDENCE.

THE Imperial family live at Fontainebleau in a very retired manner. The Emperor gives few audiences, and the Empress still fewer. Her ordinary costume is simple enough; for the last few days she has worn a dress of periwinkle taffeta, with high neck and long sleeves, and a broad sash slightly looping up the skirt, and forming puffs behind. The neck and sleeves of the dress are trimmed with a narrow quilling of silk. She is very partial to a chignon of curls, and scarcely ever wears any thing else, except on horseback.

The Emperor is very often in country negligé; a light cloth jacket, and a small round hat of gray felt, with a few jay-feathers. His principal amusement consists in digging holes in the ground with an American tube, and pumping in search of springs.

The Empress has conceived a liking for the velocipede exercise, which is at this time very much in fashion at Paris. She rides in the park, and makes tolerably long excursions into the country with her mechanical steeds. Ladies' velocipedes differ from those of gentlemen inasmuch as the riders are seated more firmly therein, and move the whole apparatus by turning a sort of crank with the right hand. The rapidity thus obtained is not, however, so great as that of the ordinary velocipedes.

The Emperor is very partial to the town of Fontainebleau; he does as much good there, it is said, as his overtaxed purse permits him; for although the Emperor has a civil list of twenty-four million francs, and two millions from the Imperial domains, he is almost always straitened for money; and this is not surprising when we remember that he has to defray the entire equipment and pay of the Hundred Guards, the salaries of all his military household and civil employés, and the expenses of the Louvre, the Tuileries, and all the Imperial parks of France, together with those of his private estates, his stables, etc.; that he is compelled besides on a multitude of occasions, such as journeys and others, to leave tokens of his munificence every where on the way; and that he also gives liberally for the relief of all unforeseen calamities, such as fires, inundations, and the like, so that really little is left for the multiplicity of other demands that are made on all sides; which is often painful to him, for he is very susceptible to pity.

The Emperor, who is very difficult of access at Paris, gives audience at Fontainebleau, if not with more readiness, at least with greater kindness, to those persons whose positions do not permit them to be received in private by him. Very little ceremony is used in these audiences. An aid-de-camp, a chamberlain, or any other person patronizing the petitioner, introduces him into the Emperor's cabinet, announces him by name, and withdraws. The Emperor is usually seated on the low causeuse which figures in the celebrated picture of Gros, with an ugly little stand in front of him loaded with papers, and on which he leans his elbow. If the person received is not a woman he almost always smokes, and with his head inclining one side, and a calm and affable expression, listens to the request that is presented to him, and generally gives it an encouraging answer, but in very few words, slowly uttered. It is rarely that an audience lasts more than ten minutes. He then rises, walks to the mantle-piece, and leans his elbow on it, showing that the audience is closed. With the Empress it is very different; people find great difficulty in gaining access to her, but, once received, they can talk almost at their ease, and she often detains for a very long while the persons who chance to please her.

Although deprived of a court, Paris still beholds a few receptions, but for the most part private, though some are sumptuous, as for instance the ball lately given by Djemil-Pacha, the Ottoman ambassador. In the absence of the empress the Princess de Metternich had consented to do the honors. She set the example of the relative simplicity of summer entertainments. Her white skirt had neither flowers nor lace; her corsage and tunic of yellow silk were trimmed with clusters of yellow glycine and trailing sprays of bright colored rosebuds. She wore absolutely nothing in her hair; two very long curls fell on her shoulders on each side. The diplomatic world were naturally almost all at the house of the Sultan's ambassador, together with almost all the beautiful Parisiennes of the day. It appeared to us, however, that the crown of beauty was carried off this time by American ladies. Among those who made a real sensation was Mrs. Post, in cherry silk, with deep lace flounces caught up en tunique by clusters of rose du Roi, the Misses Beckwith in blue and white, and Miss Sims in pink striped Chambery gauze. The Turkish, or rather Armenian, ladies displayed a very original taste in the choice of their dresses. We will instance a Circassian lady, Madame Domate, in a yellow satin skirt covered with a long black lace tunic and sprinkled with pansies of all shades; Madame Della Suda, in blue gauze dotted with simple daisies, with no ornaments in her hair; and thick black curls falling around her face; and lastly, Madame Dus-Oglou, in pink silk, with a white lace tunic scalloped around the bottom over a bright pink dress. Madame Paskiewitch, the beautiful Russian who most particularly attracted the Sultan's attention, was simply dressed in gray Chambery gauze, with no ornaments in her hair; her corsage was very low, displaying the most beautiful shoulders imaginable. The ambassador seemed to wear on his own person the precious stones that had deserted the ladies' dresses; his straight, blue Turkish frock, with gold inlaid buttons, was completely bedizened with gold, and embroidered as elaborately on the back as in front, beginning at the shoulders and running down to a point at the waist; his breast was covered with the diamond stars of almost all the great orders of Europe, across which was thrown the grand cordon of Medjidia, a green ribbon edged with white, which formed a brilliant contrast to this glittering back-ground; and he wore on his head that ugly red cap, with a long blue tassel, which is improperly called a fez, and the true name of which is tarbouche. The ambassador, Djemil-Pacha, has great regularity of features, and that languishing yet cruel eye which so often accompanies Oriental beauty. He did the honors of his ball with that affable nonchalance which is habitual to him, and which stimulated the vivacity of the Princess de Metternich. The arrangement of the festival was magnificent. Part of the garden had been transformed into a ball-room. The heat rendered it necessary not only to open the windows but even to draw aside the curtains with which they were shrouded, so that the late promenaders returning from the Bois de Boulogne, passing along the Rue de Presbourg and the Avenue de l'Imperatrice, could easily look into the ball-room. Despite a Senegal temperature the guests kept up till daybreak the liveliest cotillions, well conducted by the secretary of the ambassador, M. Haudy Bey, and Madame Dus-Oglou. Supper was taken standing at a magnificent buffet, which, after having been loaded till one o'clock in the morning with the most exquisite sherberts, was suddenly transformed, and appeared covered with a quantity of substantial dishes. The invitations differed from those usually given on such occasions, and read thus:

"On the occasion of the anniversary of the accession to the throne of his Highness, the Sultan, Abdul Medjid, entreates the company of M— at a festival that he will give—"

The ball had been preceded by a grand state dinner, at which the ambassadors or their representatives were present. The absence of Prince Richard Metternich was remarked. He was engaged, it was said, at a select dinner given by Count d'Ormont, where Madames de Pourtales, de Gallifet, etc., were likewise present, without their husbands. There is a great deal of gossip just now about the journey of the Marquis de Caux, the husband of the celebrated Patti. It is said that the Emperor was willing to lend him horses from his stables to take to London. People ask how it is that the celebrated Marquis has obtained such special favor; if by leading the Court cotillions, it is an advantageous thing to learn how to glide adroitly over the slippery floors of palaces.

THE WOMAN QUESTION IN RUSSIA.

THE Courrier Français, a French journal, having recently stated that England was the first to emancipate the negro, and would be the first to emancipate women, the Nord takes it to task for this assertion, and declares that the latter work has already been accomplished by Russia. In that country, it says, the emancipation exists, and always has existed, husband and wife being two persons entirely independent of each other in the eyes of the civil law. The husband not only can not dispose of the property of his wife, but she herself may dispose of it without consulting him in any way. Politically, too, there is complete equality between the two; and if the wife possesses the necessary property qualification, she can vote for the election of members to the provincial general councils newly instituted, her sex being no obstacle to the exercise of the right. It will thus be seen that in this question England has merely to follow—Russia having already led the way.

Close-Fitting Lace Paletot.

This lace paletot is without sleeves, and is trimmed around the neck and arm-holes with two pleated rows of lace, which are arranged in the manner shown by the illustration. A belt of black silk and lace completes the paletot. This paletot may also be made of guipure net or figured tulle, or may be lined with colored silk.

Chemisette with Revers and Cuffs.

See illustration, page 649.

This chemisette, with cuffs to match, is made of fine double linen, edged with a strip of brown and white striped percale an inch in width, which is set on so as to simulate a binding. A strip of brown percale, a quarter of an inch wide, is stitched on over the seam. Cut for the collar one piece from Fig. 30, and for the cuff one piece from Fig. 31. The collar is joined to a chemisette of Swiss muslin, the pattern of which is given by Figs. 28 and 29. The front of the chemisette is fastened with buttons and button-holes. The cuffs may be worn alone, or may be fastened to muslin sleeves.

Swiss Muslin and Tatting Cravat Collar.

See illustration, page 649.

This cravat collar consists of a straight piece of muslin twenty-four inches in length by an inch and a half in width, both ends of which are rounded and ornamented with a tatted rosette, and the whole is edged with a tatted lace. It is fastened in front by means of a button and button-hole, and set over the binding of the chemisette. We have given several patterns of tatted rosettes in previous Numbers which may be used for this purpose.

Crochet Bathing Slipper.

See illustration, page 652.

MATERIALS: Gray and red twisted worsted, scarlet flannel, cork soles, scarlet worsted braid an inch wide.

The original is made of scarlet and gray worsted in knitted crochet stitch. The illustration shows a section of the crochet work of the full size. In working the knitted crochet stitch, which is formed of single crochet, always put the needle through the back vein of each stitch of the former round, by means of which both upper veins stand out on the right side; every round is always begun on the same side. The illustrations show the shape of the upper and the sole. Begin the slipper at the toe of the upper with a foundation of fifteen stitches. Passing over the first stitch, work back on this * with gray worsted 4 sc. (single crochet), finish the last with scarlet worsted, crochet 1 sc. with scarlet worsted, finish this with the gray which has been left on the wrong side, and repeat from * to the end of the round. The following three rounds are worked in the same manner; but in these, as in all the remaining rounds, the work must be widened or narrowed according to the requirements of the pattern. It must be observed that the scarlet stitches always come one above the other. The fifth round is worked entirely of scarlet. From now on follow alternately four rounds like the first four, and one scarlet round, which forms the square design that is seen in the illustration. When the upper has reached the requisite height leave the twenty middle stitches without further attention, and work on each side of this the pointed sides of the upper. Finish by two rounds single crochet in gray worsted around the upper edge.

SCARF MANTILLA.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. I., Fig. 1.

The sole is made of twine; Fig. 41 gives the pattern. Begin this also at the toe by knotting button-hole stitch over a piece of twine of the requisite length, then make a new loop backward and forward in every loop of the last round. Work each row over a foundation of the twine, which is to be run from one row to the next. Form the shape of the slipper by working a few stitches more or less at the end of the rounds. The illustration shows the sole reduced in size. Finish the outer edge by a plait of the twine. Line the upper with flannel, and join to a cork sole, which is sewed fast to the twine sole. Lastly, cover the seam, and at the same time the cork sole on the upper side, with a lining worked in single crochet from Fig. 41. Border this with a row of sc. In working the last round put the needle through the edge stitches of the sole, thus fastening it. Finish with pleated scarlet braid as shown by the illustration.

Cane Skipping-Rope.

JUMPING through a rope or hoop is a favorite amusement of children, and the gayer and more tasteful the hoop the better they like it. The illustrations which we give teach the manner of preparing a hoop of this kind. The original is made of a Spanish reed, covered, as shown by the illustration, with narrow strips of reed and red worsted, and the ends are furnished with knobs of red worsted. For making the hoop take a Spanish reed fifty-five inches in length and half an inch in circumference. This forms the foundation. Then from another reed split off six very narrow splinters. Tie the ends to one end of the foundation reed by means of a piece of twine in such a manner that the flat sides shall cover it, after which fasten on a thread of red worsted and begin the winding by bringing the thread alternately over and under the narrow splinters, as shown by the illustration. The design alternates. Having completed the hoop, prepare of the red wool two balls each two inches and a half in diameter, made in the manner described for the worsted duster, Harper's Bazar, No. 23, p. 361. Join these to the ends of the hoop before taking out the pasteboard, and, in order to keep them fast, cover the part of the ends which is to be fastened to the balls with gum-arabic.

A MEDIEVAL BLUEBEARD.

IT is not impossible that the famous story of Bluebeard may have sprung from that of Gilles de Laval, Maréchal de Retz, whose castle of Barbe Bleu, or Blue Beard, was known in the Middle Ages as a centre for the infernal rites of demon worship and human sacrifice practiced by the necromancers of the times.

At twenty Gilles de Laval was probably the most rising man of his day, and assuredly he was the most favored by fortune. He was handsome, high-born, and enormously wealthy; he was clever too, highly cultivated, and as brave as a Paladin. And the times offered the amplest scope to his ambition and abilities. France had then entered on the last and triumphant stage of a highly popular struggle, and the crop which a former generation of warriors and statesmen had sown was ripening to reward their successors. For some years Gilles de Laval bid fair to realize the warmest hopes of his friends, displaying such valor and conduct that he was named almost immediately Maréchal of France. And to crown all, in the midst of his success he wedded a beautiful and high-born heiress; but, for a wonder, nobody envied him. So frank, generous, and amiable was he that he had not an enemy in the kingdom; and yet this man of unparalleled fortune died in the prime of life, utterly ruined in fame and estate, not as a gentleman and a soldier dies, but the vile death of a ruffianly thief, and so universally loathed that all France hailed his execution with a sigh of relief.

Retiring early from active service, he fitted up his castle like a palace in a fairy tale, took troops of musicians, players, and dancing-girls into his service, and made his life thenceforth for many years a gorgeous pageant. Keeping open house for all comers, and offering such attractions, it was not wonderful that his visitors should count by thousands; and a motley herd they were—counts, courtesans, and conjurers; bishops and braves; rhymers, roysterers, and reprobates of all sorts, elbowing each other at all times within his halls. Indeed, the court of the Maréchal de Retz completely eclipsed that of his suzerain, the Duke of Brittany.

But depravity crept in, spread, flourished, and at length became so thoroughly master of the revels, that all who had any sense of morality left in them shunned the scene. The flight of respectability, however, was regarded as a positive relief by the mob that remained. Thenceforward they indulged without restraint, anticipating all that has been recorded of the Palais Royal or the Folies des Chartres. But corrupt as were the guests, they were infinitely surpassed in evil by their host. He liked indeed to contemplate and encourage, but he disdained to share their common vices. When he indulged, it was in secret; for to such extremity of excess had he attained, that he was compelled to shroud it away down in the darkest vaults of his castle from even the vicious eyes of that crew. We can not enter into the details of this man's fall; we can not pause to tell how impostors, knaves of mystic pretense, wormed into his confidence, and led him, step by step, to every sort of ruin. Nor dare we describe the orgies that were enacted daily in those horrid cells. It is enough to say that the victims of licentiousness—little children most of them, or very young girls—were afterward immolated to Satan; and that the choicest delight of this awful voluptuary consisted in dealing the fatal stab, and watching its dreadful consequences.

At length so many females had disappeared unaccountably from the neighborhood of Barbe Bleu, and so many continued to vanish daily, that the attention of the authorities was roused. And the sensation must have been great indeed to have effected such a marvel in favor of "unshod ribalds." From the very beginning, suspicion pointed with undeviating finger at De Retz. Not, however, on account of his embarrassments, his character, or the character of his confidants—most of them notorious alchemists and conjurers—nor even because of the number missing. For, had authority taken it into his head to lay hands on every high-born profligate who consorted with such vermin, and who resided in a neighborhood where lowly women were given to vanish mysteriously, very few nobles indeed would have been left at large in France or any where else. Nor was there any positive evidence adduced against the Maréchal prior to his captivity. But people generally felt, as they always feel in such cases, through a species of unaccountable but unerring instinct, that De Retz, and no other, was the guilty man. He was seized with his confederate and tutor in diablerie, one Prelati, and his castle searched. Heaps of bones, human skins covered with magical inscriptions, and all the sorcerer's hideous stock in trade, were brought up from the vaults. And the ensuing trial threw a fearful light on these things. It was fairly proved that considerably more than a hundred lives had been sacrificed by the Maréchal and his instructor within two years. And there were reasonable grounds for surmising that these were but a moiety of the victims. And yet this precious pair—the monstrous fool and the mystic knave—embraced tenderly on the scaffold, and comforted one another with the confident trust of meeting immediately in Paradise!

HAIR-DRESSING IN BRITTANY.

THE custom of wearing the hair in Brittany differs from that of other countries, and is not a little curious. The men here wear long hair flowing about in tresses; but not so the women, who do not regard it as an ornament. On the contrary, their hair is closely cut, and no part of the same is allowed to appear from beneath the cap. A girl who allows her hair to be seen, however fine or magnificent, would be considered to disregard what was due to the modesty of her sex. Dealers in hair perambulate the country, and on fête days purchase the crops of the peasant girls, shearing them like so many sheep for twenty sous, or a cotton handkerchief worth about twelve or sixteen sous per head. These dealers are sometimes men, and sometimes women. They have a basket by their side, into which each crop of hair is thrown, after being tied in a wisp. The hair of the peasant girls is remarkably fine and generally of a black or dark color, though sometimes chestnut. Many a fair lady in London or Paris, whose beautiful head of hair attracts so many admirers, would not wish it to be discovered that her chevelure recently belonged to a peasant girl in the wilds of Brittany.

JENNY'S CITY BEAU.

MISS JENNY WAYLAND was a peculiar girl. At least so said her friends; and if they know nothing about it, who does? It was the verdict of the dear five hundred in Painville. If asked in what she differed from the mass of womankind, they would have been at a loss to say. Taking a view of her as she walked or drove through the town, a gentleman would have noticed, first, that she had a bright, pleasant way, a good color, and a symmetrical figure; second, that she considered herself as the proper guardian of herself, and would not delegate the authority to others; third, that she dressed in good taste, not gaudily, but in colors which harmonized with each other and with her complexion. The young ladies voted her queer, and at the same time tried to imitate her—a sure sign that she was popular with the gentlemen; and after all, the voice of the daughters of Eve to the contrary notwithstanding, they do like to have the gentlemen notice them, and make it the aim of their lives. Probably this sentiment will bring down upon the head of the author the anathema of all womankind who read it; but that author considers himself safe by reason of distance. What he has written, he has written! It seemed, however, that Miss Jenny did not care so much for admiration as her female friends. And perhaps it was her indifference on this subject that made her a favorite. Then, she could talk well. Most gentlemen like good talkers, even if they can not talk well themselves. They fill up the awkward gaps in a conversation nicely where a company of people who exhaust the current topics of the day and are not in love with each other would be at fault.

At the present time Jenny was in deep desolation. All women have their troubles, and she had hers, in the shape of an importunate admirer who did not suit her. Mr. Chester Audley was a type of a class not peculiar to any particular city; a young man of good family, who had inherited the family fortune without the family brains. He spent a great deal of his time in combing his hair and pulling at the ends of his blonde mustache. His face was of the milk and water type so often seen in cities, for he was like a plant grown in a cellar, and had spent all his life, from babyhood to the age of twenty-five, in a crowded city. How he ever came to Painville is a mooted question. He had nothing in common with the people there. Their mode of life was not his, their amusements wearied him, and their fresh, healthy faces were a source of wonder to him. But the morning train had landed him in Painville three months before, together with three enormous trunks, four hat-boxes, and a fishing-rod. Not that he ever fished; but it was the style to carry fishing-tackle into the country, and he was not the man to depart one whit from the usages of society. So he brought his pale face, his languid smile, and his killing air into the society of the thriving village, and expected all there to yield to their influence, and was disgusted because they refused to be astonished at his magnificence. It is doubtful whether he would have staid two days in the village but for one circumstance. In other days, when young men were gifted with brains, his father had known Mr. Wayland in college, and gave his son, the brainless, a letter of introduction. Mr. Wayland, a keen man of business, looked him over with a smile, and came to the conclusion that this young dandy had inherited nothing of the sterling good sense which had characterized his old college friend. But he asked him to stay at his house while in town. Chester had taken rooms at the hotel, and thought he had better keep them. While they were speaking Jenny came in, and the young man was instantly enslaved. Mr. Wayland introduced him, and told her to take him in charge, as he had business to attend to.

"I am driving out, Mr. Audley," said she, glancing at his elegant costume. "Would you care to drive through the village?"

Chester assented, and they went out to the carriage. Chester looked at the spirited team, their flashing eyes, erect heads, and dilated nostrils, and wondered where the driver was.

"I—I don't see the man," said he.

"There is no man," she replied. "I intend to drive them myself."

"You!" said Chester, in unaffected astonishment. "Why it's impossible! You don't mean it! You can't drive that team! Let me do it!"

"If you like," she said. "But I can manage them easily enough." He took the reins in great trepidation, and the horses knew that he was no match for them. They pranced, tossed their heads, and tugged at the reins in a manner far from pleasant.

"What makes them act so?" he said, looking at Jenny, who was amused to see the manner in which he held the reins. "Don't you think we had better have a man? I don't like the way they act, do you? What makes him toss up his head so? It's as much as I can do to hold the reins. Whoa, there; whoa! Don't you hear me? That's a vicious animal, Miss Jenny. You should sell him; you should indeed!"

"Sell Diamond! I could not think of it. If you will allow me to say it, you hold your hands too far apart and too high up."

His attitude might, indeed, in the eyes of a turfman have been open to censure, as he held his hands about half a yard apart and nearly on a level with his breast. The horses, usually gentle, though full of spirit, became annoyed at the jerks he gave the reins and the timid voice of the driver. They began to lay back their ears and step out. Chester looked at her in despair.

"Give me the reins," said Jenny. He gave them up willingly. The moment the horses heard her voice, and felt the firm but gentle hand upon the ribbons, they ceased the demonstrations which had so appalled the young man, and dropped into the usual steady, swinging trot. A young man standing by the curbstone had been looking with considerable astonishment at the manoeuvres of Chester, and was laughing as they passed. Jenny pulled up.

"Oh, Will!" she said, "will you please to come here a moment?"

Chester looked at her in surprise. He had no conception of such a breach of etiquette as this. A young lady calling to a young man from a carriage, and styling him "Will!" While he was deep in the vale of astonishment the young gentleman came to the side of the carriage. He had a pleasant face, brown, but comely, broad shoulders, and arms like a blacksmith.

"Will you ride?" she said. "Mr. Rathburn, Mr. Audley. Do come, Will."

"I don't mind," said he. "You will take the back seat, I suppose. Mr. Audley don't drive much, I see."

They changed places, and Will Rathburn took the reins. It was plain that he wanted to terrify the dandy, if possible, and even Jenny had never seen her horses go so rapidly. Glancing at Chester she saw that he was clinging to the seat with all his might, and calculating the probable injuries he would receive when the crash of which he was certain came. One thing annoyed him—that country fellow on the front seat enjoyed his fear, and was driving in that way on purpose.

"Don't—don't you think they are going a little too fast?" he managed to say. "I don't mind it myself, but you might get hurt."

"I am used to it," she replied. "Will always drives in that way. I can't stop him."

But Will stopped of his own accord at length, satisfied that he had given Chester a lesson in driving. If Jenny had not been in the carriage there is no telling to what extent he might have gone on. There probably would have been an upset. From that time Chester had no thought of leaving Painville. Wherever Jenny went there he was sure to go, like Mary's lamb, immortalized in verse. Will first endured him, and then began to get annoyed at his pertinacity; for it was understood in Painville that if Jenny married any one it would be Will Rathburn, and they were rather pleased than otherwise when a shadow fell on his path. He could not think that Jenny really liked the fellow. But then it was not pleasant to have him always in the way. Will used to enjoy an evening at Wayland's, when Jenny would sit down to the piano and sing the dearest old songs in a sweet low voice, which he had learned to love dearly. And now, to have this exquisite, with his perfumed hair, his blonde mustache, and his sickly smile always in the way was very annoying, to say the least.

Chester had a certain quiet tenacity in following any thing which really amused him, and Jenny was something different from the women he had met. There was a freshness about her, a vivacity and sparkle in conversation, which made the worn-out thing he called his heart beat with new life. The people in Painville talked, as people in country towns will talk, about him and her and Will. People in country towns enjoy scandal. In the city this little episode might have gone on, and the people in the next house would have known nothing about it. This sort of tattling annoyed Jenny at last, and she was more civil to Chester than ever. She did not dream that his attentions were any thing serious.

But at last she saw, as others did, that she was the attraction which kept him in the town.

She had won a white elephant. What to do with the beast she did not know. And there Will was going about with a gloomy, misanthropic face, and talking of California and China as desirable places of residence for a young man who has his way to make in the world. It is a noticeable fact that most young men, when the world goes hard with them, talk of impossible places in an easy way which is refreshing.

It was early autumn, and the young people got up a nutting excursion. Will was there: no party was complete without him. Chester came in all his glory in company with Jenny. He had made up his mind. A man must marry some time, and might do worse than marry Jenny Wayland. He never dreamed of the possibility of a refusal. That was not in his books. Jenny was in a fitful mood, changing like an April day. He could not have chosen a more inauspicious time. She was full of life when they came to the woods, but lost her spirits when she saw Will leaning against a tree, looking ready for suicide or China, and ready to toss up a penny which it should be. He had been debating whether giving Chester a thrashing might not do his business, but was balked by the fact that Chester would not take offense at any thing.

"Will Rathburn," said Belle Sayres, a pretty little hoyden of the party, "do you come here this moment! What do you mean, Sir, by looking as if you would like to cut somebody's throat?"

"Am I such a desperado?" said he, forcing a laugh. "What do you want me to do?"

"Go up that tree and shake it this instant! How do you suppose we are to get any nuts if you don't move? Here are your climbing irons. Put them on at once."

He obeyed slowly. Jenny came up, followed by Chester, just as he took up the second iron.

"Perhaps you would like to try it?" said he, vindictively, offering the iron to Chester.

"May I ask what it is? Any thing to oblige a lady?" said Chester.

"Just to climb that tree and thresh it," said Belle, pointing to a chestnut which was three feet in diameter at the butt, and without limbs to the height of forty feet.

"Do you think I am a squirrel?" demanded Chester. "You must excuse me. I can not go up that tree."

Will put on the iron and slung a pole on his wrist. In five minutes he was in the tree, and the brown nuts rattling down about their ears. That merry time! You and I have had such days; and now, when we sit by solitary fires, or toil through hours of business, or pore over old books, the memories of those days will come again, and we feel our hearts grow fresher though our heads are growing gray.

It was a matter of some surprise that wherever Chester placed himself huge burrs would persist in striking him. It was nevertheless true. Will came down when the tree was stripped, the boys who had climbed other trees did the same, and the nuts were gathered and put in the wagons. Then came dinner. They found a grassy plot by the side of the stream; the dinner-pails were brought out, and the merry meal dispatched. This done, they paired off in the unaccountable way young people have, and rambled about for some hours. Belle Sayres and Will were together. Chester kept Jenny in his toils. They found a place by the river where the water fell over a high bank, and dropped into a deep pool below. The sides of the stream were of loose slate. Jenny sat down upon a log, and leaning her elbows on her knees, looked dreamily into the woods, paying little heed to Chester's stale compliments. But he had been waiting for some such opportunity as this.

"Miss Jenny," he said, with refreshing coolness, "I have concluded to marry. A man must make some sacrifices; he must indeed."

Jenny hardly heard him.

"A person of my standing," said he, "is expected to marry a city woman; but I don't know that they are any better. A girl from the country can learn what to do in society."

Jenny began to be sensible that he was coming to something, and looked at him in astonishment.

"That is to say, a girl from the country is not expected to know all the things requisite to keep up standing in society, and people are not so hard on them."

"They are very kind," said Jenny, thinking, at the same time, "what can the blockhead mean?"

"Of course you understand me," said he. "There is no other girl out of the city I would marry. There is a certain form to be gone through with. Will you be my wife?"

"Am I to understand that you do me the honor to ask me?" said Jenny, exasperated by his manner. "Then, with my best thanks for the high consideration you have shown in the offer, I beg leave to decline."

Chester started up in astonishment, forgetting how near he stood to the edge of the bank. His feet touched the loose slate. In an instant, grasping vainly at empty space, he plunged into the deep pool below the waterfall, and disappeared from view. A ringing laugh sounded from the other bank, and Belle Sayres appeared, followed by Will, who had seen the whole performance. Will dropped down on the edge of the pool, and grasped the discomfited hero by the collar. A moment after he stood on dry land. But, Ichabod! thy glory had departed. He never spoke; he made no sign; but, turning on his heel, left them to their own devices. Belle, with great discretion, had disappeared, and Will stood by Jenny's side.

"You would not have the dandy, then?" said he.

"Did you think it for a moment?" she replied.

"Will you marry me?" he said. "I love you; and you need not go to the city to learn manners."

"I have a mind to say No, to pay you for that speech," she said, putting her hand in his. "You have been cruel to me, but I will not be to you."

Chester Audley returned to the city. He detests country girls to this day.

A QUARTET AT GOETHE'S.

IT was in the early part of November, in the year 1821, that three members of the Weimar Hof-Capelle, the writer of these lines being one of the number, were introduced by a servant into the well-known room of Goethe, the windows of which looked out upon the Plauplatz. Three music desks stood ready for us by the side of the opened piano; near by lay a pile of music in manuscript. Curious as I have always been and still am in such matters, I turned over the leaves and read, "Studies in Double Counterpoint;" and other volume was entitled "Fugues;" a third, "Canones;" then came "Quartet for Piano with accompaniment of violin, viola, and violoncello." On each volume was inscribed the name of Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy. The notes were written in a firm, neat hand, and, so far as a hasty glance permitted me to judge, showed the work of a capable and accomplished artist. The name of Mendelssohn as a musician was at that time unknown.

As we were tuning our instruments a tall man entered, who, from his fine military bearing, might have been taken for a cavalry sergeant. He was not a stranger to me, as I had the previous year visited him at Berlin: it was Professor Zelter, the well-known director of the Berlin Sing-Academy, Goethe's fast and true friend.

He greeted us all in a friendly manner, and me as an old acquaintance. "I come before you, gentlemen," he began, "to ask a favor: I wish you to become acquainted with my pupil, Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy, a boy twelve years old. For his ability as a piano-forte player, but still more for his talent as a composer, you will probably regard him with some interest. He is a perfect child of nature. He cares but little for the praises of musical dilettanti, but longs for and treasures up as pure gold the good opinions of the real musician; yet, of course, the young fledgeling is as yet too inexperienced to be able always to discriminate between the encouragement proceeding from mere kindness of feeling and the just acknowledgment of merit. Therefore, gentlemen, should you be moved to a song of praise, which I at the same time hope and fear, lead it off in moderate time, not too loudly instrumented, and in C dur—the least colored key of the scale. Up to this time I have kept him free from vanity and self-conceit—those deadly enemies of all artistic improvement."

Before we could return an answer to this somewhat novel address Felix entered the room: a handsome, blooming boy, with decidedly Jewish features; slender and supple; his hair falling in rich, black ringlets over his shoulders; genius and spirit beamed from his eyes. He looked at us inquisitively for a moment, and then, coming forward, shook hands with each one as though we had been old acquaintances.

At the same time with Felix Goethe entered, and returned a friendly greeting to our respectful salutations. "My friend," said he, pointing to Zelter, "has brought with him a little Berliner, who will surprise us as a virtuoso; we shall also have an opportunity of knowing something of him as a composer, and to this end I beg you will give your assistance. Come, my child, let us hear what thy young head has produced!" So saying he passed his hand over the long curls of the boy.

The latter ran quickly to the pile of music, placed our parts on the stands, and the principal part on the piano, before which he hurriedly took his seat. Zelter stationed himself behind Felix, to be ready to turn over the leaves for him, and Goethe stood a few steps off, his hands clasped behind his back; the little composer gave us a look, we laid our bows on our instruments, and nod from his curly head, and the performance began.

Goethe heard the entire composition with the closest attention, without making other remark than an occasional "Good!" or "Bravo!" which he accompanied with a nod of approval. Remembering Zelter's admonition, we showed our satisfaction to the boy, whose face, as the performance progressed, became more and more flushed, only by our manner.

When the last movement was ended Felix sprang from his seat and looked at each one of us inquiringly, apparently longing to hear what might be said of his work; but Goethe, probably instructed by Zelter, said to him, "Bravo, my son! the countenances of these gentlemen," pointing to us, "doubtless tell plainly enough that your production has pleased them; go down, now, into the garden, they are waiting for you there; get your breath, and cool yourself off, for you look as if on fire."

In an instant the boy was outside the door. As we rose to take our leave Goethe said to us, "Stop one moment, gentlemen; my friend and I wish to have your opinion of this boy's composition."

A long conversation followed, the particulars of which, after the lapse of so many years, I am unable to furnish, as, unfortunately, I made no entry of them at the time in my journal; something, however, has remained in my memory, for my later and close intimacy with Mendelssohn gave me frequent opportunities of talking over with him the incidents of this first meeting.

Goethe regretted that we had to-day heard the little fellow only in quartet playing. "These musical wonder-children," said he, "so far as concerns technical ability, are at the present day no longer very great curiosities, but what this little fellow is able to do in phantasy and sight playing borders on the marvelous, and I could hardly believe it possible in one of so few years."

"And yet you heard Mozart in his seventh year at Frankfurt," said Zelter.

"Yes," replied Goethe; "at that time I myself was only twelve years old, and, like every body else, was greatly astounded at his extraordinary ability; but that which your pupil now performs is, when compared with Mozart's performance at that time, as the perfect utterance of a full-grown man to the lisping of a child."

"Certainly," said Zelter, smiling; "Felix executes the concerto with which Mozart then astounded the world as mere child's play, without a single note of it before him; but many others can do that now. It is for me to encourage the boy's creative talent; and now, gentlemen," said he, turning to us, "what do you think of his quartet?"

We all agreed that the production of Felix showed greater originality than did Mozart's, and that it was not unreasonable to believe that in this boy the world would find an amended edition of Mozart; the more so as he was in the bloom of health, and all his surroundings favorable to the development of his talent.

"May it be so!" said Goethe. "No one can tell how his genius may unfold itself; yet we have seen so much of promising talent led astray by false method, and our best hopes have so often been disappointed; by good luck he is in your hands, Zelter, and I know you will take good care of him."

"I give my most earnest attention to the youth," said Zelter, "and provide for him every facility to pursue the bent of his own genius untrammelled; at the same time that I restrain him constantly with the curb-bit of contrapuntal studies; but how long I may be able to continue thus with him, and how soon he may run away from my discipline, I can not tell. I can really teach him nothing more, and once free he will take his own course."

"After all," said Goethe, "the teacher's influence on great genius is at most somewhat problematical; that which makes the artist great and original can be worked out only by and in himself. Who are the teachers that Raphael, Michael Angelo, Haydn, Mozart, and all those distinguished masters have to thank for their immortal creations?"

I then asked whether this quartet, as we had heard it, originated entirely with the boy. "Yes, yes," replied Zelter, "all from his own hand, and from his own brain; I say all from his own brain. What you have heard he prepared entirely himself. I know that teachers, in order to procure to themselves credit for their teaching, often embellish the works of their pupils to such a degree that little or nothing remains of their ideas. This is nothing more nor less than downright swindling and charlatanism; they deceive not only the public, but the pupil, who is soon led to believe that he himself is the finisher of his work; it is a mischief that has ruined many a fine talent, and nipped in the bud many a genius. I allow Felix to do as he pleases; naturally his creative power remains always fresh, and I do not embitter his enjoyment in composition by too severe criticism. Criticism comes soon enough of itself; intelligence grows, and with it the impulse to improve; consequently this twelve-year-old boy has already written more than many a man of thirty. May Heaven shield this rare plant from all disturbing influences, so that, in good time, it may expand itself into full fruitfulness!"

This was, as nearly as I can recollect, the conversation that passed on this occasion.

Seventeen Years Later.—The boy had become a man. I had followed his pathway of glory and renown with interest, rejoicing to see that each one of his more important works, as they successively appeared, gave evidence of maturing talent; but for seventeen years I had not seen him. He was now Director of the Leipzig Gewand Haus Concerts, which, under his leadership, had been brought to a high degree of excellence; so much so, indeed, that the orchestra was universally conceded to be the finest in Germany. What wonder that I should wish to listen to it, and take part in it! So I sat down, wrote a grand orchestra composition, and when it was ready, sent a request to him that he would permit it to be performed at the Gewand Haus. I spoke of no pecuniary compensation, and only expressed the wish that my work might be well studied and directed.

Soon after I received a friendly letter from Mendelssohn, wherein he informed me that they were waiting the arrival of my work, and that the Direction would be pleased if I would allow it to be produced in public. I mention this letter particularly on account of a passage in it that characterizes his noble, loving, benevolent, and at times tender disposition toward artists. He wrote as follows: "It appears to me proper that, for the reimbursement of at least a portion of your traveling expenses, some remuneration should be presented to you, although you do not refer to it in your letter. Our means are limited, yet I thought it might be welcome to you; and furthermore, I understand the Directors are in favor of it." This was in November, 1838.

Soon after this I went with my work to Leipzig. Mendelssohn received me in the most friendly and heart-felt manner; during the rehearsal was particularly attentive, and labored ardently to make the performance as perfect as possible; and when he came to me from the orchestra, at the end of this to me most important evening, and noticed my nervousness, said he, "You look worried." "I am very much so," I replied. "You have no reason to be so," he answered; "your work is good; you can not help knowing it. Of what moment is it if the public does not happen to be pleased? Ought we to expect to succeed better than has many a master of former times in some of his very best efforts?"

The work, as the Leipzig critic wrote, was an equivocal success. I was very much depressed, and for the time being gave up all pleasure in composition. I mention this incident also as an evidence of the friendly interest taken in my music by Mendelssohn, who was pleased to find more in it than did the public. From that time our intimacy became closer than ever.

Since that time I have passed many a happy hour with this beloved Master. He came occasionally to Weimar, and played to us and a few chosen friends his latest compositions, either at my house or at Montag's, the music-teacher's. On these occasions he was unwilling that any great number should be present: he would say, "Let us have some music this evening, but entirely among ourselves, for we may want to take off our coats and play in our shirt-sleeves." One evening as I came home about ten o'clock from a rehearsal at the Opera, my wife ran to meet me, in great excitement, with the question, "Who do you think has been here? Mendelssohn! He stopped on his way through to Frankfurt (where, if I am not mistaken, he is going to visit his lady-love), and regretted so much not being able to see you. 'Dear Madame L—,' said he, 'it is two hours before the post leaves, and I am going to stay with you: now, if you will let me, I will play something for you; and thereupon he seated himself at the piano, and for two hours, without intermission, played for me the most beautiful things you can imagine." One may well believe that my wife has never forgotten that evening, and that she is very proud of it. On one occasion there was some music at Montag's; Mendelssohn played his D moll trio; then a quintet of music was taken up, in which he played the viola admirably.

Twenty-six Years Later.—It was known to few that this vigorous, healthy, jovial, always happy, and (in every relation of life) fortunate man, was subject at times to forebodings of an early death. Once, after the performance of his "Paulus" in the church at Weimar, we were seated together alone in his chamber, and I, at that time a great hypochondriac, remarked that I should not live to enjoy his later productions. He answered, "Ah, my dear L—, you will long outlive me." I began to joke with him for speaking thus, when he interrupted me, saying, in a low, solemn voice, "I shall never be old;" then, as if regretting what he had said, his features assumed the liveliest expression, and he began talking over the performance, particularly dwelling on the kindness with which every one had received his work.

Little did I think, at that time, that the prophecy of him who was seated before me, radiant with health, and only in the beginning of his thirtieth year, was so soon to be fulfilled. In 1846 I removed to Leipzig: he was then gay as ever, and laboriously engaged in composition. I had many delightful and profitable meetings with him, and hoped to enjoy very many more; but in one year thereafter, in 1847, in only his thirty-eighth year, twenty-six years after my first interview with the handsome, genial boy at Goethe's, I walked by the side of his coffin, in company with a multitude of mourners, to deposit in its last resting-place in Königsstrasse, near the Paulina Church, the mortal remains of this great tone-artist.

THE CHILD-ANGEL.

LITTLE tongues that chatter, chatter—
Little feet that patter, patter
With a ceaseless motion all the day—
Little eyes that softly lighten—
Little cheeks that flush and brighten—
Little voices singing, at their play—

In my memory awoken
Thoughts of one who has been taken—
Of a little heart that beats no more—
Of a little voice that's ringing,
Mid the angels sweetly singing
Songs of gladness on a distant shore!

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

DRINKING iced lemonade and fanning yourself continually will not keep you cool during the heated term. True, the system will demand a moderate amount of cooling beverage, and fanning one's self is all very well if there is no air otherwise stirring; although in general the exercise of moving the arm constantly heats the blood more than the fan can cool it. But one can usually keep comfortable even in the hottest day by avoiding undue exercise, crowds, and the direct rays of the sun, and by preserving a quiet and equable frame of mind. The truth is, that a great many people fret their blood up to the boiling point. They do not like hot weather, and they complain about it; the sultry atmosphere makes them irritable, and feeling that a sufficient excuse they take no pains to restrain themselves. They find fault with the children, with the dinner, with the servants, with every thing. They drink ice-water, look at the thermometer every five minutes, fan furiously, declare it is the "hottest day"—and fret. Of course they feel as if they were burning up! If those who can, to some extent at least, choose for themselves how to spend the hottest days would avoid mental excitement, engaging moderately in some quiet employment, without thinking much about the heat, they would find life endurable, even when the thermometer is ninety and upward.

Among minor news items may be mentioned that a new hotel—the Ondana House—has lately been opened at Schroon Lake, in the vicinity of the Adirondacks; that there are to be two weddings on Mount Washington next month; that West Point is particularly attractive just now with the cadets in camp on the plains; that the clerk of one of the Saratoga hotels converses easily in the Chinese language, for the benefit, probably, of the Celestials; and that fashionable young ladies at Long Branch are having their photographs taken, seated in groups on the beach.

The New York Evening Mail thus describes the "Belle of Mahopac."

"A plump, happy, delightful little face—she wears her hair in curl papers during the morning, with a net over her entire head.

"She takes her dinner in the same négligé head-dress.

"Later in the afternoon she appears in curls.

"Her favorite costume is pure white with blue ribbons.

"Age—between three and four."

Thunder showers have been very violent in some sections this season, and of course the lightning has played some freaks. But the most extraordinary performance that has come to our knowledge is that of a streak of lightning which recently entered a school-house in Illinois, and took a pair of boots from a little boy's feet and hurled them at the head of the master! The pupils thought it fine sport; but probably the master will immediately have a rod put on (or in) the school-house.

It is easy to commence a conversation nowadays. "Extremely hot!" is the universal introduction to all sorts of discourses, from the most familiar to the most formal.

It is really too bad to report it, even if it is true, and, of course, we don't believe it; but "they" do say that when the late collision took place on the Sound, a gentleman (!) on board the City of Boston fastened a life-preserver about his vigorous frame, and silenced his wife who begged for one with the words, "Don't make such a fuss about it; perhaps you will get one before long." Another stalwart fellow actually took a life-preserver from a young lady, and buckled it upon himself!

If a little piece of gum camphor be put into a tin cup, and held over a light, the smoke of it will presently pervade the room, and scatter the mosquitoes. Spirits of camphor sprinkled on the pillow will often drive them away at night. Probably neither camphor, nor any other remedy, will be always effectual; but these insects do not like smoke, nor any pungent odor, which fact will enable us sometimes to dispense with their unwelcome intrusion.

It is feared that women are gradually working their way into the watch business, and the old, established makers of delicate machinery are alarmed. Naturally they would be. Competition has its dangers.

An exchange says that during the heated term nothing is so invigorating as iced tea with a slice of lemon in it. Iced coffee is also a very refreshing beverage. Take cold coffee, mix it with milk or cream and sugar, to suit the taste, and let it stand on ice till wanted. Then add a well-beaten egg and some broken ice, and you have a delicious drink.

In Lisbon a paper is published called A Voz Feminina, which is written by ladies and devoted to the cause of woman's emancipation. The chief editor is Madame Francisca D'Assis Martinz Wood, the Portuguese wife of an English gentleman. Space is given to fiction, poetry, musical history, and fashions; the latter being described in French.

There is a lesson to be gathered from the following singular incident in real life, which may warrant the repetition of a story which must have caused great grief to family friends. It is said to be strictly true: Some time ago an accomplished daughter of a clergyman in Albany disappeared from home. A friend of the family at Quincy, Illinois, discovered the girl in the ballet troupe of a circus, going through the evolutions of Undine. The gentleman immediately telegraphed to her father, who came on, met the circus company in another town, and found his daughter. He discovered that when at boarding-school she had become infatuated with the tinsel of a circus ring rider, and had eloped with and married him. The father entreated her to leave the troupe and go home with him. The girl readily consented if her husband could go with her, but one of the provisions was that she should leave him. This she refused to do. The distress of the father was not sufficient to overcome his prejudices against the husband, and he was forced to leave his daughter in the exciting life she had chosen, and return sorrowfully home. She is described as a girl of striking beauty, not yet twenty years of age, very modest in her demeanor, but completely full of the romance of life, and infatuated with the cheap dazzle of the ring. Many friends and acquaintances have endeavored to persuade her to return to her home; but she resolutely refuses.

We can not conscientiously recommend the use of kid gloves as a suitable covering for the hands during the sweltering months of July and August! We vote for silk, or linen, or something cooler, if any thing there is. But for those who prefer kids the year around it may be useful to know that corn starch, applied dry to the hands, is recommended as a preventive of injury to the gloves during summer. The corn starch can scarcely be expected to keep dry with the thermometer racing up and down among the nineties; but the experiment is worth trying, for nothing gives a lady a more untidy appearance than spotted gloves.

Monograms are all the rage—monograms on cards, on note-paper, envelopes, pocket-handkerchiefs, and almost every thing else. Those who can afford to lavish money to indulge a fancy have monogram carpets; and recently a "monogram party" was given, at which a monogram dinner set was introduced. Our Artist's illustration of an affair of this sort will be remembered by the readers of the Bazar.

A woman has lately been released from the Iowa State Penitentiary, where she has been confined four years. She had confessed to the murder of her husband and was sentenced to be hanged, but her sentence was commuted. It was afterward found that she was entirely innocent, and that her son was the guilty person. To save him from the gallows she had avowed that she was guilty of the crime. A striking instance of maternal love.

Pretty little rustic frames for photographs or small pictures may be made of the smallest twigs of the common Norway spruce. After the twigs have been cut a few days the leaves will drop off. As the natural color is pleasing to the eye, no preparation is needful. Cut the side and cross pieces of suitable length, and fasten with pins, or needle and thread, or if the twigs are large enough, with glue. A great variety of tasteful patterns may be wrought, and with a little instruction boys and girls can make them easily. These little ornaments furnish pleasant occupation for the young folks who are roaming through the woods at this season, and also cultivate their taste and ingenuity.

In a private letter from Berne, Switzerland, a gentleman, speaking of the "Pension" in which he and his family are established, writes: "The first time we sat at the table, the servant, a tall, comely, Swiss lassie, spilled our milk while putting it upon the table. The second time, she spilled it over my coat. The poor girl was, of course, covered with confusion. Our English friends explained her awkwardness by telling us that she was not a servant, but an heiress, who, according to the custom of the country, was serving a sort of apprenticeship to the cook, in order to qualify herself to preside in her own household one of these days." A similar custom, followed for a moderate length of time, might not be amiss for some of our young girls.

It is stated that during the reign of Queen Elizabeth a blacksmith made a lock and key and fastened to it a gold chain, all of which articles were so minute that the chain was fastened round a flea's neck, and the lively little beast trotted about thus fettered with perfect ease. A gold chain could be put to no better use; but who held the "little beast" while it was being chained? and could a chain be constructed at the present day which would so encircle a flea that it would be a little less "lively" than common?

Among the wonderful discoveries of the present age is that of a professor in the Dublin University, who has lately discovered that Homer's name was originally O'Meagher, which became abbreviated into O'Mer, which was erroneously pronounced Ho'Mer by the English cockneys, and finally came to be written Homer!

A very good, if not a new story, is told of an ex-Governor of Georgia. He had a penchant for old irons, such as plowshares, old carriage irons, grindstone cranks, old shovels, and the odds and ends of plantation tools, and had accumulated a great pile in the corner of his yard, much to the annoyance of his wife. One day, unknown to her husband, she sent the rubbish to be sold at an auction. The Governor, however, happened to pass by the auction-yard, declared the old iron was just a match for some pieces he had at home, bid ten dollars for them and secured them. Delighted with the purchase, he paid the ten dollars, and left the articles in the yard for future movement. The auctioneer paid the ten dollars to the wife. In a few days she bought a handsome bonnet, and the Governor, admiring it very much, said:

"My dear, where did you get that pretty bonnet? It is beautiful, and becomes you."

"Don't it, husband, don't it? I bought it with the ten dollars you paid for your own old iron trash!"

The Governor wilted—he was sold by his own wife.

But time cured the chagrin, and the good Governor had frequently to join in the laugh at his expense over this little incident.

Some account is given in the English periodicals of the relative merits of the boys and girls in the last examinations at the Cambridge schools, and the absolute proficiency attained by them. It must be remembered that the whole idea of examinations for English girls is new, and especially so as in competition with boys. At the last examinations the proportion of girls who passed successfully was as high as that of boys, the same questions having been set for all candidates. With regard to comparative merit of work, the examiner in Shakespeare reports that the paper was "done excellently by those who had really studied it, especially by the girls, who surpassed the boys in analysis of character and choice of language." In English composition, while both did well, the best work came from the London senior girls. In English grammar the girls did well, as compared with the boys; but not so well in geography, about which the examiner complains that "the girls are frequently addicted to writing away from the point." In Latin and Greek no noteworthy difference was found between the performances of the girls and those of the boys. In French the girls did much better than the boys. One examiner says: "They appear to take a rational interest in the subject-matter, which to the large majority of the boys is evidently a matter of absolute indifference." In German, also, the girls were better than the boys throughout. While in arithmetic the girls equaled the boys, in the higher mathematics they did not, in general, distinguish themselves; yet, as an English writer remarks, "it can not be considered as proved that girls have an inferior capacity for mathematics until they have had mathematical instruction equally good with that afforded to boys." On the whole, these examinations are thought to be very encouraging for those who are interested in the training of girls.

Weakness of the eyes is a very common difficulty, and often a very serious one. The observance of a few simple rules in the use of the eyes will frequently prevent or relieve this trouble.

Never read or sew by twilight.

Do not use the eyes by artificial light which is so scant that it requires an effort to see.

Too much light confuses the sight, and is injurious.

Do not sit facing a strong light, if possible to avoid it; in reading or working let the light fall from above, over the shoulder.

Bathe the eyes thoroughly in tepid water morning and evening, and often during the day, if they feel irritated.

Never sleep so that the light from a window, or from a burner, shall fall on the eyes.

Cease using the eyes as soon as they begin to be weary or painful.

THE QUEEN'S GARDEN PARTY.

See illustration, page 644.

WE give a graphic illustration of the garden party lately given by Queen Victoria in the gardens of Buckingham Palace, and which was mentioned last week in the letter of our London correspondent. The time of the so-called breakfast party was from half past four to half past seven in the afternoon. These pleasure-grounds, which are seldom entered by ordinary visitors, are forty acres in extent. From the west front of the palace, which is of more architectural importance, with its Corinthian pillars and balustrade, than the east front, which looks on St. James's Park, the gardens stretch back as far as Grosvenor Place, and are bounded northward by Constitution Hill and the Green Park. The principal features in their arrangement and adornment are the lake, or ornamental water, which covers nearly five acres, and the lofty artificial mound, planted with shrubs and trees, on the top of which is a pavilion surmounted by fantastic minarets, and decorated in the interior with fresco paintings of subjects from Milton's "Comus," and from the poems and tales of Sir Walter Scott. Upon this occasion tents had been erected for the accommodation of the company, and refreshments were served both in the tents and in the lower dining-room of the palace. The bands of the 2d Life Guards and of the Grenadier Guards, besides the Queen's private band and the Tyrolean singers, contributed to the entertainment. A guard of honor of the Grenadier Guards was stationed in the front court of the palace, and the Royal body-guard of Yeomen of the Guard was posted in the grand hall. Her Majesty began to receive the visitors in the drawing-room tent, near the ornamental water in the gardens, at five o'clock. The Queen was attired in half mourning, but carried a white parasol. She was accompanied by Princess Louisa, Prince Arthur, Prince Leopold, and Princess Beatrice. The Lord Chamberlain, the Duchess of Wellington, Mistress of the Robes, and the Lady in Waiting, the Duchess of Roxburghe, were in attendance on her Majesty. Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales, the Crown Prince of Denmark, Prince and Princess Christian, the Duchess of Cambridge, the Duke of Cambridge, Prince and Princess Teck, the Duke and Duchess d'Aumale, and the Duke and Duchess Philip of Wirtemberg, with many of the nobility, were among the company assembled.

Mignardise and Crochet Edging.

This edging is suitable for collars, cuffs, under-clothing, etc. Work of white mignardise or narrow cord or braid with small tufts on either side and fine tatting cotton as follows: In the first loop at the beginning of a piece of mignardise 1 sl. (slip stitch), * 5 ch. (chain stitch), passing over the next loop; 1 sl. in the following loop; from * repeat seven times, then 2 ch., passing over two loops; 1 sl. in the following loop; 2 ch., again passing over two loops, 1 sl. in the following loop, + then 2 ch., 1 sl. in the middle of the last worked 5 ch., 2 ch., 1 sl. in the second following loop of the mignardise; from + repeat seven times. This finishes one point of the edging. Now work 5 ch., which must lie on the under side of the point, pass over with this two loops, and work a second point precisely as the first was worked. Proceed in this manner till the edging has reached the length desired. Finally, join the points on the sides by joining them together, always in the opposite loops, in button-hole stitch (see illustration). The upper edge of the lace is worked in one round as follows: * 2 sl. separated by 2 ch. in the two upper loops of the mignardise, 4 ch. 1 double crochet in the first sl. of the next point; 4 ch. Repeat from *.

Net for Ball.

In order to make it handier for children to carry their balls, and easier for them to take care of them, we give a ball-net, which may be made with little cost and trouble. The original is of red and gray worsted; it is trimmed with small balls, and worked with the name of the owner. The original has the name "Albert," the letters of which are worked in point de reprise. For working the name the letters given in Harper's Bazar, No. 31, may be used. Begin the net on the upper edge by a foundation of fifty stitches of gray worsted over a mesh three-fourths of an inch in circumference; join this in a round and work forty-five rounds. Then work a round of red wool over a mesh an inch and a half in circumference, in doing which work together two gray stitches as one stitch. The red stitches are all to be firmly drawn. Then work the squares of the thirty-fifth row in point de reprise, as shown in the illustration, and above this work the letters and other row as shown by the engraving. Border the upper edge of the net with a few rounds in crochet, which are worked as follows, and serve for running the cord through: 1st round.—Alternately 3 sc. (single crochet) in one stitch of the netting, 5 ch. (chain stitches). 2d round.—* 1 dc. (double crochet) in a chain-stitch scallop of the last round, 3 ch., 1 dc. in the middle one of the next three sc. Repeat from *. Having run the cord through this band, finish the ends with the red worsted balls. Under the open row place small balls of red silk, and in the centre of the bottom a large red worsted ball. Just inside of each embroidered row arrange a wire wound with red worsted.

THE HOUSEHOLD ANGEL.

BY FITZ HUGH LUDLOW.

CHAPTER XI.

IN the presence of this awful catastrophe Derrick stood dumfounded. He lavished his tenderest caresses upon the woman whom he loved; but their associations were all of passion—a passion which she charged with this worst of woes—and though she did not repel them, Derrick saw that they aggravated her wretchedness, and ceasing, looked on her with his hands folded in motionless despair.

This could not last, the night was waning, and both their lives for all the time to come depended on prompt action. His self-control returned to him—he saw clearly what must be done if they were not to lose all for which they had staked so much.

"Come, darling," said he, in a voice of sympathy free from any lover's blandishment and tender as with a brother's love, "we will take the precious baby with us. You must not sit here any longer—this place is very wet and cold—I can not lose you too, and you will surely be very sick if you stay on this damp grass. Let us drive on and reach the steamer where you can lie down and rest."

But she would not listen to him. She only wished to sit where she was and die beside the child.

"But you can not die," said Derrick, firmly.

"Yes! God will let me—he is not cruel."

"No—not cruel, and he will not let you die. You can not if you would—and you shall not if you can. Oh, my darling, I beseech you, come!"

"Derrick, look at this angel face!—it is calling out of heaven to me, 'Back, back!' Oh, my God! I must go back! She has died to turn me—Oh, Lily, my dead lamb! Oh, my child! my child—you shall not die for me in vain!"

"And you will not go with me?" said Derrick, bitterly.

"Oh, Derrick! I am going mad! I can not! I can not!"

"Then—" he answered, with a terrible paleness blanching his olive cheek—"then all is over between us. You know what I have done for you—home, country, old friends, a life's associations I have freely given up for you forever. If my father had lain dying across my road to-night I would have lifted him up and taken him with me; but I would not have stopped for him. I love you—how much it is too late for protestations to tell you if you do not know already. I share the agony which has come on you—if you love me as you have said, there is no living soul who can comfort you like me. Staying here will not bring back the dead—it will involve us both in ruin. It makes nothing better—it brings all things to their worst. Oh, darling, darling! shake off this terrible lethargy and listen! Once more, for God's sake, for my sake, come!"

"Derrick, pity my agony—see the dead lamb that my going murdered—God slew her for my sin—standing at His side she beckons me—I dare not go—she calls 'come'—pity me—forget me—let me obey her"—and, with a bitter cry, she threw herself down beside the body. In an instant more she leaped up, laughing hysterically, "Derrick! oh, Derrick! she is not dead! I felt her heart beat!"

Derrick threw himself on his knees—tore open the little chemise and felt with suspended breath—then shook his head sadly, and said: "Ah no! no! Would to God it were so; but you deceive yourself. The night is going—my darling—my only one—once more, for God's sake, come."

"No, no! I felt it beat!—my lamb—my angel—my heaven on earth, live! live! and I will give my eyes—my limbs—my reason—let God smite me any way—only live!"

"Darling, will you come? Where can you go if we part—to him? Will he see that dead baby and not spurn you? Think—no! better stop thinking, and run to this only breast where there is any home left for you on earth!"

She rushed to the brook and began bathing the little golden head with water brought in her palms, brokenly answering as she smoothed the curls away from the cruel gash:

"No, Derrick, no! Living or dead she and I must part no more forever. Forgive me and forget me; but I can not go."

A spasm of terrible wrath convulsed his face—his eyes flashed fire and his lips grew livid. The flame that had burned for her was suddenly turned against her, and for a moment he hated her with that worst hate on earth—an inverted love. He looked as if he could have cloven her with one stroke. But the pale baby-face plead for her, and he turned away.

"Go back to him—follow up the brook—your way lies right through that wood yonder. You are a woman, and in trouble—I will not curse you. Go back to your sweet home and your dear husband. Good-night, Madam."

With these words he strode to the fence and began climbing over it.

"Oh, Derrick!" she moaned after him. "Would to God you could smite me with a knife instead of those words! I shall not return to him—but if Lily can only be spared, I will go far off with her and work for her humbly in some servant's place; won't you pity me and try to save her? Oh, Derrick, I have loved you enough to make you have mercy on me just thus much—I dare not rush right upon God's drawn sword when He may hear me if I stop! Won't you try and save her? Her heart did beat, dear Derrick! She is not dead—this hurt upon her little temple numbed her—that is all! Oh, strong, good, wise, noble Derrick—try and save her for me—I will be your dog—I will kiss the dust from your feet! You can save her—you who have performed such wonderful cures! Oh, Derrick, help me—that you may not cry in vain for mercy when you die!"

Her voice of supplication rose till it ended almost in a scream. He was already over the fence, but he turned, and, in a stern, low voice, said:

"Will you bring the child, and come with me?"

"God will not save her if I disobey Him! Oh do not tear me asunder between God and you—I can not! Oh, my God! I can not!"

"Then her blood, and the loss of any atom of a chance for her—your own soul and my blasted life—be on your ingrate head! For the last time, good-night, Mrs. Kearney."

He loosed his horses, leaped to his seat, and drove away, as she fell by Lily's side with the piteous cry of "God be merciful to me a sinner!"

He drove away, but not as he had set out, for his horses' heads were turned toward Owlville. There might still be time to resume his position there. It was too early for Cuthbert to have published his misfortune. Derrick had read Mrs. Kearney's letter, and remembered that her woman's tact had avoided all mention of his name. If now he reappeared at once upon the scene, he might completely baffle suspicion, and save his good name. He had lost heaven, but he might keep earth. A man is little like a woman. He never throws away the one because he has missed the other; and at thirty-five a man does not long sit stupefied under catastrophes of the heart. Though he has failed of his crown he picks himself up quickly and secures the next best thing—praise, pudding, steady occupation, which will not let him go mad.

Derrick had gone but a mile from the bridge when his heart smote him. Not with any weak return of his passion; the last half hour he believed had made that impossible. The earthquake of his smitten pride and his fierce anger had opened between the woman and him a gulf wider than absence and the oblivion of years—a gulf bridged, at least as yet, by no relentings. With the simple act of turning from that fence by the meadow he had cast her behind him as utterly as the breath with which he bade her farewell. His compunction arose from the thought that she was a woman, helpless, with a dead child in that desolate place; and now that his anger had sunk to a silent, changeless purpose, he found room in his heart for such chivalric helpfulness as he would feel for any distressed stranger of her sex, such pity as he would have given the raggedest beggar-woman. He would waive all pride—his manner should keep her from misconstruing his motive—and go back to offer her conveyance to Owlville, home to the demesne, any place of concealment and safety. She should see that he was not ignoble in his vengeance; she should at least have a chance to resume her proper garb before she wandered out into the desolate world alone. So again he turned his team, and drove back to the bridge. But when he got there she was gone. For the last time he changed his direction, and just as the moon was setting drew up his horses before the Roost. He waked his old janitress, got a cup of coffee, and learned of Cuthbert's visit on the preceding night. He was very weary, and would gladly have lain down, but it was his nature to face trouble at once. He never put off the evil day. He had to meet Cuthbert some time, and although his anticipations of that interview were curious rather than apprehensive, he felt as if it were better to have it over with at once. To see Cuthbert Kearney in the rôle of the outraged husband would be an amusing study for the philosopher, rather than a man of honor's test of pluck; somewhat like a popular lecturer's illustration of a terrific steamboat explosion with a tea-pot and a cork. Not being in the mood for mild scientific diversions, he thought likely it would bore him just now, but if Cuthbert got loose on the community with his grievance before he had time to turn off his steam, it might at least cause inconvenient scandal, and cost him professional reputation in the district where he was now resolved to stay. So instead of taking his nap he determined on an immediate return to Garnet Run. Another motive which led him to this conclusion was the merciful one of sending out Perro with the carriage to hunt up Mrs. Kearney in the neighborhood of the bridge, and offer her assistance to return with Lily's body to her husband. Possibly, too, she might have accepted his advice and gone back to the house by the short cut, in which case it was very desirable that he should put in an appearance. Entirely as he thought he had torn her from his heart, she should not be hurt if he could help it; and if he saw her in time it would be easy to cook up a consistent story for the salvation of her reputation. If she did not contradict him, he might explain her conduct to Cuthbert on the plea of temporary aberration of mind. So, after his cup of coffee, he drove out at once to the Dalmager demesne.

There was no one to open the gate for him—no sign of life about the grounds: but when he reached the house Perro and Kledda met him at the porch.

"Oh, Massa Derrick, I'm so glad you got back!" cried both the servants, with the tears streaming down their cheeks. "Such dreadful goin's on sence you been gone! Every body gone dead, and run away, and crazy!"

"Where's Mrs. Kearney?"

"Nobody seed Mrs. Kearney sence early yesterday mornin'—nobody heard ob her—axed eb'ery where. Massa Cuthbert went off to look for her in de night—took dat little angel Miss Lily 'long wid him an—Oh! oh! oh!" (Here Kledda, who was spokeswoman, broke completely down, and Perro followed her, till the walls resounded with their passionate anguish.)

"Come, don't cry!" said the Doctor, soothingly, as if talking to a pair of children. "Let's hear your whole story. What then?"

With a powerful effort Perro choked back his sobs, and brokenly took up the recital where Kledda had left it.

"An' Miss Lily. Oh, Miss Lily neber come back! Gwine with Jim down to de pool to git some sweet fern for old Aunt Nancy to make yarb-medicine, we foun' Massa Kearney wanderin' roun' de water, wile in his head, callin' after Miss Lily as if he broke his heart. Jim and I had de debil's own work to bring him back, Massa Derrick. He try to jump into de pool, an' we only just cotch him. Little, weak gempleman like him, any body wouldn't tink how strong he was—all Jim an' I could do to hole him! We have to take him right up off de groun' and carry him like little baby. When we get him to de house, den he run up to his room an' try to cut his t'roat wid a razor. Jim an' I stop dat too; an' eber sence one or tudder ob us stay in de bedroom wid him all de time. Oh, Massa Derrick, he talk awful! He say he kill Miss Lily herself—that why she not come back—kill her wid his own hand, he say—and dunno what to make ob it, Massa; but de rocks by de pool all covered with blood, and Massa Kearney not got one scratch on him. Den he say too that Mrs. Kearney run away and leab him wid nudder man; and scuse me, Massa, but he say you de man, and cuss and swore at you awful. Oh, Massa Derrick! ain't it nuff to make your blood froze? He's jess crazy as ole Mass' Kearney was, an' he's goin' jess de same way—drink, drink, drink! kissin' dat cussed debil of a brack bottle all day long, and den from night till mornin'. Den he hasn't got de lights and de libber to stan' it like de ole Massa, an' he'll go mighty sudden afore long, sure as Scriptur. But oh, Mass' Derrick, Miss Lily, Miss Lily!"

And the loving creatures, at the mention of that beloved name, wept again as if their hearts would break.

Without a word Derrick ascended the stairs and entered Cuthbert's room. The unhappy man was sitting on the edge of his bed, with his back to the door, while Jim, a powerful negro, stood by him bathing his head, and watching to anticipate his first symptom of violence. There was no such manifestation at present. He had sunk into a lethargy which almost blotted all expression out of his countenance, and only gave token of the smouldering fire within him by a sigh which now and then came from the depths of his bosom, quivering as if it lifted weight after weight before it could escape. The instant Jim saw the Doctor, like Perro and Kledda, he exclaimed, "Oh, Massa Derrick, I'm so glad to see you back!"

Derrick waited for the effect of this announcement of his presence. It was not exactly what he expected. Cuthbert put away the hand that was bathing his forehead, turned about, and seeing Derrick, rose, with his bloodshot eyes fixed steadily on his face. It was the same look which he gave him on the morning after his horrible dream; and this was the second time that he had ever dared thus to confront him. As on the previous occasion Derrick met his gaze without flinching, and began the conversation.

"Cuthbert, I have just got home, and the things I hear paralyze me. How much of all this dreadful story is true?"

"My God!" groaned the wretched sufferer. "Do fiends walk the earth in human shape that you are here to batten on my ruin? You should be on your way to New York with your paramour—would your rosy dalliance lack a zest and your death-bed a pleasant memory if you had not gloated with your own eyes on the hell you have lighted for me?"

"My friend, you are still sick, and you talk strangely. You have endured, if they tell me the truth, what makes it no wonder my own brain reels. I can not yet make sure but I'm the victim of some horrible dream. Still, let us clear our minds of all the bewilderment we can—we shall find the exact facts we have to meet all the quicker. I have been away on business at Lenwick—I have never started for New York, and never proposed to. Where is Mrs. Kearney?"

"BUT I CAN SEE GOD'S BOWMAN BEHIND YOU."

Cuthbert leaned upon the bed's foot-board for support, as if the sublime hypocrisy of this question were a physical weight which had fallen on his head from the ceiling. Again he sought to repeat the Gorgon stare which Derrick's temperament, assisted perhaps by life-long practice at foils and poker, had enabled him to parry so effectually before. Its failure now was still more signal—not a muscle of his face any longer owned its proprietor's control. Looking into that quiet, inscrutable countenance his eyelids trembled with wrath, and agony. He essayed to speak, but his tongue failed him. He could only gnash and shake at Derrick his poor, pale, puny hand—lean, as the strong man had often said in banter, with overmuch writing of moral sentences in the cramped copy-books of sucking Puritans—clenched into a fist impotent as a girl's. As he trembled there, a spectacle of raging feebleness, Derrick saw his advantage and mercilessly pushed it up.

"Yes—where is Mrs. Kearney? Why should that question so displease you? You have conceived a strange hatred for your friend; but surely you are not changed to your own wife? Surely, my poor boy, you still love the best and most devoted woman the sun ever shone upon? Perro tells me no one has seen her since yesterday. It is a question how far those who care for you should let you go on in your own terrible career—be calm, Kearney! Nobody talks of restraining you as yet; but even if it be still open for discussion, whether we shall allow you to kill yourself—humanity can't be expected to preserve absolute neutrality while the fate of that angel on earth lies trembling in your hands. I ask, with only less anxiety than if she were my own wife, what you have done with her?"

The veins in Cuthbert's marble forehead grew purple as he listened, and on his temples there stood great beads of agony. Something like a nightmare at his heart held him choking for utterance several seconds after Derrick ceased, but at last the volcano that was in him exploded.

"God wither you, you upas of three lives! God write 'Homeless' against your name throughout the universe! May you never have a bed to nestle in where the serpent shall not crawl—may the fiend breathe on every tree under which you seek shadow from the pelting sun or shelter from the scourging hail. May the pure arms of the woman you shall wed drop paralyzed on your marriage-night with the poison of twining round you, or slowly grow leprous with the shame of clasping the brother whom you trust. Or, if God pity her because she is a woman, for my angel Lily's murdered sake, then may she die of merciful swift horror at learning what you are. Where are His lightnings now? How does hell's crust sleep frozen under your feet that you are not cloven where you stand, that the abyss does not yawn for you, showing me your Judas face and asking me your hypocrite's question? Are you damnation-proof that you come here to see my living corpse, and laugh at the blood oozing afresh from its thousand stabs under your self-convicting finger? Where is my wife? She is in perdition! The kisses, still damp on your cheek, are seals on its thousandfold door—not to be broken till the Judgment-day—then to be sealed again for eternity with fire. Where is my wife? He shall ask you that to whom the blood of Abel cried, and compared with the mark which he shall set on you in that day Cain's shall be a bright star of angelic knighthood—a badge of glory and an honorable scar. Seeing it, no man shall kill you—you shall flee howling down eternity over all the deserts of the universe—mad with imperishable thirst for death, the immortal murderer of a soul! Of a soul? No; not one alone! Already those assassin hands of yours smoke with the blood of two. Wretch—villain—fiend! whatever name they drink your absent health by in the banquet-halls of Satan and pledge to your speedy coming home—murderer and maker of murderers—you have slain both husband and wife for all eternity; you have damned us two who never did your cruel soul aught but God's own kindness. Damned us—but not so deep as you; hell will be almost sweet with the thought that we shall never meet you. Pure, sweet womanhood—hers—chaste and holy as the star that shone over Christ's cradle, you have climbed to by a brother's heart-strings and pulled down into the mire and darkness of the pit. Manhood—mine—faithful as a hound, loving as a woman, trustful as a child, you have fuddled into a fool, and maddened into a tiger. Last night—wandering like a maniac, seeking through earth and heaven for the one sweet glory of my sky that you had pulled down to hell, I had still one little flame of celestial light left me—one guiding star of God's that might have led me home had I known and kept it. But your damning blight was on my brain! Your crime without a name had crazed me, and the fire with which you first taught me to commit arson on my soul, seething in my veins, made that craze a demoniac frenzy. In my blind wrath—because my angel Lily sought to save me by pleading against the poison—sought to keep from me the very weapon of my suicide, right on the edge of the pool—I struck her—foully struck her with my clenched fist, and sank back into a brutal stupor as she rolled over the brink to the black smooth death below, with the life oozing from a ghastly cut upon the temple. I am the dishonored husband of a ruined wife—the murderer of my only child—and you, the slayer of us all—slayer of two full-grown souls and one sweet infant body—stand here this horrible morning, not afraid to look at the ruin you have brought on all my house! But I can see God's bowman behind you—what shall I call your name? No, not 'Iscaiot' or 'jiend'; but, begging from the future that which, wherever my story is told, shall be a synonym of wickedness and infamy—simply Derrick Dalmager. Oh, my Lily, my Lily! Oh, my own angel! Would to God I could have died for thee! Oh, Lily, my child, my child!"

Under this torrent of agony and malediction, poured forth with a volcanic force which knew no pause for breath and waited for no choice of words, even Derrick's wonderful self-control so far forsook him that he trembled and his face grew ghostly pallid. He showed that his nature was shaken to the foundations; and when Cuthbert's hollow voice uttered the terrible words, "I see God's bowman behind you," he started with a shudder and turned half-way round, as if in the direction whither Cuthbert's long, thin forefinger was pointed he expected a visible executioner. Cuthbert's strength forsook him as the last word of his prophecy of doom ended at an intense pitch, well-nigh a shriek; with his apostrophe to Lily his voice sank into a broken-hearted sob, and, trembling so that he nearly fell to the floor, he bowed his head exhaustedly upon the scroll of the foot-board. Bitterly piqued to have been made the object of this blasting denunciation before a negro servant, and even more so to think that he had given his despised enemy a triumph in the sight of his unmistakable emotion, he speedily recalled his self-possession, and in a tone of bravado answered Cuthbert Kearney.

"A very fair sermon. Always thought you'd mistaken your profession. You'd make a good deal better preacher than a mongrel cross between a fast man and a pedagogue. Really, don't know but I prefer you to Pulpidaster! Got any more of that left?" (taking out his watch). "Only been three minutes!"

In his braced condition, a moment before, Cuthbert would have shed this cheap sarcasm off his own fiercer contempt like rain. But coming upon him, as it were, in his unlaced harness, while the thought of his dead child was racking his heart to its utmost endurance, and the mad drops were streaming from his eyes in the presence of a foe who would rather have died than to be seen making the womanly appeal for sympathy involved in tears, it stung the unhappy man to frenzy. Poor Jim, already so frightened by the late tremendous utterance that his athletic six feet three stood him in no better stead than a child's stature, could not recall his presence of mind in time to catch Cuthbert, until the latter, answering, "Any more left? d—n your soul, this!" had darted past him and, with the full impetus of his rush, planted his fist full in Derrick's face.

As I have said, it was a puny fist—but the merest boy's, if delivered entirely without warning, and with that momentum as well as the vis a tergo of such frenzied hate, might have inflicted a severe blow on a man even stouter than Derrick Dalmager. Striking him right between the eyes, for a moment it paralyzed his optic nerve; and while, white as snow with rage, he felt out blindly for his assailant, he received a succession of stinging buffets on the cheeks and ears, which, from their very impotency and lack of any numbing influence, added keenly to the exasperation of the first "facer"—as if he were being chastised by a school-ma'am. When at length he succeeded in grappling Cuthbert, his state of mind was such that he could easily have killed him on the spot. His vigor, compared with that of his puny antagonist, was as cat to mouse, and one good shake of his would have jostled the life out of him. He caught Cuthbert by the throat with one powerful hand, which nearly spanned its slender circumference, and struck him at half-arm's length with the other hammer of a fist; then was about to repeat the dose, when his sight returned, and the spectacle presented to it stopped him. Cuthbert hung limp and lifeless from the hand about his throat, the blood pouring over his face and bosom from an ugly cut across the nose. His pallor was corpse-like where the blood did not reach, and there was no pulse in the carotid where his fingers touched. At the same time Jim ran, with the tears coursing down his own black cheeks, to intercede for him. "Oh, Mass' Derrick!" he cried, "don't mind him—he's crazy, dat's all—wouldn't pay no 'tention to him—he no got more strength than lill' baby—one good lick such as you give an' he die right off!" "Take him then!" growled the Doctor, casting one glance at the poor wet rag of a body as though he'd like, if it were not pusillanimous, to take Cuthbert by the heels and snap his head off, snake-fashion, with one jerk—then with a push sent him spinning into Jim's arms, who gently stretched him out upon the bed.

"You just watch the d—d Yankee till I come back, Jim," said the Doctor. "I'm going down to Owlville, and may not be home for three hours. However long I stay, see that you don't leave him. I can't trust Perro—he's too old and weak. The fellow's like most madmen—infernally quick and strong when he gets a paroxysm." "That's so, Mass' Derrick, you bettah b'lie! When we was bringin' him from de pool dis mornin' early he gave Perro a paroxysm right side de head make him see all de stars in de almanac. Yi! Made de dust fly out ob his wool like de Bible-cushion Sundays when Mass' Pulpidaster gets 'spoundin'."

The Doctor laughed a little, dry laugh, wiped out of his eyes the tears that were coming to see what the matter was with his nose, once more heartily damned the same organs in the person of poor unconscious Cuthbert, and with a final injunction to Jim not to let him leave the room till he himself returned, descended to his buggy, which was still waiting at the porch.

He had not shown to Jim the full extent of his anger. The mortification of being lectured at all, but most especially on such a subject as that chosen for Cuthbert's terrific eloquence, and before his servant, combined with the bitter sense that he had incurred all the guilt of the late adventure—or rather all the reproach, for the other was no very heavy weight to him—without plucking the delicious fruit for which they had been so unhesitatingly encountered, was only less maddening to his pride than the loss of the woman whom he thought the most beautiful, and had loved with the fiercest intensity in the world, had been to his passion. These sufferings were black as death, but would have been kept perdu in his nature, and never roused him to any thing like vengeance upon a man who had already borne such agonies on his account, and whom he too profoundly despised to hate vindictively, even if he could have fallen into the meanness of weaker natures, and hated him in the second place because he had wronged him in the first. To stimulate him into any thing like revenge his disappointment and Cuthbert's verbal bitterness needed just this sharp culmination of physical insult which he had now received; and remembering those blows in the face, which, next to spitting there, his Southern education had taught him to regard the keenest insult which a man could suffer, his hatred became something implacable as the grave; and as he drove back to Owlville he lashed his team into a canter to relieve the wrath which was clamoring for some outlet, and every few rods swore a tremendous soliloquy of oaths at the "Yankee scrub" who had invaded with his foul fingers the sacredness of a gentleman's visage.

When he left the house, and for the first mile or two of his drive, his scheme of punishment had taken the shape of an information before the magistrate against Cuthbert as the murderer of his child, upon his own confession and on circumstantial evidence. But as he grew cooler with exercise and distance from the scene of his affront, an idea occurred to him, putting his plan, on all sides, in a shape so much more satisfactory that he could not refrain from laughing aloud. An assize trial involved long delays. In that part of Kentucky the then existing grade of civilization was familiar with a much speedier tribunal which had done summary justice on several of the Hog Scramble horse-thieves within the last few months. If Lynch could finish the job that very afternoon his insult was wiped away; his worst enemy put beyond the possibility of any further annoyance; and the only obstacle which barred his possession of the one woman he had loved in his whole life with all his nature, was circumvented by the fact of her becoming an interesting widow. He knew well how to manage the matter so that it would never appear to her as having been contrived by him, but only as the process of a popular indignation in which she could not avoid partial sympathy, and he had stood a friend of the accused, helpless to stem the civic torrent for conviction.

On reaching Owlville he managed his case well. He went from store to store, and tavern to tavern; into the streets, and about the race-track—wherever there was an idle crowd to listen to a thrilling account of the horror which had taken place at the Dalmager demesne. He was particularly careful to make the story telling where much liquor was undergoing consumption, and where he noticed faces that had been conspicuous about the grounds during the late Lynch trials for horse-stealing. When, finally, one of the foremost characters on such occasions jumped up from his tipped-back chair in the bar-room of the Boone House, and, thumping his glass on the table, swore a loud oath that this was decidedly a case for the "Chief Justice," Derrick so handsomely feigned perturbation and deprecated any interference with due course of law, that he left the hotel with all the landlord's customers following him, and in half an hour had a retinue of more than a hundred "prominent citizens," including some of the scurviest rag-tag and bobtail of the town. Wherever it passed a corner grocery, or a row of gentlemen of leisure propping a side-wall, somebody called out to a friend in the procession, "What's all this yere faw?" and the friend nonchalantly replied, "Only gwine up to Dalmager's to a hangin'," and the entire grocery emptied or wall bared itself to swell the march. In no case did the answer take any other form, the "hangin'" seeming a foregone conclusion. A Lynch trial that ended in any other way would have been regarded as a fraud upon the moral sense of the community, like a church without a sermon, or a Sunday-school book in which all the bad little boys did not go out rowing on the Sabbath and get drowned.

WOMAN IN MEDIEVAL FRENCH SOCIETY.

ALL history concurs in confirming the veneration for women said to be possessed by the people of the North; a sentiment more or less deep, but common among the Celtic nations. These ferocious people, whose sensibility in love bore no resemblance to the emotion inspired by warmer climates, were, nevertheless, influenced by a kind of educated admiration for the sex whom they formerly held in bondage. They perceived in women something that appeared to them divine; they permitted to them the authority of oracular rulers, and confirmed the empire of beauty by a confidence that was almost religious. Whether it be considered as the result of that brisk imagination which renders women so susceptible of all remarkable influences; or whether it was that fine sagacity which enables them to penetrate the secrets of the heart, grasp the hidden springs of human action, and impart to men those wise counsels so superior to the results of their more deliberate meditations; or, lastly, whether it was owing to that insinuating and captivating address with which the beautiful subdues the strong, and sweetness triumphs over ferocity, it can not be doubted that all these causes, either separately or collectively considered, exercised an amazing influence over public manners, and over the most pithy and momentous enterprises. To merit the beauty whom he adored the warrior endured all fatigues and calmly confronted death. The spoils of an enemy slain by him formed a concomitant to his amorous pursuits. The ideas of war and love seemed inseparable, and the bard almost invariably confounded them in stimulating heroism and in celebrating heroes.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Mrs. D. L. THOMPSON.—The sample of fringe you send is very handsome. Guipure lace is not a suitable heading for fringe. Use instead three rows of satin piping, or an inch-wide fold of satin fastened in the centre by a row of piping. Do not trim the waist of your dress with fringe, as it waves about with every motion of the body, and looks untidy. Let the piping descend from the throat, forming a point on the bosom, and extending over the sleeves as epaulets. Put a row of the fringe at the top of the sleeves. Trim the cuffs simply with piping.

Tastes differ about the length of trains. For your height we would advise sixty inches as the length of the back width. In the most graceful skirt pattern there are three widths slightly gored on each side, with a straight width in the back. Many modistes prefer, however, to gore only two side widths. Get the proper length of the front and back widths, and slope the others gradually. If your gros grain is heavy do not line the skirt. Work button-holes up the front of corsage, by all means. Make a panier sash, with four puffed-out loops and two broad short sides. Bind the sash, and do not line it. Trim the sides with pipings, and the ends with fringe. Put your pocket and opening in the skirt in the second side seam.

E. G.—The law protects a woman fully in the possession of her property, and she can act in regard to it, and sue for debts due to her personally, without joining with or consulting her husband.

STUDENT.—The proverb, "Birds of a feather flock together," is best translated by the equivalent French saying: Qui se ressemble s'assemble. A literal verbal rendering of the English phrase would be hardly understood in France.

EVA C.—One of the best external applications for excessive secretion of oily matter by the skin is:

Oil of sweet almonds..... 1 ounce.
Fluid potass..... 1 drachm.

Shake well together, and add:

Rose water..... 1 ounce.
Pure water..... 6 ounces.

Powdered starch, a simple lotion of weak tea, or one made of equal parts of lemon juice and water, will also be found useful. With these external applications there should be a generous diet, including a daily beverage at dinner of claret wine and water. It is not necessary to abstain entirely from the use of butter.

NEWARK.—Large bows and wide collars are worn by girls of thirteen. Tie the bow carelessly. Loops hanging loosely look more unstudied than bows. We think the sailor collar pointed on the shoulders more youthful. Plain waterfalls are no longer fashionable. Girls of your age braid the hair in an oblong chignon, or roll it in thick cables, and wind it around the crown of the head. Fichus are very pretty and universally worn. They display a slender figure to fine advantage.

Powdered chalk..... 5 ounces.
Powdered camphor..... 2 ounces.
Mix.

This is one of the simplest and most innocent of tooth powders, none of which, however, are as good for the teeth as soap and water. The best hair cleanser is a raw egg. A mixture of lime juice and glycerine is also very good.

TEMPERANCE.—Of all refreshing summer drinks there is none better than a little iced sugar and water, with a few drops of orange flower water, which has the advantage of not only being palatable but very effective as a quietor of the nerves. The French use it a great deal, and have much faith in its efficacy in all cases of exhaustion from heat, fatigue, undue excitement, etc.

PHILOSOPHER.—In the centigrade thermometer, generally used in France, the scale is divided into 100 degrees; the freezing-point being marked 0°, the boiling-point 100°. In the Fahrenheit, used in this country and in England, the freezing-point is 32° and boiling-point 212°. In the thermometer of Reaumur, ordinarily employed in Germany, the freezing-point is 0° and boiling-point 80°. A simple formula for reducing a degree of one to a degree of the other will be found in most books on chemistry.

HEN. H.—The best means of avoiding the fatal effects of sun-stroke are temperance in eating and drinking, moderate labor and exercise in the shade, and a resolute resistance to irritable sensations and exciting or depressing passions. The best remedies are ice and cold water to the head, a mustard plaster to the pit of the stomach, warmth to the feet, and a few drops of brandy-and-water poured into the mouth. At the same time the sufferer should be placed in a lying position, with the head slightly raised, and kept refreshed by a free ventilation.

NO NAME.—The sample you send is pretty but very old-fashioned. Make it up tastefully, and it will be admired. Round the corners. Suspend a triangular pocket from the belt on the right side. Make pinked bretelles and short sash.

E. H. WILSON.—We have an article on Hanging Baskets in course of preparation, which will soon be published. You are right in supposing that we give no patterns except those contained in our Supplement; we give illustrations and lucid descriptions, however, of a great many useful and beautiful articles besides.

Mrs. M. J.—We have already given several patterns for dresses of infants and young children, and shall give others within a short time. We are sorry not to oblige you, but we have already explained that it is impossible for us immediately to publish in our Supplement the patterns that may be demanded by individuals.

J. L.—Paniers are decidedly in fashion. Some gored skirt patterns have a sloped seam in the back, but it is considered safest, and paniers require it, to make the back breadth full. Black illusion fanchons, trimmed with purple pipings and Parmese violets, are worn for half mourning. Frosted tulle that seems to be sprinkled with steel is also used. A shepherdess round hat of black Neapolitan straw is surrounded with a wreath of white daisies. A "nymph" hat, which is merely a tall crown without rim, is trimmed with several rouleaux of lavender satin. A standing aigrette of purple flowers and wheat on the left, and long mantilla veil of spotted illusion.

Iron grenadines and Ernani, trimmed with black or purple, are worn for home and street dresses in light mourning. White linen with black polka dots, and with stripes, is selected for morning dresses. Linen lawn is selling at from twenty-five to forty cents a yard.

BURNETT'S COCAINE is one of the most excellent and beautifying hair preparations to be found in this or any other country.—Charleston Mercury.

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly-invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by News-dealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

FACETIÆ.

An editor whose subscribers were remiss in payment, lately published the following announcement in his paper: "To save our readers the trouble of sending their subscriptions by post, and to relieve two unfortunates, we shall send to each of our debtors in the course of a few days two collectors, one of whom has hardly recovered from the small-pox, and the other of whom has just taken the itch." The delinquents did not wait to be called on, but paid their dues promptly.

"My dear, what is the difference between exportation and transportation?" asked a wife of her husband, as they were walking on the beach at Long Branch. "A very great one, my love," was the answer. "Do you see that ship yonder? If you were in her, you would be exported, and I should be transported."

DANCE FOR MILKMEN—The can-can.

SIGNAL FAILURES—Railway accidents.

GREEDY.—During a series of wet days a gentleman ventured to congratulate his umbrella-maker. "Yes, that's all very well, Sir," he replied; "but then there's nothing whatever doing in parasols."

WHERE A FULL STOP IS WANTED.—To the girl of the period.

HOW HE PLAYED.—Old Bull was once seeing the sights at Donnybrook fair, when he was attracted by the sound of a very loud violin in a tent. He entered and said to the player, "My good friend, do you play by note?" "The devil a note, Sir," "Do you play by ear, then?" "Never an ear, your Honor," "How do you play, then?" "By main strength, he jabbers!"

HINTS FOR HOT WEATHER.

The papers contain a great variety of laconic advice to people in the hot weather. Much of it is so sensible that we desire to add to it more of the same sort:

Do not go in the sun and exercise yourself violently with dumb-bells at 2 p.m., with the thermometer at 107°.

Do not wear furs in July. Ladies should not wear muffs during the dog-days.

Ice-water is dangerous, if drunk in quantities of a gallon and over at a time. Do not eat more than four pounds of beef-steak at breakfast. It is heating to the nerves.

Standing on your head on the Broadway bridge, between 1 and 3 p.m. is decidedly injurious.

Wear seven flannel shirts next to the skin. In India, the West Indies, and other hot countries, the natives often wear fourteen red flannel shirts at a time.

Lager beer is harmless if taken in moderation. For a German, moderation is twenty-six glasses.

Do not eat more than four meals a day in this hot weather.

Never go without a substantial dinner, however. If you haven't money enough to get it, borrow enough. Do not let the repayment of it bother you, as it is not good at this season to be at all mentally excited.

If you have any friends with cool places in the country, go and spend a week with them. It will be economical. Don't invite them back to town with you, as it would not be economical to do so, and financial anxiety at this season might prove fatal.

Do not go out in the street without an umbrella. Borrowed ones are cheapest.

Do not drink any thing at all during the heated term, because a confirmed drunkard died yesterday from sun-stroke. Hence, drinking is fatal.

WOMAN'S WORD-BOOK.

Testament.—An act which proves the value of a husband.

Theatre.—A place of exhibition where the only serious comedy is played in the front of the house.

Thin.—A quality which, in woman's vintage only, recommends a good wine.

Thought.—A bird which flies too rapidly for woman to put any salt on its tail.

Time.—Woman's rival: for no tight lacing can compare with the waist of time.

Tinsel.—The patent of stage nobility—but all the world is a stage.

Tobacco.—A pleasant weed before marriage, a foul habit after. N.B. Widows' weeds are the only ones which don't end in smoke.

Tombstone.—The stamp on Death's little bill.

Tongue.—The unruly member for Plymouth.

Tooth, Teeth.—Singular, a tusk. Perfect-plural, a set of pearls.

Treasure.—The husband who has left you a widow.

Truth.—An invisible girl condemned in hatred of chignons and false charms to remain at the bottom of a well.

A NATURAL ARTIST.—One who draws his breath.

The usual Leap-year advice to young women is "to act like men."

DEAR EATING.—Venison.

In the harbor of San Francisco a wave struck a fishing-boat, and overboard went two disciples of Ike Walton. Some parties who happened to be in a boat close by went to their assistance, and rescued the half-drowned pair. On being questioned how the accident occurred, they replied, "We didn't capsize; we only went down to see why the darn fish wouldn't bite."

A SNEEZE.

What a moment! What a doubt!
All my nose, inside and out,
All my thrilling, tickling, caustic
Pyramid rhinocerosic
Wants to sneeze and can not do it.
Now it yearns me, thrills me, stings me;
Now with rapturous torment wrings me;
Now says "Sneeze, you fool; get through it."
Shee—shee—oh! 'tis most del—ishi—
Ishi—ishi—most del—ishi—
(Hang it! I shall sneeze till Spring),
Snuff's a most delicious thing.

A young lady being asked by a feminine acquaintance whether she had any original poetry in her album, replied, "No; but some of my friends have favored me with original spelling."

The principal difference between a luxury and a necessary is the price.

The most delicate way of giving a lady a key to your feelings is to send her a lock of your hair.

A soldier on trial for drunkenness was addressed by the magistrate: "Prisoner, you have the charge of habitual drunkenness, what have you to say in defense?" "Nothing, please your Honor, but habitual thirst."

The tourist who picked up Italian has recently dropped some expressions in that language.

During a steam-voyage, on a sudden stoppage of the machinery, considerable alarm took place, especially among the female passengers. "What is the matter? What is the matter? For Heaven's sake tell me the worst!" exclaimed one, more anxious than the rest. After a short pause, a hoarse voice replied, "Nothing, Madam, nothing! Only the bottom of the vessel and the top of the earth are stuck together."

A traveling life insurance agent applied to a Texan to "take out a policy;" but the Texan replied, "A fellow's life is so confounded uncertain in this community, it ain't worth insuring."

IRRITABLE SCHOOLMASTER.—"Now, then, stupid, what's the next word? What comes after cheese?" Dull boy.—"Mouse, Sir."

"What is it that causes the saltiness of the water of the ocean?" inquired a teacher. "The cod-fish," was the reply.

Put two persons in the same bedroom, one of whom has the toothache and the other is in love, and it will be found that the person having the toothache will go to sleep first.

Mr. Smithers thinks the arithmetic of some phases of life very queer. He married one woman and found six—Miss Sprigleaf, her mother, two aunts, and two nieces. One can't always tell; and in this case it isn't probably overpleasant to tell.

A desperate lover committed suicide, leaving a note expressing a hope of meeting Susan in the next world. As he neglected to state his future address in full, she may have difficulty in finding him.

Mat for Lamps, Vases, etc.

THIS mat, which is shown reduced in size in the accompanying illustration, is of white linen edged with two rows of points which are made of narrow linen tape. The remaining trimming consists of herring-bone stitch in black silk. This mat may be made of any size desired. Arrange the points singly by referring to the second illustration, which shows a section of the border of the full size. The points must lie close together around the edge. Trim the points with herring-bone stitch in the manner shown by the illustration. The outer row of points is set in between the double material of the mat and caught with a stitch. A strip of linen worked in herring-bone stitch conceals the edge where the second is sewed on.

ABUSING THE AGE.

WITHOUT doubt no age was ever abused like the present. The habit of censuring the times is no recent thing, for signs of its prevalence appear in the days of David and Solomon, and of Aristophanes and Seneca. Diogenes and Cato are products of every civilization that dissatisfies men with outward objects by awakening such hunger and thirst of soul as it can not appease. But old as the habit is of condemning the age, it was never so keenly critical, so unmercifully censorious as in our time. Of this spirit Carlyle is a striking illustration; and yet it is not seen alone in men of his sturdy build. Men and women of every variety of temperament, who have entered into the deeper realities of life and then yielded to the natural impressions of subtle instincts, have united in judgment upon the age.

No one can deny that these stern critics have some truth in their favor. The wrongs which they denounce, the enormities they expose, no less than the evils disguised under the reconciling forms of fashion and conventional usage, are formidable realities which it were sheer folly to question. This admitted, it is nevertheless true that certain thinkers of the day make most unreasonable demands on the age by expecting too much of its intellect and religion. We do not ask them to abate their ideals, but they would be much wiser and more useful men if, while holding up a high standard, they were more considerate of human infirmity, more lenient in their estimates of the difficulties obstructing the progress of reform, and more charitable in their comments on the world's tardiness in availing itself of ready means of improvement. A precocious development of society is no more desirable than a precocious development of individuals, and least of all should we covet it in political and social systems. If all goodness is of the nature of "heaven," that slowly permeates the mass—if even the "kingdom of heaven" is content to grow as a "mustard seed"—we should certainly not demand haste in the advance of humanity as related to political and social ethics. Haste is pretty sure to fall into spasms. And spasms, in behalf of intelligence and virtue, are quite as disastrous as other kinds of convulsions. Grant that the mournful forebodings of many of the foremost thinkers of the age have some ground of justification. Grant that the stronger fibres of humanity are relaxing, and that our recent civilization is threatening to overmaster us. Grant that the old heroisms are waning, and that the beliefs of ages, so long precious to the heart, are losing their hold on many brave souls. All this is sad enough. But the doubts that perplex the better order of minds because the world grows pure and strong so slowly—the despair seizing great intellects in the presence of gigantic evils—the attenuated faith of multitudes resting in opinions rather than in convictions; in brief, all that we include in the skepticisms of this century, are symptoms of a very different state of the public mind from that which preceded the French Revolution. No man like Voltaire could be produced in our age; no book like the Sorrows of Werther; no body of writers like the Encyclopedists. And while it can not be denied that much downright perversity of intellect, much laxity of moral sentiment, and much love of evil, are found in the querulousness and ennui and unbelief of the times, yet it is also true that much of the current discontent is the price we are paying for the intellectual and moral progress of the age.

SUMMER TOILETTES.

We are making vast demands upon ourselves and upon the world. We are clamorous for quick and long strides toward the goal we are eager to gain. People were never as restless under the restraints of Providence. Law is too slow and Justice too forbearing for our impetuous passions. Impulse has no vent in chivalry and crusades, but turns in fierce strength upon its own vitals. Through it all, however, human nature is destined to emerge; and hence, amidst the painful perplexities and gross iniquities that abound, we never had as much reason to hope in humanity and to trust in Providence.

TO TIMID WORKERS.

THE smallest things may work for good;
For every glistening drop of dew
That rounds without the bordering wood
In nature hath a part to do.
Its pearl may win a flower to birth,
The blossom thrive and scatter seeds,
And year by year the nursing Earth
With its fair children plant the meads;
Till keen-eyed Notice find the flower
A use as well as beauty hath,
That in the fibre lives a power,
When drops the circlet on the path.
'Twill lead to wider thought the world
While minist'ring to growing need;
And Use on Nature's flag unfurled,
E'en heart-locked Prejudice will read.
Then think not thou a little act
Too slight to lend a noble fact.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 15, 1868.

WHOLESOME INDIFFERENCE.

THERE may be too much as well as too little care of the health. An overanxiety in regard to the condition of the body or the mind even will produce the very ailment feared. Men of science tell us that if the attention is fixed with a persevering solicitude upon any corporeal organ or its function, however sound may be the condition of the one or perfect the performance of the other at first, disorder and disease will finally ensue. In a word, if any one cares to try the experiment, he can create a malady for himself at his pleasure—or rather, it should be said, his pain. Physiologists explain the modus operandi very satisfactorily. They say that with the direction of that act of the mind, attention, there flows a current of nervous fluid to the corporeal part, which becomes in consequence excited to an increased degree of vitality. This involves necessarily greater activity of the circulation, and, in fact, of all the organic functions. With each repetition of the mental act there is increased physical motion, until finally there is excessive irritability, congestion, inflammation, disease, and, of course, perverted faculty.

A perfect state of health—the mens sana in corpore sano, the sound mind in the sound body—implies, with a complete performance of the function of each, a total indifference to its mode of action. When the attention is powerfully drawn to, and a solicitude felt about, the means by which any ordinary physical or mental result is accomplished, it is certain that there is either disease or a state of irregular activity which will lead to it.

Hypochondriacs and nervous people, who are so often bantered about their ceaseless ailments, are more entitled to our sympathy than deserving of ridicule. Though termed imaginary sufferers, they are real ones, and, however fictitious may have been the original cause of their state, it could not long have existed without producing a genuine malady.

It is essential to health to be indifferent to it. A perfectly sound person should, for example, be unconscious of the possession of a stomach. It has been carefully packed away out of sight and reach by nature, and it was never intended to be revealed to the consciousness of its possessor. It only discloses itself to the disordered and diseased by various agitations, internal revolutions, noisy grumblings, and other uneasy reminders of its disturbed existence. To the perfectly healthy it gives not the slightest hint of its presence.

If the laws of health were faithfully applied to the education of the young, and strictly obeyed by those more advanced in life, this unconsciousness of physical and mental action, which is the ideal of wholesomeness, would be general. With a vigorous constitution, and an habitual regard to hygienic rules, there would be no occasion, as there would be no desire, to watch the performance of any function. We should all at first conform strictly to that regularity of exercise, mental and bodily, temperance in eating and drinking, and chaste restraint of appetite and passion, inculcated by nature, and then yield ourselves up unreservedly to the comfortable state of "wholesome indifference."

LONG VACATIONS.

THE practice of putting all the school holidays into one lump is becoming more and more common. The year is now generally divided into eight months of study and four of idleness. This is about as rational as the Irishman's plan of feeding his pig one day and starving it the next, that the pork may have a streak of lean alternating with a streak of fat.

There is undoubtedly a convenience to teachers, and sometimes to parents, in the long single vacation, as it affords opportunity for prolonged visits to the country and distant voyages. Schools, however, should be, we suppose, regulated in accordance with the interests of the pupil, and not of master and mistress. We can not believe that this complete separation of work and play is beneficial to the young. Their organization requires a daily alternation of the two, and without it there can be neither physical nor intellectual health. Too much or too little of either is equally injurious. With the prevalent system of concentrating all the study in eight, and all the idleness in four months of the year, the brain of the child is at the one time overworked, as it is underworked at the other. Daily moderate exercise is as essential to mental as to bodily health. It is a fatal error to suppose that prolonged idleness is beneficial to any soundly-constituted youth. Not only is regular occupation of the mind essential to its own health, but to that of the physical frame with which it is so closely allied.

An harmonious action of all parts of the human system should be preserved in accordance with their natural relation. It is absurd to attempt to separate the thinking from the moving being, and to provide for the one without regard to the other. Their mutual dependence is such that they must both be upheld by a common and simultaneous care. The prevailing school system, which gives exclusive regard to the forcing of the intellect during two-thirds and throws it out to waste the rest of the year, is just the absurdity of attempting to do what nature forbids. By a less unequal distribution of study and play we are convinced that more telling work could be got out of the child, and more enjoyment secured for him, than by the present system of concentrating all the labor in eight and idleness in four months. The effect upon his physical and intellectual health would be equally invigorating.

The plan we would propose implies the necessity of daily systematic exercise, both mental and bodily, which we believe to be in accordance with the human organization and essential to its well-being. We suggest that the months of holiday be equally distributed throughout those of work, so that each day may have its fair share of both. The school hours might thus be diminished from six to four, running from 10 to 2 instead of from 9 to 3. The protracted tedium of constraint, hard work, and hard benches, universally complained of, would thus be brought into a more endurable limit. Children who are now so clamorous for holidays, as they may well be—for the present system exhausts their patience and endurance—would be content to pursue an even tenor of daily but moderate study, unwearied by protracted labor and indifferent to long vacations.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

MY DEAR ALICIBIADES,—You tell me that you consider yourself a gentleman, and that you hope you know what becomes a gentleman. I sincerely hope so too; but I know of no word more misunderstood or more curiously misapplied. The old proverb says that manners make the man. But surely it is agreed that they make the gentleman. Taking the word in the large sense, as the whole conduct of a man in every relation, you may certainly tell a gentleman by his manners. Indeed, although the word can not be very precisely defined, it has reference to a human quality as subtle as aroma in flowers. There may be fine, manly, moral, trusty persons to whom the word gentleman does not exactly apply. But you can see from that very fact how easy it is to strain and misapply the word, and describe a foolish, finnikin, point-device

Sir Percie Shafton as a gentleman; which is a ludicrous mistake.

Shakespeare is very fond of hitting this pseudo gentleman. Osric in Hamlet is one of them. He comes bursting in upon the moody Prince, and reveals himself in the manner in which he speaks of Laertes: "Sir, here is, newly come to Court, Laertes; believe me, an absolute gentleman, full of most excellent differences, of very soft society, and great showing. Indeed, to speak feelingly of him, he is the card or calendar of gentry; for you shall find in him the continent of what part a gentleman would see." This was the Euphuistic strain of the time which caricatured truth as Osric caricatured the gentleman, and which Hamlet humorously satirizes in his reply. So in "a certain Lord" whom Hotspur describes, the hero who, "twixt his finger and his thumb," held a pouncet-box, and who deplored the unmannerly bringing of a corse "betwixt the wind and his nobility," there is a sketch of the same kind of gentleman. Yet nowhere more plainly than in Shakespeare will you find an indication of the true quality which the word gentleman intends to describe.

Yet the modern idea of gentleman is perhaps better than that of Shakespeare's time. He was then a hero of chivalric manners; but his heroism consisted of personal courage and skill, and his chivalry hardly included absolute respect for women. Indeed, if the old theory of woman was that of a slave, chivalry was merely the reaction and made her a goddess. In neither was she an equal companion. In the time of Richard II. in England, as Mr. Charles Stuart Parker tells us in a late essay: "Gentlemen took care that their sons should learn 'courtesy,' to ride, sing, play upon the lute and virginals, perform feats of arms, dance, carve and wait at table, where they might heed the conversation (sometimes French or Latin), and study the manners of great men." And about the year 1500 a gentleman is represented as saying: "To blow a neat blast on the horn, to understand hunting, to carry a hawk handsomely, and train it, that is what becomes the son of a gentleman; but as for book-learning, he should leave that to louts."

My dear Alicibiades, there are many of you gay youth to-day at Newport and Saratoga who practically hold the same view. At any rate, you are very apt to leave book-learning to louts. And what happens? Those whom you call louts leave you in the lurch in the battle of life. Schiller said that genius was diligence. And in Germany to-day, as Matthew Arnold tells us in his admirable report upon the schools and universities of the Continent, the educated men, whether louts or not, bear away the prizes in trade as in every other career. Nor is this a new thing, for Roger Ascham said—Lady Jane Grey's tutor—"The fault is in yourselves, ye noblemen's sons, and therefore ye deserve the greater blame, that commonly the meaner men's children come to be the wisest councilors and greatest doers in the weighty affairs of this realm."

But the modern theory of the gentleman is truer, because it discards caste altogether. That is to say, it does not make the gentleman a result of rank and class, but wholly of character and manner. I shall not deny the value and result of training. There is no reason that the care which by thought, and labor, and persistence develops finer fruit and animals should not develop finer men. Manners are indeed the result of training; but, of course, there must be the substance to be trained. The modern theory requires that the gentleman shall be for use, not merely for ornament, as formerly. Shakespeare's gentleman could not help feeling that the only fit labor for gentle hands was that of the field or the tourney. We moderns hold it may be that of the field, but in another sense. I speak now of the better idea, not of Harry Diamond's, and Ned Turquoise's, and the Pounds, and Hundredweights. They are of the pouncet-box gentry. It is not our theory that a gentleman does nothing elegantly; but that, although an idler may be a gentleman, a man is so much the more a gentleman as he adds to his true courtesy true usefulness. But we must not topple over upon the other side. A scavenger is not necessarily a gentleman because he is useful; but a man, of whatever gentleness of manner, who despises him because he is a scavenger is not a gentleman.

For it is not in the manner only, I think, that the gentleman shows himself, but in the union of feeling and manner. Perhaps the basis of the gentleman is not merely good feeling, but humility. In this view gentlemanliness becomes what would be called a Christian grace. It is the instinctive apprehension of the divine element in man. For who knows—such is the mystery of divinity—that the very God may not be masking in the most squalid form? I advise you, my dear Alicibiades, to free your mind of the technical and traditional conception of the gentleman; for if you model yourself by that, you will probably end in the pouncet-box or the dandy like George IV., or Brummel, or D'Orsay. I wish I knew who first called George IV. the first gentleman in Europe. It was the most exquisite sarcasm. I have never been able to discover that he had a single trait of the gentleman, except that he wore clean clothes. At least they were so externally. But I have grave doubts whether, if we had climbed a tree and broken into his chamber at Carlton House, and had seen the potentate doing what, N. P. Willis declared that he climbed a tree and saw President Lincoln do in the White House—I have, I say, grave doubts whether—But let it suffice that his coat was clean. That was much more than his soul was or his manners. And if I were Mr. Disraeli, Prime Minister of England to-day, I would recommend my liege lord Champagne Charlie, Prince of Wales, to study carefully the biography of his great uncle, and to avoid his example in every particular.

Indeed I would urge upon that Prince, and upon you, Prince Alcibiades, and upon all the princes of my acquaintance, to become familiar with the example of Mr. Joseph Paice, of Breadstreet-hill, merchant, and one of the Directors of the South Sea Company, who was a subject of King George IV. I imagine him, for the surviving records are very scanty, and yet we can reconstruct him from a few hints, as fully as Cuvier or Owen could reconstruct an animal from a bone or two—I imagine him as having some of the general appearance of one of the milder and juicier of old Quaker merchants, such as we have all known—a hale, smooth-faced, large, benignant, quiet-spoken man. His brief biography says that he was bred a Presbyterian; but I perceive that he belonged to the broadest church, and I don't believe he supposed that the Archbishop of Canterbury was going to perdition because he did not go to the Presbyterian meeting. Indeed I can fancy Mr. Paice sitting in his pew on a tranquil summer Sunday afternoon, near the window, and while the worthy pastor pounds away on the pulpit cushions, hearing the pleasant music of hymns from another church or chapel of another faith, perhaps some of the beautiful verses of Charles Wesley, and inwardly smiling with satisfaction as he thinks of the great host of believers, all marching under their own banners to the same bourne.

But I do wrong to obtrude any crude fancy of mine upon the lovely sketch of him that remains to us, and which has always seemed to me one of the most delightful portraits of the true gentleman. Sir Philip Sidney, the gentleman of an earlier day, is not more delicately, more tenderly, more perfectly described by Fulke Greville, than Joseph Paice by his biographer. "I have seen him," says my author, "stand bareheaded—smile if you please—to a poor servant girl while she has been inquiring of him the way to some street, in such a posture of unforced civility as neither to embarrass her in the acceptance, nor himself in the offer, of it. He was no dangler, in the common acceptance of the term, after women, but he revered and upheld in every form in which it came before him, womanhood. I have seen him—nay, smile not—tenderly escorting a market-woman, whom he had encountered in a shower, exalting his umbrella over her poor basket of fruit, that it might receive no damage, with as much carefulness as if she had been a countess. To the reverend form of Female Eld he would yield the wall (though it were to an ancient beggar-woman), with more ceremony than we can afford to show our grandams. He was the Preux Chevalier of Age; the Sir Calidore, or Sir Tristan, to those who have no Calidores or Tristans to defend them. The roses that had long faded thence, still bloomed for him in those withered and yellow cheeks."

Joseph Paice lived and died a bachelor. But he owed this exquisite courtesy to the beautiful girl to whom he paid his addresses, and who died early in their courtship. It seems that she had heard him—it was in his youth, of course—"rating a young woman" who had brought home his cravats unseasonably—it was in the age of Brummel—and she said, If I were a poor girl and had been belated in bringing home cravats "what sort of compliments should I have received?" That just rebuke developed all his courtesy. It dissipated the thin cloud that obscured his true gentlemanliness or gentility. It seems to me that his politeness to the poorest woman was really an act of humility. He did not patronize her. His manner was not a pouncet-box between her and his nobility. It was a simple pushing aside of all kinds of thorny hedges of convention so that he and all whom he addressed stood together upon their pure humanity.

If you, and the other princes your companions, wish to read this biography, it will not occupy your attention more than a quarter of an hour, but it will enrich your memory and imagination forever. You will find it in the Essay of Elia upon "Modern Gallantry"—Elia, who was a gentleman of the same old school. How many of that school do you find at Newport this year? How many who are as courteous to Mrs. Tilbury's maid as to Mrs. Tilbury, and whose conduct to their washer-women cheers those hard workers with real human sympathy? I like to believe that Joseph Paice, as he read Edmund Burke, for I am very sure that he did read him, remembered Burke's answer to some one who expressed surprise upon seeing him touch his hat to a footman. "Sir, would you have me outdone in courtesy by a footman?" My dear Alcibiades, I should feel surer that Sir Walter Raleigh was a gentleman if I knew that he had respectfully handed an orange girl over the kennel, than I do now when I merely know that he laid his satin cloak across a puddle for the Queen to step over. If I wish to know whether you are a gentleman I shall ask your washer-woman, not the rich and fair Miss Lapis Lazuli to whom I hear that you are devoted.

Your well-wisher,
AN OLD BACHELOR.

HOUSEHOLD CONVENIENCES.

REFRIGERANTS.

IN this heated term, when cooling devices are eagerly sought after, we are persuaded that a record of the latest novelties in this direction will interest our readers quite as much as the newest styles of bonnets and fichus.

A correspondent asks if the upright refrigerator is superior to the old-fashioned ice-chest. We think it is. The closet-shaped refrigerator is constructed on scientific principles. Cold air descends, consequently the compartment for ice is placed at the top, producing a cold, dry atmosphere in the provision chambers below, instead of the damp, heavy air common to the flat chest. Meats and fruit should not be placed on melting ice, as this hastens instead of arresting decay. The strongest-flavored fruit should be placed at the bottom. Zinc-lined refrigerators should be washed once a week with saleratus water.

The "Zero Refrigerator" is highly commended. The ice and provision chambers do not communicate. Thus no hot air reaches the ice except when the door is opened for putting in more ice. The drippings of the ice are retained and drawn off by a faucet. When the ice is kept clean this serves for drinking-water. Housekeepers will appreciate this arrangement, as there is no water spilled on the floor. An excellent wine-cooler is attached. The "Zero" is made of wood, grained in imitation of oak. It is lined with zinc, filled in with charcoal. The faucet and castors are silver-plated. The price ranges from $27 to $55.

An excellent refrigerator for family use is called the "Excelsior." It is a tall closet with double doors. The ice compartment, across the upper part, has an iron corrugated bottom, with openings at the side for the cold air to descend and force up the light, hot air. There are tin wire shelves below for vegetables, fruit, and meat. A pipe at the back conducts the water into a basin underneath. A medium-sized refrigerator of this patent is sold at $37. The smallest size, with a single door, is $18.

The Nonpareil is very similar to the refrigerator just described, but is made in a greater variety of sizes. One suitable for a small family is sold for $16. The largest size, worth $58, has a wine-cooler attached, with separate lock and key.

A small, compact ice-cupboard, called the "Zero milk, wine, and water cooler," is invaluable to families boarding in private houses. It is about twenty inches high and twelve wide, is made of japanned tin, zinc lined, with charcoal between. A block of ice is put in at the top. The wine-cooler beside it has a separate lock. Below these are apartments for water and milk jars. It is used in nurseries for keeping milk sweet, and in dining-rooms for preserving desserts cool and fresh during the earlier courses of dinner. Price $15.

ICE-CREAM FREEZERS.

The "Arctic" is considered one of the best ice-cream freezers. It revolves by means of a fly-wheel. A long beating-knife inside turns at the same time, and cuts the cream as it freezes, making it smooth. A new freezer, much used in France, has just been introduced here. The can containing the cream is placed inside a larger cylinder filled with ice and salt; both are then placed on an iron frame, and by means of a crank they are moved together in a steady rotary motion. The outside cylinder is covered with a felt cloth, and is handsome enough to be brought to the dining-room. The "rotary" freezer is well adapted to making water-ices, frozen fruits, and Champagne frappé, as the constant plunging of the fluid makes it freeze smoothly without flakes. Four minutes is the time required. The price is $5 for a freezer holding three quarts.

ICE-PITCHERS

The greater part of the ice-pitchers now in use are lined with a mixture of nickel silver and Britannia. These different metals act upon each other in the water and corrode. It is said that water remaining four hours in such pitchers is deleterious to health, and in twenty-four hours the metallic poison is perceptible to the taste. We have been shown some pitchers with a seamless lining made from one piece of metal without soldering that are not open to this objection. The porcelain-lined pitcher is also commended by high authority as free from any thing poisonous or injurious. The enamel is very durable, and is easily kept clean. Still another pitcher has a galvanized iron plate inserted in the bottom, which makes it very strong and impervious to the sharp lumps of ice that careless servants are prone to thrust into it. Pitchers of white metal, heavily plated with silver, may be bought at from $8 to $25. Ice-urns of the same metal range from $30 to $40. Servants should be instructed to partially fill a pitcher with water before putting in the ice.

An improved wine-cooler has a cylinder for the bottle separated by a partition from the ice. A partial covering at the top conceals the ice in the basin. In plated silver the price is $10.

FANNING-MACHINE.

Before leaving the appliances for keeping cool

we must mention a novel fanning-machine invented by a Frenchman residing here. It is a succession of broad, flat plates of tin, painted green, and arranged circularly on a frame. An arm at the side is moved by the motion of the foot in the same way that the sewing-machine is worked. This makes the fan revolve rapidly, producing a pleasant breeze. Invalids find a pleasant recreation in the new machine, as it requires but little effort to run it, but it will scarcely supersede palm-leaf fans, as the price is $18.

PLATED WARE.

Among a dozen kinds of cork-screw the most ingenious has a long siphon with a faucet at the top, by which a glass of Champagne may be drawn from a bottle, and the remainder kept closed to prevent effervescence. The price, when silver-plated, is from $3 to $6. We saw also long slender forks for taking olives and foreign pickles out of long-necked jars. The pickles are caught by a spring, which serves afterward to project them on the plate. A great assistance in carving is a silver ring with a handle for holding the large bone of a joint instead of making punctures in the meat with a fork. There were silver ice-tongs with sharp claws, and cheese-scoops with slides to propel the cheese into the plate; pie-forks with one prong sharpened at the side to cut pastry; lobster-scoops and slender, narrow spoons, well-shaped for digging out the dainty morsels so dear to epicures. A plated crumb-tray opened with hinges. Inside was a crumb-brush of soft bristles, the back mounted with silver.

WOODEN WARE.

On another counter was displayed innumerable articles of whitewood and box. Guests at wooden weddings need never be at a loss to select gifts. Here were bread-trenchers of whitewood with "Give us this day our daily bread" in illuminated letters on the rim, and others, oval-shaped, ornamented in the beautiful Swiss carving with wreaths of wheat. The price ranges from $3 up to $20. Cheese platters were shown with porcelain landscapes inside the rim, and butter-dishes with Bohemian centres and covers. A breakfast-trencher was furnished with egg-cups and salt-stands. There were salad casters for oil and vinegar, with salad spoon and fork to match, napkin rings of Swiss carving, and cracker jars with frosted glass lining, sugar-scoops, and table-mats of wood of contrasting colors.

TIN WARE.

Further on we came to the "tin wedding" table. The first attraction for us was the Cinderella slippers of polished tin for the bride, and the jewelry worn on that occasion, a tin brooch and ear-rings with illuminated centre. The more useful articles are all kinds of pans and basins moulded from solid sheets of tin without seams; pie and bread pans with perforated bottoms to bake the lower crust thoroughly; an egg-whip of steel springs, light and effectual; a rack for holding fruit jars, useful in canning fruit; ice-cream moulds in pyramids, and in small figures for the saucer; fluted moulds for puddings, small enough for "pudding for two" or large enough for a dozen; pie-moulds that open with a hinge, leaving a fluted crust around the game-pie; japanned tin toilette sets; and, for the little folks, a table tray that fits to the side of the table and protects the cloth. A seasonable novelty is a pea and bean sheller. The peas are put into a hopper at the top, whence they pass through rubber rollers operated by a crank. The pods fall out in one direction, and the peas in another with great rapidity. A bread-kneader consists of a tin basin screwed to a table. Inside a wooden roller or stirrer is attached by which bread is made with great dispatch and without using the hands. Price $3. Vegetable scoops were shown us for shaping vegetables for soup, and a lemon-racer to scallop a bit of lemon for a glass of lemonade; a fluted knife for ornamenting potatoes before frying, and an ingenious knife for stringing beans. A ham-knife has a saw on one side; and a pair of nippers, invented by Soyer, disjoints the sinews of fowls.

Next we came to laundry utensils—polishing-irons, self-heating, with leather-bound handles, and quilling, fluting, and puffing irons. The best crimping and fluting machine has brass rollers, heated inside, and turned with a crank.

Another new idea to us was the excellent papier-maché basins and pails for kitchen use. These are very light, they do not corrode, and may be thrown about like wood without breaking.

MAJOLICA.

Traveled people who have seen the antique majolica porcelain abroad say that the Minton majolica imported here copies the original faithfully. One of the handsomest pieces of this ware in the country is a large vase for a conservatory. The blue-lined bowl is for gold-fish, with an inner row for flowers, and a fountain in the centre. Price $200. A fruit-service with leaf design attracts attention. It has mounted comports, grape-dishes, cake-platters, and a dozen plates. $50 is asked for these. A pair of cornucopia vases that match this set are of the fine Minton ware, valued at $75. A basket for bonbons is $18. Another fruit-service represents pine-apples; on a third different fruits are painted on each piece in the set. A dish for game-pie has an inner dish of coarse porcelain in which the pie is baked. The outside is a beautiful specimen of majolica, with a hunting-scene moulded on the cover. Price $18. Candlesticks of classic design were shown us, with brackets for boudoirs, and jardinières of gray bright colors, substantial enough to endure exposure to the weather on piazzas and in the garden. A hall clock mounted on a column had a medallion bass-relief of majolica representing sea-nymphs and dolphins.

GARDEN SEATS.

Fanciful garden seats of majolica were shown us. A comic affair is a little negro sitting down with the seat resting on his head. The half-bent position, the red, grinning lips, and the inquiring expression of the ebony face, were wonderfully natural.

In another department we were shown bronzed iron chairs, entirely impervious to the weather, and too stout to be easily blown over. A comfortable sofa for the garden or lawn has a wooden, springy seat with bronzed iron back, in a pattern of fern leaves. Price $37. Light folding-chairs, easily portable, with slight frames of painted iron and seats of finest cane, are sold at $8 the single chair. A lawn settee of French fancy has an adjustable back that faces either way like railroad seats. A canopy, folded or spread by a pulley, affords protection from the sun or a passing shower. Price $60. Rustic divans, chairs, vases, and hanging baskets are shown of coarse woods in their natural state, with stems of knotted vines and twisted branches. Pine burs are pasted on the smooth surfaces.

A circular stand of bronzed iron for flower-pots is of pyramidal shape. A garden table of carved wood, with a vase in the centre and a self-acting fountain, is marked $175. Jardinières of English glazed tiles are selected for choice flowers in the centre of a mound. On the white porcelain ground are blackberry wreaths or grapevines in natural colors. Price, singly, $20. A pretty edging for garden borders is made of earthenware in imitation of branches of coral. The bright red color affords a pleasant contrast to the monotonous rows of box with which flower-beds are surrounded.

PERSONAL.

THE young Cretan girl who fought so gallantly in the revolution, and had five hundred men under her command, is named ANTONOUSA KASTONOPOULOU. Miss K. is nineteen, rather pretty, smokes cigarettes, but can not read.

—MENOTTI GARIBALDI is about to marry a young lady of Padua, named ITALIA BEDESCHINI.

—"GEORGE ELION" (Mrs. LEWES), is greatly pleased with the brilliant success of the "Spanish Gipsy." She thinks it by far her best work, and says it cost more labor.

—MR. BURLINGAME and the MANDARINS are going to Auburn to have a private little visit with Mr. SEWARD; after which to Niagara, down the St. Lawrence to Montreal, thence to Boston, where a grand entertainment awaits them, and where, "far into the night, under the brilliant gas-lights, amidst the bounding of Champagne corks, they will behold how the descendants of the Puritans emulate and perpetuate the ascetic virtues of their forefathers." Mr. B. and the Manchus (who are not cannibal man-chewers) sail for Europe on the 18th inst.

—MR. LONGFELLOW, we feel quite authorized to say, is not the author of the following verse. That gentleman is now in England, and never associates with persons whose conversation is devoted to that noble animal, the horse:

If lovely maidens will display
Their charms so freely to beholders,
What wonder sporting men should say
They're winning by a neck and shoulders?

MR. LONGFELLOW has been invited, specially, by the Queen, to make her a little visit, and is the first poet or literary man from America who has been thus honored by royalty.

—Mlle. SCHNEIDER, the present reigning star in the comical musical firmament of Paris, who receives $500 a night for interpreting "La Grande Duchesse," is described as a fair, stout woman, with light brown luxuriant hair, shoulders as broad as those of a dragoon, a short neck, a waist that no one could clasp, except in a figurative sense, and wonderfully brilliant eyes, which last she uses to produce her greatest effects. Her costumes are something startling, the state robes in which she appears in the second act glittering with diamonds, and the gold-embroidered train, trimmed with ermine, requiring all the strength of the black pages to support.

—For the first time in the history of an American college the first prize was taken at the last commencement at Harvard by a colored youth, RICHARD THEODORE GREENER, of the junior class, the son of a poor woman in Boston, who fitted for college at Oberlin and Andover, and who is said to be a natural orator. His gestures were very graceful, his voice musical and flexible, and his whole bearing admirable.

—The Princess DE LA TOUR D'AUVERGNE has presented to the French Government the piece of ground on the Mount of Olives, which, according to tradition, is the very spot on which Christ pronounced the "Sermon on the Mount." The Princess reserves to herself the right of completing some religious edifices which will call to mind the Campo Santo at Padua.

—A writer in a Milan journal makes some curious statements about the Empress EUGENIE. He says that nothing can be more erroneous than the opinion generally entertained of the character of the Empress. He asserts that there is not a particle of sweetness in her temper. She is utterly heartless, exceedingly malicious, vindictive, and even cruel. All her hopes are based on her husband's death, when she will become Regente of France, in which event the first thing she would do would be to drive Prince NAPOLEON, PERSIGNY, and a host of other prominent Bonapartists, out of the country.

—The Owl, a weekly journal which has for its contributors some of the persons attached, in a confidential way, to the present Ministry, says that "it is the present intention of her Majesty to proceed, shortly after the prorogation of Parliament, to Switzerland. It is arranged that her Majesty shall stop at Paris on her way to Lucerne, in the neighborhood of which town a suitable residence has already been secured. The Queen will travel incognito, and will remain in the strictest privacy during her absence from England."

—The Chicagoans are making a bold attempt to capture the Rev. NEWMAN HALL. They have cablegrammed to him that if he will come to them he shall have a nice house, rent free, and a salary of $10,000 a year, gold. Dr. HALL married the daughter of the late Dr. GORDON, an eminent physician, whose life was written by his son-in-law. At the death of Dr. G., Dr. HALL received a fortune through his wife, rendering him independent. It is possible he may come among us, but not probable. At present the income of Surrey Chapel, where he now officiates, is $25,000, gold.

—Of Mr. BOGUMIL DAWSON, the eminent German tragedian, who performed in this city last year, an admirer says that he not only possesses a wonderful memory, but always learns by heart not only his own rôles, but the whole play to be performed, so that he has no need of the prompter's assistance; and there are few actors who can boast of so extensive a repertoire as his is; for in the course of twenty-five years he has performed upward of five hundred and fifty different rôles.

—A fresh "personal" of Mrs. SYDDONS, just imported: On being informed of the sudden death of a French minister who had died in his Bureau, she exclaimed, tragically, "In his bureau, say ye? How got he there?"

—MR. BATEMAN, who has transferred his French opera from the French Theatre to Niblo's, and is consequently enabled to give OFFENBACH's "Barbe-Bleue" with great effect, may read with profit the following effusion from the pen of a son of perfidious Albion:

"If Offenbach still pleases
More than fugues of Bach,
We shall not hear Bach often,
But often Offenbach."

—The death of Mr. JOSEPH MEEKS on the 23d ult., at Islip, has removed one of the very oldest natives of this city. He was ninety-seven years of age (ah! if he could but have touched pari) and had enjoyed the personal acquaintance of Washington, Lafayette, Pulaski, Steuben, Kosciusko, Rochambeau, Greene, Schuyler, Wagner, and many other officers of the patriot army. His mother, of Huguenot descent, spoke both French and English with equal fluency; and Mr. MEEKS related that while our French allies were encamped in his mother's orchard he had often seen her walking the piazza, supported on either side by Washington and Lafayette, and acting as interpreter between them. When the British evacuated this city, November 25, 1783, he, then a lad of twelve, was on the Battery, and assisted in pulling down the British flag. Mr. MEEKS was one of the founders of Tammany Hall. He began business in Broad Street nearly eighty years ago, and invested his profits from time to time in real estate on that street and its neighborhood. He thought no investment could be better than real estate in this city. At the age of sixty-five he retired from business, and at his death the annual income of his city property was more than the entire original cost.

—ABEL UNDERWOOD and ELECTA A. SANDFORD, two spiritualists of Akron, Ohio, took it into their heads, a few days since, to enter into the matrimonial relation, and this is the detail of the manœuvre: They married themselves, with a little aid of the Mayor, by repeating the following formula: "In the presence of our spirit and earth friends, I take ELECTA A. SANDFORD, whom I hold by the right hand, to be my lawful wife, hoping by kindness and affection to be to her a faithful and loving husband while in the earth form." The lady then repeated: "In the presence of our spirit and earth friends, I take ABEL UNDERWOOD, whom I hold by the right hand, to be my lawful husband, hoping by kindness and affection to be to him a loving and faithful wife while in the earth form." The Mayor then said: "Having pledged your marital vows in presence of these witnesses and of the world, I now, in the name and by the authority of the State of Ohio, pronounce you husband and wife." The Beacon says they would have no form of ceremony in which the word death occurred.

—The style of grief indulged in by the widow of a Chinese, who had left the "flowery land" to gain lucre in the auriferous region of California, will interest the (widow) readers of the Bazar. The writer says: "Among our twelve or fifteen Chinese passengers was a disconsolate widow who had resided in California for fifteen years, had accumulated about $20,000, and having lost her husband by death, was returning to China to abide for the future with her old friends and kinsmen. She was about forty years of age, good looking, when considered from a Chinese standpoint, and, being rich, would doubtless be considered a good catch by her countrymen. She had had the bones of her 'dear departed' polished after the Chinese style, boxed in a camphor-wood trunk, and was taking them with her to the Flowery Kingdom, in order that they might be deposited in the Joss House alongside those of his ancestors. Every day she would descend to the hold of the vessel where the remains were stowed and spend an hour or two with the skeleton, muttering a mixed sort of prayer, while tears streamed from her eyes. Her mummeries concluded, she would come upon deck, smoke her cigar, laugh and chat with her countrymen, as if she was the most light-hearted person in the world. One day, after she had terminated her hour's penance over the dry bones of her skeleton husband, I asked her why she said her prayers over him daily, and was not a little astonished to hear her reply: 'Me likee to fool Chinaman; he tinkee me likee husband bet much; then maybe bime-by me get another one. My husband in boxee belly good man, he belly dry and no smellee.'"

—The widow of King THEODORE, according to the letter of a British officer, is a lady-like woman of twenty-six, with very fair complexion, full eyes, fine aquiline nose, and beautiful hands. What most attracts attention, however, is her magnificent hair, arranged in neat plaits, and instead of being tied in a knot at the nape of the neck, as is the fashion of the country, it falls in a cascade of glossy ringlets over her shoulders. Her dress, on the occasion of the officer's visit, was the simple cotton dress of the country, gathered in a fold at the waist by a band.

—Governor SEYMOUR's wife is a daughter of the late JOHN R. BLEECKER, of Albany, and is greatly admired for her intelligence, loveliness of character, and elegant manners. They have no children. Of Mr. SEYMOUR's three sisters, one is married to LEDYARD SINCLAIR, of Cazenovia, another to Mr. SHONNARD, of Westchester County, and the third to Hon. ROSCOE CONKLIN, United States Senator from New York.

Netting Work.

The materials required in netting are a netting needle, meshes of different sizes, and yarn. Wind on the needle (Fig. 1) with which you intend working the thread or yarn suitable for the work. The needle is either of brass or steel. A needle of the size shown by Fig. 1 is suitable for cord, crochet cotton, or fine woolen yarn. For heavier yarn, as knitting-cotton, worsted, etc., the needle must be longer and heavier; for twine, thicker wool, etc., select a needle of bone or wood (which are also called netting needles). In this case the corresponding mesh must of course be so large that the needle can be easily pushed through the stitches. The size, that is, the circumference of the mesh, must correspond to the thread. In selecting a mesh it must be remembered that the holes of the net-work will be as large again as the circumference of the mesh. For example, a mesh half an inch in circumference gives a hole a quarter of an inch on one side of the square. The mesh must be smooth and of equal size throughout the length, so that the stitches shall be even and easily slipped off. The best meshes are round, and are made of horn, ivory, whalebone, or polished wood, or steel. For long, fringe-like stitches, or for fringe itself, flat meshes are required. Select the material according to the design of the work. The thread must be smooth and without knots, so that the stitches shall be smooth and even. An unequal thread makes the work difficult.

For beginning the work first wind the thread on the needle, which is done by winding through the split ends, but care must be taken not to wind on too much, as it would render it difficult to draw through the stitches. Make of strong thread a large loop, and fasten it to a heavy sewing cushion. To this loop tie the end of the working thread. Now take the mesh over which it is intended to work in the left hand, lay it between the thumb and forefinger, then lay the working thread over the mesh and over the inner side of the 2d, 3d, and 4th fingers of the left hand inward, run it up behind these fingers, and lay the thread to the left in such a manner that it can be held fast with the thumb. Fig. 2 shows the position of the mesh, as well as that of the working thread. Then run the thread in behind the 2d, 3d, 4th, and 5th fingers (see Fig. 2), push the needle (Fig. 3 b) through the loop on the fingers and behind the netting mesh through the loop on which the working thread is fastened (see Fig. 5, which shows how the stitches are worked around the loop), so that now a second loop is formed, which must be held by the little finger of the left hand. Now draw in the working thread by degrees, by which the loop held by the thumb becomes loosened, and draw the 2d, 3d, and 4th fingers out of the loop marked a in Fig. 4, still holding the loop marked b in the same figure upon the little finger. Finally, drop the loop b from the little finger, and fasten the knot by drawing the thread firmly. This completes one stitch. The remaining stitches which form the foundation are worked in the same manner. Fig. 5 shows a row of foundation stitches, which are knotted on the loop. Having worked the requisite number of foundation stitches draw the mesh out of the stitches. At the beginning of the next round turn the work, as netting is worked backward and forward, so that the last foundation stitch becomes now the first stitch of the following round. Make the knot as already described, putting the needle, however, through a foundation stitch instead of around the loop. Continue to work, turning the work, and without cutting the thread. In this manner is worked the diamond netting, so called because the meshes take this form (see Fig. 15). The knots for the plain netting, which consists of squares, are worked in the same manner. Figs. 6 and 7 show the plain netting. For a four-cornered foundation in diamond netting make a foundation corresponding to either the length or the breadth of the work, and work over all the stitches backward and forward till the foundation has reached the size desired. The foundation stitches are cut away afterward, as they will be somewhat longer than the other stitches, or the necessity for cutting away may be prevented by working the foundation over a somewhat finer mesh. The plain netting, whether it be intended for a square or quadrilateral, is to be begun on one corner with two foundation stitches; on these work in rounds, turning the work, and add a stitch at the end of every round by working always two stitches over the last (see Fig. 6). When the work has reached the requisite width, if a square is wanted, work one round without widening, and narrow one stitch in every following round. This is done by working together the last two stitches in every round, in doing which run the netting needle through the last two stitches of the round at the same time. Fig. 7 gives the last knot somewhat loosened, which plainly shows the manner of working. When only two stitches remain work these together by a knot without laying the thread over the mesh. If a quadrilateral is desired, work in the completed portion, after having finished widening, a section as long as the long side of the figure, in doing which widen at the end of one round and narrow at the end of the next. The widening and narrowing is done in the manner already described. Then narrow off the end precisely as when working a square. Rosettes or small circular foundations are worked in two ways. Either make a foundation, the number of stitches of which corresponds to that of the outer row (see Fig. 23), tie the foundation thread and work around till it has reached the requisite size (see Fig. 8), or begin the same with a foundation of six, seven, or eight stitches, and work in the round, always making two stitches in one. The widening is repeated in every round, and the two loops are always taken in the added (little) stitches of the former round, as is plainly shown by Fig. 9. Triangular pieces are thus formed, which are regularly divided from each other by means of the added stitches, and are widened one stitch in every round. Fig. 10 shows still another kind of diamond netting, the so-called rose netting, which forms a pretty pattern. It is worked over two meshes of different sizes. The one mesh must be one half larger than the other. The knots are worked in the usual manner. The design is formed by weaving together two stitches. As is shown by the pattern, draw the first of every two of the stitches worked over the larger mesh through the second stitch, and work a knot in the stitch drawn through.

Then with the point of the needle draw the thread of the second stitch out in the direction of the arrow, and work a knot in this stitch also. Fig. 10 shows one figure not yet finished; the others show the direction of the stitches. The round in which the stitches are woven together is always worked over the fine mesh. Work alternately also one round over the larger mesh, the next over the smaller. Fig. 17 shows the rose netting worked with fine thread. Figs. 2-10 are shown in coarse yarn in order to make them more distinct.

Fig. 15.—DIAMOND NETTING.

The fastening on of a new thread is done as shown by Figs. 11-14. These are the cross knots used in netting and knotted work. Fig. 11.—The simple cross knot. For tying this take the working thread about an inch and a half from the end between the thumb and forefinger of the left hand—this is the end marked a on Fig. 12. Then take the thread which is to be spliced on also between the thumb and forefinger of the left hand under the first thread, so that both ends of the threads cross, and wind the end a with the other thread marked b on Fig. 12; finally, draw the end a in the direction of the dotted line and of the arrow through the loop; take the ends of the threads between the thumb and forefinger of the right hand, and with the left hand draw closely the thread b. Fig. 11 shows this knot finished. Fig. 13 teaches the manner of tying the double cross knot. Fig. 14 shows another kind of cross knot. Both are tied similarly to the last, and may be done by reference to the illustration. In tying the knot, Fig. 13, it must be observed that the under end of the thread a is to be drawn.

Fig. 15 shows the diamond netting worked with fine yarn. Fig. 16 is also a kind of diamond netting; the design is formed by alternating two meshes of different sizes. The figure shows where the meshes must be changed. Fig. 17 is the rose netting already mentioned. Figs. 18-21 show different manners of working the netting. This is done, according to the design of the work and the texture of the foundation, with coarse or fine yarn, coarse thread, or other materials. There are different styles of working. The simplest is point de reprise (darning stitch), Fig. 18. Fill the holes (squares) of the netting with the yarn by taking a thread of the foundation on the needle, letting the next lie under the needle, and running the thread through in this manner. In the next (backward) row take on the needle those threads which before lay under it. Point de reprise must always be worked in the same direction. Large spaces worked in the same design should always be worked together, as the joining of a new section would render the work irregular. Fig. 19 shows the stitch, point d'esprit, which is especially used in netted guipure. This consists of button-hole stitch loops, which are worked around the netted squares in the manner shown by the pattern. Fig. 20 shows the point de toile, which is also much used in netted guipure. This is really a double point de reprise, being worked both ways in the same manner. Fig. 21 shows a foundation in rose netting, which is worked in point de reprise. This kind of pattern may be used for covers, curtains, etc. Fig. 22 may be used for the same purposes. For working, two meshes of different sizes are needed. Over the smaller mesh make a foundation of the requisite length, after which work one round over the same mesh. Now take the larger mesh and work over this alternately in the first seven stitches each a knot, then in the following stitch seven knots. In the next round, which is worked over the fine mesh, make in the seven single stitches taken together one knot, but one knot in each of the seven stitches which were taken from one stitch. After one plain round over the same mesh follows a round over the larger mesh, by which the design is continued as shown by the pattern.

Fig. 31.—NETTED EDGING.

Fig. 24.—This rosette may be worked with fine or coarse yarn. Several may be set together to form covers, etc. Begin the rosette in the centre by a foundation of twelve stitches. The rosette may be worked by reference to the pattern.

Fig. 35.—NETTED EDGING.

They are worked with fine and coarse yarn, which lends a very pretty effect to the work. They are all worked in diamond netting. For Fig. 25 make with fine yarn a foundation of the requisite size, and then work a round with coarse cotton and over a mesh of about an inch and a half in circumference, then again two rounds with fine yarn and over a fine mesh, in doing which, in the first of these two rounds, twist every stitch of the preceding round from left to right in the manner shown by the pattern before working the knot. Now draw a thread through the stitches of the last round, cut away the foundation stitches, loose with a needle the knots out of the stitches worked with coarse yarn, and work now on this side of the insertion also two rounds with fine yarn and over the fine mesh, twisting every stitch as before. After this crochet a border on each side, which shall consist of single crochet worked in the netted stitches of the last round. The insertion, Fig. 26, is worked similarly to that of Fig. 25, and may be done by reference to the pattern. By the aid of the illustration may also be worked Fig. 27, the middle rounds of which are formed by rose netting.

Fig. 16.—DIAMOND NETTING.

Figs. 28-30.—Three edgings in netting. These are worked similarly to the insertion. Take fine and coarse yarn. In Fig. 30 twist the stitches twice before tying the knots. On the upper edge fasten the netted stitches by a round of chain stitch, in doing which work in also the stitches of the netting.

Figs. 31-36.—Different edgings in netting. The edgings are worked in diamond netting. They are embroidered, as shown by the illustrations, in point de toile, point d'esprit, and point de reprise. The under edges of Figs. 31-33 are worked in button-hole stitch; on Fig. 34 the under edge is only wound with a thread. The design figures are worked backward and forward like a row of cross stitch. The edging, Fig. 35, is in imitation of real Valenciennes lace. It is worked in fine thread over a fine steel knitting-needle; the under edge is worked in scallops with fine thread, and just above this a row of coarser thread, in working which fasten together several threads of the netting, by which means the scallops are formed. These scallops are bordered with fine picots. For making fine netting of this sort take a long sewing or embroidery needle, as a netting needle would be too fine to push through the holes.

Fig. 36.—This lace is worked lengthwise. Take, instead of a needle, an embroidery needle, and work over a fine knitting-needle five foundation stitches. Then work * five rounds, widening by one stitch at the end of the 1st, 3d, and 5th rounds, then follow three plain rounds, and after this six rounds, in which work together as one stitch the two last stitches in the 1st, 3d, and 5th rounds. Repeat from * till the edging has reached the length desired. Work the edge with knitting-cotton in button-hole stitch, and work the figures shown in the illustration.

RAILROAD COURTESY.

TRAVELING is a test of genuine politeness; and at this season many are weighed in the balance and found wanting in this respect. Politeness has been well defined as "real kindness kindly expressed." But many persons seem to regard this as an accomplishment especially designed for parlors and drawing-rooms, and social circles, where they are individually known and recognized. They never think it worth their while to expose this choice jewel to the rude gaze of the public at large, on the highways and byways of life. So the Honorable Mr. Smith, and the beautiful and stylish Miss Jones, before commencing their summer tour, wrap their politeness very carefully in the softest cotton wool, and pack it away in their bureau-drawers, ready to be worn on their return from the White Mountains, or some more retired country retreat. Their identity will be swallowed up, they think, in the great traveling crowd, and they can behave as they please, and nobody be the wiser.

Yet, perhaps, there is no place where selfishness shows itself so disagreeably and so prominently as in the railroad cars. Travelers—or many of them—seem to fancy that having paid for one seat in the car entitles them to the occupation of as many as may can secure; to the exclusive right to the window, to the foot-board, to the rack, and to all other mutual conveniences, without the slightest regard to any body else. Courtesy in regard to seats is a rarity which attracts admiring attention. A lady goes from the boat to the cars in the middle of the night or in the early morning—she may be alone, or with her husband or daughter. She walks through car after car—every couplet of seats is occupied —an apparently sleeping masculine, with hat over his eyes, in one seat, and his feet or valise in the other. It is excessively awkward to wake up a man, and ask him to move his boots to give you a seat! And as to a lady sitting with her husband or traveling companion the idea never seems to occur to any one—it appears to be generally supposed that she would prefer sitting next to a stranger. Perhaps she would, sometimes; but it would be a compliment to the husband to suppose the contrary.

Fig. 32.—NETTED EDGING.

On the part of both men and women there is a lamentable want of these minor courtesies which at once mark the well-bred traveler, and contribute immensely to the comfort of a journey. If you occupy the window seat, you perhaps have the right—in railroad parlance—to keep it open or shut at your pleasure. But if, though protected yourself, you can see with half an eye that the cinders are flying into your neighbor's face, wouldn't you feel happier, on the whole, to remember the old-fashioned golden rule? And if the sun from your window is scorching somebody else's face, why not draw down your blind, even though you would a little rather see the prospect? There is no need to be familiar with strangers, nor to make miscellaneous traveling acquaintances. But a moderate exercise of benevolent feeling, in kindly words and deeds, would brighten the long, weary hours of railroad travel exceedingly.

There is a pretty story told of—but we must only tell the story, not the names. And if it happened in the comparatively slow-going horse-cars, instead of the steam-cars, it does not detract from the romance of it. And if it chanced to occur in January instead of in July, the recital will only be the more refreshing. A certain young gentleman was escorting home a beautiful lady, to whom he was quite devoted. The cars were pretty full, but she found room to spread her voluminous frounces, while the gentleman stood near. Presently a poor, but neatly-clad woman came in, who deposited a basket of clothes on the platform. She had an infant in her arms, and a weary-looking little girl clung to her dress. The above-mentioned lady might have condensed her frounces—for there was no vacant seat—but she did not, and even seemed annoyed at the proximity of the new-comer, who though thinly clad, was neat and clean. Presently a lovely young woman succeeded in making room for the stranger beside herself, drew the little girl into her lap, and covered her half-frozen little hands with her muff. Still the child shivered. The crowd was great in the cars, and perhaps nobody but the observant young gentleman and the wondering mother saw the young woman, as she quietly drew a small woollen shawl from beneath her cloak, and put it over the shoulders of the little one; and when the mother rose to leave the car, and would have removed the shawl, her eyes filled with tears, as the unknown donor gently whispered, "No, keep it for her." Unknown? Yes; but the young gentleman had his eyes wide open, and was making mental comparisons, not favorable to the lady under his special charge, and wondering what he should do, since he did not believe the fair unknown was in the habit of reading "Personals." But she rose to pass out, and he saw her bow to a mutual acquaintance. So he soon learned her name—and well, of course, they were married in due time—just as in a novel, though this is not a novel. And though young ladies generally may not have little shawls to give away in the cars, they do generally like to know what dispositions are attractive to young gentlemen.

A RIDE IN THE DARK.

By HARRIET PRESCOTT SPOFFORD.

JOHNNY M'TAVISH, as all the good gossips of Chatterton said, was going to the dogs, just as fast as he could find any mode of locomotion to the destined spot; and, true to their instincts, each and every one among them all did the utmost to speed him along. To listen to the accounts of his total depravity that they gave one another you would have supposed him to be a hoary reprobate grown old in crime, for the years of manhood would never have been enough to contain one-half his commissions and omissions; every thing short of murder and theft was laid at Johnny's door—and he was exactly twelve years old. Johnny took down these signs and put up those; he rung door-bells, and left false messages when caught in the act; once he stealthily marked all the doors of the wealthier citizens of the town with cabalistic symbols in red chalk, it was supposed, so that the community was thrown into a perfect panic with fear of burglars; a vigilance committee was organized, and a patrol of forty men paraded the streets from night till morning for several weeks; it was true that he had once been known, for a fact, to build an immense bonfire of tar-barrels in the open street; he had raised such an alarm of fire at another time that all the engines were in full career before the imposition was discovered; he had made mouths at the constable; had passed a night in the lock-up, and had whistled all night; and had even been heard to declare that the highest apex and goal of his ambition was to drive an engine. In truth, Johnny was the regularly organized bad boy. If he had not yet taken his diploma and degree in the school of vice, it was popularly understood in Chatterton that the event would soon take place, and meantime he was trying for high honors.

If Johnny M'Tavish's mother had not been weaker than Taunton water, as the saying was, she would have had him by this time apprenticed at some trade where he could have found opportunity to work off a portion of all this superfluous spirit, and some sort of scope for the rest; but it was her intention to make a gentleman of her son, though she had nothing in the world to do it with, and all Mrs. M'Tavish ever found herself capable of was sighing and wrinkling her smooth forehead, and wishing "her Johnny had less vinegar in him." Johnny would kiss her pretty pink face all over, from cap to chin, after these feeble remonstrances, make her no promises, and not be home that night till long after the nine-o'clock bells had bidden him and all good boys to bed.

Meanwhile what time, when truant from school, Johnny did not spend round the wharves, learning mellifluous foreign oaths from the sailors there, and wearing off the sick honors of his first old Virginia leaf, he spent round the tunnel that traversed the town, and out at the railroad-crossing, waylaying the trains that were all obliged by law to brake up there, and securing, with the half dozen tiny scamps of whom he was the ring-leader, delightful rides of a mile or more on the steps of the last car. He knew the whistle of every engine on either road; they all had a different note, which he recognized as easily as his own drivers would have done: this was the Endicott that rung such a bold note, like the trumpet of some mighty host; and this wheezy, phthisicky, fussy whistle came from the throat of the General; and this shrill, feminine, wicked screech belonged to the Satan. It was a queer fact to Johnny's active mind that, though they all had male names, they were always spoken of as shes; it caused him to study the economy of the engine to some purpose, but he never cleared up that mystery for all. Every evening he and his followers lined the railway when the great way-freight came tearing along, and pell-mell, helter-skelter, obeying his lead, they threw themselves on the long empty platform-cars, in the middle of the train, at the end, any where where one appeared, and knowing, better than they knew their lessons, that a misstep would cause them to be cut to pieces. One of the drivers of this line, who had a natural sympathy with Johnny's recklessness, had bidden the fireman pull him up on board several times, and had once given him a long midnight ride, wherein Johnny had watched his every movement as if his life depended on it, as indeed afterward it did, and had thanked him when they slowed and he jumped off, telling him that now perhaps he had stolen his trade. Johnny got back to Chatterton by boldly entering the passenger-train, and being infallibly put off at the next station for want of a ticket, until station by station he reached his home. But if he ever reached the pinnacle where that driver stood, and could control that fiery horse with his own hand, and be the despot of a train full of people, it seemed to him, building his air-castles, that he could ask no more.

Mrs. M'Tavish used mildly to expect that some time she should see the mangled Johnny's crumbs brought home on a shutter, and at one period she threw a glance into every wheel-barrow that went creaking by; but it took her only a little period to get used to any thing, and now she could see him walk round the eaves of the house on his head without a quiver.

One lowering and gray summer afternoon at tea-time Johnny made his appearance with unlooked-for punctuality, entered the house, and ate his bread and milk without kicking any thing over, made no motion to go out again, and finally went to bed. It surprised his mother so much that she could not sleep. Long after she sought her pillow her eyes seemed glued wide open; and at last, as she lay there turning from one side to the other, her wakeful ears caught sound of a rustle of the clothes on Johnny's little bed, a sliding, slipping, hurrying, hustling murmur, and then she saw a shadow stealing by, and sat straight up in bed. "Johnny! Johnny!" she cried. But never a word replied. "Johnny!" The front-door had closed softly as if behind a ghost. She ran and threw open a window; it was a dark, thick night—not one outline of any thing could she see—but two shoes pattering up the street as fast as one could fall behind the other told the whole story. He was up to some mischief, Mrs. M'Tavish said, with her fretful sigh, that was evident; but it was of no use for her to inquire into it now; by the time she could be dressed and out it would be over and done with probably, even if she knew where to go and find him as it was; and the comfortable soul adjusted her night-cap and went back to bed, only hoping that he was not going to set fire to a meeting-house, and shortly afterward was soundly sleeping the sleep of the just.

Meanwhile Johnny had no such nefarious designs. Set fire to a meeting-house, indeed! why, he never went near one when he could help it. He was only going to run away with an engine. And he wasn't going to steal the engine either; because, of course, that would be out of the question. Nor did he intend to do it any damage; he was just going to have a ride on her, and run her himself, he didn't know where, and he didn't much care; exactly as far as she would go, and they would find her when he was done with her. Collision, explosion, destruction of any sort, was not set down in his chart of the night, and he never gave it a thought.

"Perhaps we'll go to the end of the world and jump off," said Johnny to little Tim, one of the four confederates of the night, and a rather shrinking one.

On approaching the scene of immediate action, however, the engine-house was found to be locked and barred to a most dispiriting degree: the only entrance that could be made must be through a window-pane, and after a council of war it was Tim who was selected, on account of his appropriate size, to make the first breach; he must be lifted on the shoulders of the three conspirators in the darkness below to smash the pane, creep through, and raise the window for the others; for it was plain that it would need the united efforts of all four to wrench open the great doors; which last, after the engine-lantern had been found and lighted with Johnny's matches, was finally successfully effected.

"Now," said Johnny, "the first thing to do is to build the fire."

"That won't take long," said Fred.

"First your paper and shavings," said Johnny, suiting the action to the word; "and then your chips and charcoal. Here they are all ready, and here's the grate all dumped."

"He's an obliging fellow, that fireman—we'll take him on if he asks us. There's a roarer for you! have steam up in no time!" exclaimed little Tim.

"I guess I know. Don't you bother," turning on him sharply. "I'm captain here! I'm running this engine. A word out of your head and I'll put you off!"

"You keep still, Tim," exclaimed Will, making favor for himself at court.

"Why, I ain't doing nothing," whispered Tim.

"He's afraid," said the stout-hearted Lawrence. "Guess he'd better stay behind. Don't want cowards along of us."

"No, no, no," cried Tim in an agony, seeing all the whispered consultations and glorious secrets of the school-recesses vanishing into air. "I ain't afraid! I'm not a coward! Hope I may die! You just mind your own business, Lawrence, now!" as he grew desperate. "I'm going! I say I am!"

"Hold your noise," said Johnny, in his mysterious and commanding under-tone. "You want to bring the police in on us? Of course he's going. Where's the use? S'pose we'd leave him behind to set all the railroad on our track! Shut up and bundle in now!"

"Can't go south, can we?" said Lawrence.

"Just as well go north, then," answered Johnny. "We'll back her out for water, and the switch is all set for the main track, get on that end and put! Go the way she's headed now—ride twice as far as if we went south and were brought short up with a round turn in the city. Sha'n't we have a go? She's a tearer—is the Satan! Ain't I glad it's her?"

The roaring of the fire, the steam, and the sighing of the valves subdued the dialogue, the great black creature, the shadows on beams and rafters, the glow, and the obscurity gave the moment all it needed of mystery and wicked adventure. And as the chief of some banditti gives the heroic word, Johnny raised his hand and touched the rod, and—oh joy! oh fear! there was a snort, a pant, a puff, and the stately Satan glided slowly out of the engine-house.

For one second Johnny's heart sank into his very shoes; but with the next it bounded as high as the heavens—some visionary who found at last his waxen wings sustaining an airy flight could feel no more exultation; and he put up his hand like a king and brought her to a stop beneath the pump.

"How is it we get the water into her?" said Johnny then, after a moment's silence, in which his kingship had met with the first rebel. "I've seen them. But I'll be dashed," said the naughty Johnny, "if I can remember how."

"Guess she's got enough in her now," suggested Lawrence. "They stop for water in the last station, you know."

"So they do," answered Johnny. "And there's the gauge, if that's any sign—it says there's a plenty. So that's all right. Here we go, boys. One, two, three, now look out!" A long slide, a jerk, a jump half off the rails, and they were going indeed, past the long line of the work-shops and the freight-houses, out on the open country, cutting the air like a knife, a roaring wind themselves—for Johnny had let on all the steam at one blast, and suddenly sending it against the cup-valve, turned in triumph to the three as one prolonged, tremendous shriek stabbed the aching air, and the Satan gave voice as she rushed forward. The proper engineer turned in his sleep that night, and cried out to his wife that if ever he heard the Satan scream he heard her now; but while he spoke the thing was out of hearing and fleeting along. Along over the low, still meadows and the causeway between them, through the wide dark fields, over the span of an echoing gully, whistling again like a raging demon as they dashed across the turnpike; and then, obedient to Johnny's hand, gently slackening speed as they approached the long, hollow bridge that rang out their thunder behind them, and where they saw the head-light laying beams of light and darkness for her to travel on as they felt their way over. The exhilaration with which Johnny was filled was a sort of intoxication—to move this mighty mass of glowing machinery with a touch of his finger, to slip along at leisure, or to shoot as a blazing rocket does, to rule over all the road, to fly along shrieking and waking the way-side people from their heavy sleep, to dominate the great black night in this way! And then the half dread of discovery, the exciting fear lest the awakened road-master might be after them with the Endicott, or the General or the Demerara, each of which iron steeds had been left behind stabled in their stalls! "It's riproarious, boys!" cried Johnny; and after executing an Irish jig as well as circumstances and the narrow space allowed, the engineer walked round the engine-box on his hands, with his heels in the air, much to the detriment of little Tim's face, and wound up with another screech from the brazen throat of Satan. "I guess we're going pretty fast," said Johnny then—as if there could be any doubt about it. "I can hear the air sizz past us as loud as the engine."

Pretty fast indeed—those who, roused by the unwonted tread of this midnight special, sprung from their beds to look out upon the railway, said that it was no train, but a blazing arrow that shot by as if a flash of lightning sprung along the rails, and they trembled in a sudden superstition, and told one another there would be news of some horrible disaster in the morning after such an ominous appearance in the dead of the night.

Little did Johnny think of beholders, or dreamers, or ominous appearances, or disasters, as the Satan fled along—fled at a rate of speed that had never been asked of her before, jumped along the track, and seemed fairly to devour the space with her burning axles. Now they reached the tremendous trestle-work that strode across the valley of the Marravick River from hill to hill; every pound of steam was on, Johnny never lightened her, but ran down upon it full tilt, and plunged along like a thunder-bolt, while the enormous piles and pillars rocked beneath them. Far below the river rolled dimly its silent tide; the grave-yard on its bank lifted its white stones through the darkness; if Johnny knew any thing about the depth and danger underneath it only added to his wild enjoyment, inasmuch as he was triumphing over it. He stood with his feet wide apart, as he had seen the other drivers do; but could not fold his arms in their nonchalant manner, as he was obliged ingloriously to hold on that he might not lose his balance—for the rest of the boys were being tossed and jostled to a jelly as the Satan darted onward, trembling in every valve and joint, and leaping and springing as a panther does through the forest—and he gazed out unblenchingly at the lane of lustre that opened before them on the shining rails. Now they were on firm land, and two great oxen, relieved of their yoke, yet each following their yoke-fellow the night through, blundered across the way, after the stupid fashion of their kind; the cow-catcher tossed what was left of them upon one side before they knew any thing had happened, and the Satan bounded on. Now they cut through a lofty birch forest, every leaf of which gave them a hundred echoes, and left it out of sight; towns and farms and fields and hedges raced by; clouds of steam and smoke swept in volleys after them; and now all objects fled in one indistinguishable line of swiftness, till the children saw the darkling world go by them like some black comet's flight. Now the speed was a trifle less—they were going about the declivity of a mountain, and the wheels turned, one time in four, without clinging to the rail and getting forward; on one side here a precipice went down a hundred feet or more. Lawrence, looking out, and by the aid of the head-light, divined the peril, and shouted thereupon a shivering remonstrance in Johnny's ear. Johnny reviled him for a faint-heart, and made the engine jump; Lawrence summoned his braggadocio to the rescue, and kicked little Tim, who had curled himself into a heap and abandoned all thoughts of any thing but terror. And suddenly another sound from any made by the Satan seemed to burst and scatter all the air about them, and repeat itself in a prolonged and hollow roar as if Leviathan himself had lifted up his horn.

"What's that?" sung out Tim and all the rest in chorus.

"Good George!" said Johnny. "It's the Extra Freight! Sure as you're alive it's the Extra Freight to Chatterton! We're goners!"

"Slow her! Slow her, Johnny! Slow her, and we'll all jump off and leave her," they all cried together, while their teeth chattered in their heads.

"I guess so!" retorted Johnny, with a proud scorn. "Wait till I just whistle back first." And the Satan opened mouth in a shriek that echoed from side to side of the mountains and died away in the clouds, as if nothing less than Bellerophon's Chimæra had answered the challenge of Leviathan. And still they were tearing on. "Do you suppose," said Johnny, then turning on the three quaking mites behind him with severity—"do you suppose, you pack of little cowards, that I brought the Company's engine out here to smash her up and go safe myself? No! they shall have her as good as I found her, or they sha'n't have me! Do you suppose, besides, that I'm going to leave her on the track to throw the Extra Freight off the mountain and murder I don't know how many people?"

"What are you going to do?" queried Lawrence, then, doubling up his fists. "Do something quick, or I'll jump off!"

"You take care, or I'll pitch you off, you baby, and on the wrong side, too!" shouted Johnny.

They had passed the crest of the incline some time since, and were descending the opposite side, their momentum added to their steam. It was certainly high time that Johnny should do something. In a moment more, as they rounded the curve at this reckless rate, if they were not thrown off in doing it by very reason of the terrific rapidity, the great light of the Extra Freight would break blindingly full upon them; and then nothing but destruction—onecry, one pitiful pang, and shattered to dusty atoms.

Johnny knew it; he had been over the route once before. He did not tell them—but he shut off all the steam—they ought directly afterward, he imagined, to have been standing stock-still; and yet they were in motion, though but slightly so. The engine, too, was almost red-hot; his own place was absolutely scorching; he knew how low the water was now—any moment the whole thing might explode, and leave nothing but a thousand fiery sparks whirling down the mountain-side. Suddenly he faced about—there was an excuse to get the boys off, at any rate; they might reach the place, by running, before the engine did, and they might not. "There's a shunting here where they used to switch off the way-trains for the express," he cried. "You three stop your blubbering and spring off. It'll take the three of you to move the switch. I'll run on with the Satan. The minute her last wheel is over lock it back again for the Extra Freight. Look alive now—for I've shut off all the steam and she's going of herself!" Johnny had risen to the emergency.

But the three boys listened to him as if they had been stunned; he had to push and shove and swing them off, at last, or they would still have clung about him as being the stronger mind and the only safety. It was not dangerous to do, for the Satan only walked along now, though that walk was the walk of a Juggernaut.

It was little Tim who was the first to dart upon the switch and to pull upon it with all his weight, as nearly as estimated about as much as a feather's, and have it mind him no more than it would have minded a sparrow. The Satan belched out her thunder close upon him the moment he had touched it. He called in a frantic cry, though it was already too late, to Lawrence and Fred, who had contrived to scramble to his side, but had neither strength nor will nor courage enough to lift their hands, or do any thing with them after they were lifted. If they had it would have made no odds then, for before they had actually reached it the first wheel had gone over, and then the last; and though, in the ensuing spasm of fright at seeing the worst that could be happen, they all threw themselves at once upon the lever it was after the engine had passed the place, and the little fools failed to move it an inch when it was no matter whether they moved it or not.

Johnny must have known perfectly well that it would be so. It was a shunting disused this year or more, on account of its hazardous situation, and the switch was something too rusty to be stirred unless it were pried with picks. Perhaps just one shadow of ignorant hope that it might be done held him in suspense as he helped the boys off, the suspense of only a single second; for still slipping slowly and inevitably forward, with the roar of the advancing train, whose tread already shook the mountain, in his ears, he had left the children and the switch behind, and, gradually gathering velocity with every revolution of her wheels on the steep, descending grade, the Satan was crashing downward, round the curve, out in broad sight of the Extra Freight that was beating heavily and cruelly upward, like some panting, writhing dragon of old story, vomiting flame and bellowing and winding along in shining convolutions.

But Johnny folded his arms firmly. He had read about the sea-captains who never forsook the ship, and as for Satan, rather than desert her, he meant to die. He could not save her, but at least he would not survive her. All at once a last resort struck him, so that he almost staggered—to let on all the steam again, and then reverse the engine, and back her up the hill, and down the other side, and out upon the trestles, and the causeways, and the fields, till he could give her up in some station where the men were out with lanterns to meet the Extra Freight. The Satan would make ten miles to the Extra Freight's one. The thought flashed through his mind like a sunbeam, with an instantaneous sensation of relief and joy; he threw up his hand to execute the idea, and in the confusion and excitement of the moment—for Johnny was not altogether invincible—he touched the wrong rod. There was one bound, one dart, and then a withering, searing sheet of hot light that opened and blazed every where about him, the report of a thousand thunders; heaven and earth had met and crashed together, and then blank blackness, and nothing more.

The Satan was dust and ashes, and Johnny was nowhere.

When the people of the but slightly injured freight-train had exhausted themselves in vain search for some human remnant of the disaster, at last they came across a little heap of broken bones, clothed in scalded and torn flesh, one cluster of which was still grasping the extinguished engine-lantern. They lifted it tenderly, amidst much wonderment, and hurried with it to the nearest aid. It was a sight to make one shudder if it had given any sign of life. But the pain of the surgeon's efforts over this mangled object brought back a spark of vitality, and Johnny opened his eyes on the faces that were bent over him, and closing them again, caught sight, as he did so, of the engine-lantern, and would have started up on one elbow, had he had an elbow left to start upon. "I didn't steal it," said Johnny. "Indeed I didn't mean to steal the lantern. I only stole a ride."

"Never mind, never mind," murmured the surgeon, busy with his work, and not at all understanding the sighing sentence. "Nothing serious at all—patch you up as good as new." But Johnny, thinking then that it was the pretty pink face that he had left at home, above him, had fainted again; and he never knew what the comforting assurance meant till many weeks thereafter it had been fulfilled.

Upon the subsequent career of this young scape-grace the Directors of the Chatterton Railroad Company felt that they had a word to say, and they were in a sufficiently irate condition on the day succeeding the loss of the Satan to have run him through a gauntlet of raw hides so soon as his bones should be whole again, and they would for a time listen to nothing less than a youth passed in the Reform School, that there he might finish what neglect and the streets had begun. But the President of the Company had a soul, if the corporation had none. "The lad who can do so much can do more," said he. "His future must be adopted by us as a sort of redeemable pledge for the Satan. He shall be educated in the art he loves, at our expense, and when he is ready for work, we will find it for him in this great country, whose highways and byways, whose unbridged rivers to be crossed, and mountain-ranges to be tunneled, demand his courage, and coolness, and adventure. And when he is binding the Atlantic and Pacific together with his iron chain, he will have paid us for the Satan!" And the President actually did it. Mrs. M'Tavish cried, but made no further opposition to the adoption of Johnny by the Chatterton Railroad Company, and to-day there is not a more skillful or daring hand and brain employed in tying up the yawning chasms and fettering the mad torrents of the vast Rocky Mountain Valley than the hand and brain belonging to Johnny M'Tavish.

A SAD SONG.

In some covert by the sea
One day let me buried be;
On the long and lonely reaches
Of the white, wave-hardened beaches,
Where the sun burns, fixed as fate,
Shores unshadowed, desolate,
Let my corpse unserved lie
In that august company—
Rock severe and stainless sky.

Press the earth well on my brow,
Lest it throb and swell as now;
Hide my visage from the sun,
Glad life-toil and heat are done.
Leave me then for Death to soothe,
Leave the tide my grave to smooth;
Prayer and song for me are done,
Leave the spot to winds and sun.

I, in traverse of my lot,
Seek my kin but find them not;
Alien somehow from my race,
Find no friend nor resting-place;
Some dark mixture of my blood,
Fatal warp of eye and mood,
Subtly holds from me apart
Tenderest grace of eye and heart.

Give me leave to lay aside
Heart of grief and brow of pride;
Love—the dole of charity;
Trust—that leaves hearts free to fly.
These for death's sincerity
I shall change with great content,
With the cliffs my monument,
And my locked and icy dream
Stirred not by the sea-bird's scream.

PARIS CORRESPONDENCE.

THE Emperor went to the camp of Chalons last week, and is to go from there to Plombières. The camp at Chalons is at this moment occupied by twenty-two thousand men, whose barracks extend over a length of five miles.

The Emperor's tent is opposite the camp, on a little eminence. It is built of bricks, painted to imitate canvas, and contains nothing but a cabinet and bedchamber for the Emperor, and a cabinet for the aids-de-camp, all very simply furnished. A large mahogany bureau, cane chairs, and maps and charts hanging on the walls, are the sole furniture of the Imperial cabinet. The bedchamber, which is very simple, contains an iron bedstead with Persian hangings, a mahogany table, and two chairs.

In front of this tent stretch flower-beds in bloom, and a broad velvety lawn. A small building serves as a drawing-room, and another as a dining-room. The table-service alone reveals the luxury of the sovereign. It is as splendid as at the Tuileries. The Emperor never takes his meals alone. In the morning he has his aids-de-camp to breakfast, and at evening the general officers or some of the authorities of the country to dinner.

During the late sojourn of the Emperor admirable military evolutions were executed for his benefit. On the night before his departure a retreat by torch-light took place. During the day he had witnessed a review, terminated by a magnificent evolution, styled the mouvement de front. The cavalry, numbering eight thousand men, were drawn up in two lines at the foot of the little hill which was crowned by the Emperor's tent. At the command of the General-in-Chief, M. de Failly, they started up the hill at full gallop, seeming as if they must swallow up every thing under their steps. The horses' hoofs shook the earth as they sped along with the velocity of lightning. Suddenly, at six paces from the Emperor, this whirlwind stopped short, eight thousand sabres flashed in the sun, and eight thousand voices rung out the cry, "Long live the Emperor!"

The Emperor has very fine farms in the neighborhood of Chalons. The camp farm is excessively productive on account of the presence of the horses of the camp, by means of which the land is cheaply fertilized. The model farm cost seven hundred thousand francs in the first instance. It now brings in fifty thousand francs a year.

The Duchess de Morny, lately married a second time to the Duke de Sesto, has returned from her wedding tour, and is now living in the Champs Elysées at the corner of the Rue de Cirque. We saw her the other day returning from a promenade with her four charming children. She was dressed in a pearl-gray short costume, with a small paletot of black dead lustre gros grain, bordered with a lace ruche. Her black lace bonnet was extremely small, and was trimmed with wild grasses and flowers. The Duchess de Sesto wishes to change her name to that of Albuquerque, which also belongs to the Sesto family, and is much more illustrious. She and her husband set out this week for their villa of Deauville, where the Duchess is the queen of the elegant society that flocks to Deauville and Trouville.

Every thing is prepared for the speedy departure of the Emperor for Plombières. Nevertheless it is not known as yet what pavilion he will occupy this year. He usually leads a very retired life at the watering-places, and prefers a simple dwelling to the large hotels.

There have been no grand receptions at Fontainebleau, but only a few invitations addressed to intimate friends. Among this list we will mention the Prince and Princess de Metternich, who passed three days with the Emperor and Empress before their departure for Jannisberg, one of the most celebrated vine districts on the banks of the Rhine. The Emperor and Empress walked about a great deal with their noble guests. The Emperor took them to see the large abatises which he had caused to be erected on the side of Thomey, to increase the alleys and vistas of the park. He superintends all these works himself, and takes special interest in searching for springs. During the last part of their stay the Imperial party went to the banks of the Seine, about two miles distant from Fontainebleau, and amused themselves by crossing the river on a ferry-boat to a large meadow situated on the other side, where they picnicked. The Empress wore a dress composed of an underskirt of blue foulard, with a tunic of white striped sultan trimmed with white silk fringe. Her toque was of rice straw bound with blue velvet and trimmed with blue curled feathers, which almost covered the hat, and long ends of blue velvet floating behind. She carried a very large parasol of batiste écarlate, lined with blue silk. The Princess de Metternich wore a white and buttercup striped skirt, with a tunic à corsage of Chambery gauze without sleeves, and a chemisette and sleeves like the under-skirt—that is to say, white and buttercup striped. Her St. Mégrin toque, somewhat high in front, had an aigrette and bunch of mixed yellow and black feathers. The Princess de Metternich seems partial to yellow, perhaps through patriotism.

The pleasures in which the Court most delight are of a domestic character. A charming and eloquent writer, M. Octave Feuillet, who is the librarian of the palace of Fontainebleau, gives readings there from time to time. He lately won a great success by reading fragments of a romance which he is at this moment composing, and which is again devoted to that theory to which he is so partial—namely, that "it is the fault of husbands that there are ever any thing but happy households." Mr. Octave Feuillet is one of the youngest members of the French Academy. His subtle and refined genius is particularly pleasing to women, and he is a great favorite in the drawing-rooms of Paris. He lives there, however, only occasionally; he usually resides at Saint Lo, a little town on the shores of the Channel. He has married the Maire's daughter, and prefers this abode to any other. This retired life is quite exceptional among our literary men, and surprising on the part of a person so familiar with the language of drawing-rooms, and on whom nature has lavished every gift, even that of external beauty.

Two illustrious members of the French Academy are on the point of dropping off. The Count de Montalembert and Lamartine are so ill as to inspire their friends with great anxiety. Lamartine, who has attained the height of fame, has just received a token of homage which has greatly touched him. The King of Saxony has sent him a volume of his translation of Dante, with this dedication:

"FROM A PETTY TRANSLATOR TO A GREAT POET."

It is perhaps the last flower that will be thrown at his feet.

A very interesting reading took place a few evenings ago at the house of Madame Victor Hugo, who is still living at Paris. Charles Hugo read a few chapters of his new book, "Les Etapes de l'Exile." The book is not devoted, as might be believed, to the story of the misfortunes of illustrious exiles: it is much more interesting, and endeavors, on the contrary, to make known to the reader the sufferings reserved for obscure exiles. The biographical article devoted to M. Bérut, now secretary of the Indépendance Belge, especially moved the audience. The young author succeeded in vividly portraying the energy and perseverance that were needed for a man of courage and talent to rise from the misery into which he had been plunged by exile to an honorable and tolerably remunerative position.

ELIANE DE MARSY.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

COBB'S ISLAND, about ten miles from the Eastern Shore of Virginia, has recently become a popular watering-place for Southerners. Indeed, for years past, its fishing and hunting have attracted many from the North. The buildings are commodious, surf-bathing fine, and sailing pleasant. The table is supplied with every kind of game and fish, and shark-fishing is attractive to those who are fond of exciting sport. At least such is the current report.

The history of Cobb's Island is remarkable. Within the last thirty years it has grown in an extraordinary manner. In the year 1840 an old fisherman from Cape Cod bought the island for $100 in money and $25 worth of Cape Cod salt. Last summer the son of this same fisherman was offered $500,000 for the island, and declined it. When it was bought it was scarcely large enough to hold the fisherman's hut with his seines. It is now eight miles long, with a beautiful beach seven miles in length. Within the last year one hundred yards of solid sand have, by the generous gift of nature, been added to the dominion of this wonderful island.

One of the present peculiarities of Newport is the universal pénchant for driving ponies about the size of a Newfoundland dog. "Wicker basket" couples, set low on four tiny wheels, adapted to the size and strength of the ponies, are extensively used. Of course the ponies are beautiful; and so are the ladies who are so often the drivers.

The lectures of M. Edouard Laboulaye, at the College de France, are regularly attended not only by the students but by hundreds of cultivated ladies and gentlemen. In his constant digressions upon political ground he brings into full play his wonderful powers of irony and satire. He has an inimitable, dry way of saying sharp and humorous things, which keeps his hearers in a state of pleasant excitement. Yet amidst roars of laughter and shouts of applause he always maintains a grave countenance, looking as though he could not understand why such demonstrations should be made. M. Laboulaye has also a pleasing voice, great fluency and beauty of expression, and readily retains the attention of his hearers from his first to his last word. His lectures are a rare intellectual feast.

A lady in Salem, Massachusetts, performed quite a feat the other day. A runaway horse was dashing through the street at a furious rate, when the lady rushed in front of him with her sun-umbrella spread, and flourished it toward the animal. The horse sank down upon his haunches, and was kept there by the lady until the driver came up. Then the lady walked quietly away, as though nothing unusual had happened.

It is announced that medical men in Cuba pronounce pine-apples of this year's growth as dangerous to health, and give their positive opinion against the propriety of eating them.

A touching incident is related of a poor Vermont widow, in connection with the floral tributes which were in May placed on the graves of Union soldiers throughout the country. Near her home was a little cemetery containing the remains of forty Union soldiers, including those of her own son. Assisted only by her children she wove wreaths of flowers, and laid one on each grave.

The wife of the noted Indian chief, Hole-in-the-Day—or rather his last wife (for he had many) and now his widow—is a white woman, whom he married a year or two ago on a trip to Washington.

Lake Mahopac has its advantages. A lady there is not obliged to appear in as many dresses as there are hours in the day. She may, if she chooses, take her dinner in her morning dress, and still retain her position in the "best society." When the demands of fashion be relaxed if not in July and August at a country watering-place?

It is said that gold-fish may be kept ten or twelve years in globes, or other vessels, by following a few rules: 1. Allow not more than one fish to a quart of water. 2. Use the same kind of water, whether spring or river water, and change it daily in summer; every other day in winter. 3. Use deep rather than shallow vessels, with small pebbles at the bottom (to be kept clean), and keep them in the shade, and in a cool part of the room. 4. Use a small net rather than the hand while changing the water. 5. Feed the fishes with cracker, yolk of egg, lettuce, flies, etc., rather than with bread, and then only every third or fourth day, and but little at a time. 6. Do not feed them at all from November to the end of February, and but little during the three following months.

In Europe the deaf-mutes are now taught to speak. Dr. Hirsch, of Rotterdam, is the originator of the new system, which is in practical operation in Brussels, Ghent, and Antwerp. Also there is a school on this system for Jewish mutes in London. The process is at first slow and discouraging. Signs are cast aside, and the child is taught to read words by the motion of the lips. Slowly, at first, he acquires this singular power, but soon catches readily the names of strangers and even foreign names. Then he is himself taught to articulate. The teacher takes the children's hands and accentuates the words by raising or letting them fall. He feels their throats and makes them feel his, that they may understand articulation. After a little they make their first sound, and from that time progress is rapid.

The sphere of woman in Paraguay seems to have widened to a most unenviable extent. According to the London Times a strange phenomenon is now being exhibited on the banks of the Paraguay River—namely, that of four thousand female combatants actually in the field. The Brazilian journals declare that General Lopez is scandalizing the civilized world by thus forcing women into the service; but the women have already shared the hardships and the dangers of the campaign—digging trenches, lading and unloading vessels, and doing duty as couriers and messengers—to such an extent that their coming forward in second line on the field at the present moment, and bearing their own share of the brunt of battle, may seem scarcely an aggravation of their lot.

The double bronze doors for the Capitol at Washington, which have been in the hands of the Ames Company at Chicopee for the past three years, are nearly completed. Early in the autumn they will be in their destined place. On one side the panels represent "Peace," the "Ovation to Washington at Trenton," the "Inauguration of Washington," and the "Masonic ceremony of laying the corner-stone of the Capitol, September 18, 1793." On the other side the panels represent "War," the "Charge at Yorktown," the "Rebuke of Lee by Washington at Monmouth," and the "Death of Warren at Bunker Hill." Crawford is the artist, and his designs have been executed with great skill. Each of the doors weighs 4000 pounds; yet they will swing with comparative ease, as has been proved by trial.

"At a house in Paris where I have staid," says an English writer, "the café-au-lait was prepared in the following manner: About a table-spoonful of a strong black liquid was poured into each cup, and the cup then filled with boiled milk. I was told that this very rich essence of coffee was made by putting a large quantity of coffee into a common French cafetière (which had previously been thoroughly heated with boiling water), and slowly pouring over it a small quantity of boiling water; the cafetière to be kept close to the fire, where its contents could be as hot as possible without boiling. When the water had drained through, the essence of coffee thus procured was poured off into a jug and put away for use. As to the exact proportions of coffee and water I was not enlightened, but any one could find out by two or three experiments. It must have been very strong, as a jug holding about half a pint lasted a family of seven persons nearly a week. It was always used cold, and was excellent."

Mouchoir, or Glove Case.

HITHERTO we have given netted guipure patterns only in white yarn or thread. The present illustrations are designed for making this favorite and fashionable work with colored silks, by which a very beautiful effect is obtained. Fig. 1 shows a mouchoir case of light gray silk, covered with netted guipure. The design is a spray of daisies, worked in point de reprise and bordered with a Grecian pattern mixed with flowers. The daisies are of the natural colors; the flowers in white silk with yellow cups, the stems and leaves in different shades of green silk. The Grecian pattern of the border is worked with green silk in point de toile, and the flowers in the same manner as the daisies. The foundation is of black silk, as is also the work in point d'esprit. It numbers thirty-nine holes in the square, and is worked over a mesh half an inch in circumference. The foundation, when finished, must be stretched in a frame of copper or brass wire, or a wooden frame, as shown by Fig. 2. In the pattern the frame is eight inches square. The wire is half an inch in circumference. The guipure wrought in a frame of this sort is prettier and more regular, and the work is not liable to be drawn together. Fig. 3 gives the twig, and Fig. 4 a part of the border in full size. Fig. 5 gives a section of another border, which may be used instead of that given by Fig. 4. The completed square is laid on a piece of silk of the requisite size, and which has previously been lined with a thin layer of wadding covered with lining outside and quilted in small diamonds. The edge is finished with narrow black guipure lace. A second similarly-prepared piece forms the under part of the case, but this is not trimmed. Join the two parts by means of a binding of gray ribbon, and set bows on the side as shown by the illustration.

Gourd Work-Box.

MATERIALS: A round yellow gourd five inches in diameter, brown silk, heavy brown silk cord, transparent brown beads, golden-yellow silk twist, fine golden-yellow silk cord and ribbon an inch in width, nine round brown glass buttons, cotton batting.

Choose a gourd fully ripe, and hang it up to dry for several weeks, then cut it into two equal pieces, and scoop out the inside, after which bind each piece of the shell with brown silk ribbon half an inch in width; cover the outside of this binding with yellow ribbon folded together in the manner shown by Fig. 2, then cover this with brown beads as shown by the same illustration, in doing which always run the yellow working thread through the gourd shell. On the part of the shell which is designed for the bottom of the box fasten eight round buttons an inch and a half from the centre and an inch apart. Run the eyes through the shell, pass a cord through the eyes on the inside of the shell, and tie the ends together. Each piece is lined with a layer of pasteboard covered with brown silk. The pasteboard interlining consists of a strip of pasteboard three inches and a half wide, the length of which must correspond to the circumference of each edge, while on one side seven wedge-shaped pieces must be cut out at regular intervals, the ends are then sloped, and the points joined, thus giving the pasteboard the form of the inside of the gourd. Having arranged this, cover the pasteboard with brown silk, which is arranged in the same manner. The silk lining for the under part of the work-box must lap over the edge of the pasteboard about an inch on the other side, as the pasteboard lining extends half an inch beyond the edge of the gourd. Along the upper edge inside work two rows in button-hole stitch of yellow silk, which rows must be about half an inch apart, and worked in opposite directions; between these two rows work a row in herring-bone stitch. The seams which join the points of the silk lining are also ornamented with herring-bone stitch. Put a thin layer of cotton batting on the bottom of the work-box, cover this with silk, and ornament the edge with cord wound with bead cord. Besides this arrange two inches from the edge a piece of pasteboard covered with silk, with a double band of silk sewed along the middle. This band is half an inch wide; the outer edge is ornamented in button-hole stitch, and between these is a row in herring-bone stitch of yellow silk. This is so arranged that the larger and smaller divisions serve for the reception of scissors, thimble, etc. Ornament the seam where this is set on with cord wound with bead cord. Varnish the outside with brown varnish, and ornament with a bead trimming made as shown by Fig. 3, which represents it of the full size. In the centre of the upper half of the box finish by a glass bead ring which encircles a glass button that serves as the handle of the lid. On the opposite sides of each half set two bead loops, through which are drawn two heavy brown silk cords for the handle of the box. Plait the upper part of the cord in the manner shown in the illustration.

Four Embroidery Designs in Point Russe.

See illustration on page 665.

THE accompanying designs represent four of Kaulbach's well-known illustrations of Goethe's "Reynard the Fox," and are well adapted for letter-holders, cigar-cases, etc.

Fig. 1.—Bruin, the Bear, appears before Reynard the Fox's fortress Malepartus to accuse evil-doers before the king.

Fig. 2.—Reynard threatens the life of his innocent scholar.

Fig. 3.—Reynard confesses his sins to his companion Grimbart.

Fig. 4.—Reynard attacks the rabbit that has led him past the castle of the Fox.

Reclining Chair.

See illustration on page 665.

THE cover of this reclining chair is made of alternate strips of embroidered cloth and plush. The accompanying illustration gives the pattern for the embroidery, which is worked in cross-stitch. The colors to be used are designated on the pattern. Reps or brocatelle may be used instead if preferred. The edge is trimmed with a broad worsted fringe, as shown by the illustration. The cushion is made of the same material, and is trimmed with cord and tassels.

MODERN FASHIONS.

THE Victoria Magazine, while deploring the uncertain tenure of fashions, says, very sensibly, of those now in vogue: "If we are far from deprecating change within just limits, far from us also be the injustice of stigmatizing all that comes before us with the sanction of fashion. At the precise moment at which we write there is perhaps less to carp at in the make and shape of the garments in vogue than has been often seen to be the case. The waist is at its natural level; the moderately tight sleeve is harmless, if not especially graceful; the crinoline, when worn at all, is of modest size; the short skirt for the sans gêne of morning toilette, and the sweeping train for occasions of ceremony, the protection afforded to the feet by boots of strong kid—all make it possible for a woman to exercise both taste and sense without putting herself at war with the social tyrant. It is true that in our time the bonnet has been suppressed, but we have no thought of setting up for it a laudatory epitaph. In the days of its utmost glory the bonnet was a pasteboard machine at once useless, dangerous, and ugly. Like the hood of a carriage, the wind found its way under it, and could not come out again. It was the home of draughts, the nursing mother of face-ache, and answered no purpose that would not have been more consistently performed by an umbrella. Such was the bonnet as understood by our mothers in their youth, and we can hardly help believing that some lost secret of witchery must have been theirs to have enabled them to make their way under such a load of difficulty. Now the bow of ribbon with a veil attached, the few square inches of lace and spangles, which do duty in the place of this exploded poke (and which really ought to be rebaptized with a name of their own), can with a little modification, and the addition of strings, be made to suit all ages and to answer every desirable purpose. There is really nothing to be said against its arrangement on the score of lightness, adaptability, or convenience; and we have observed that such objections as have been raised have a moral rather than a practical or aethestical basis. To this we can only reply that within our knowledge there is no law, either human or divine, which obliges a woman to wear a bonnet."

ARTIFICIAL TEETH.

IN teeth-economy the principle should be established of keeping a tooth as long as it is useful, but no longer. When a tooth has ceased to be good for mastication, or for ornament, the sooner it is removed the better. When removed, an artificial tooth should be established in its place. The time has gone by for natural-artificial teeth to have preference; and the consideration of this fact should do away with the hesitation that some people have for using false teeth. Sentiment is a very powerful influence in this world; and the sentiment against fixing the teeth of dead human beings in the mouths of living ones is undoubtedly potent. There is now no need for doing this, so many excellent materials of non-human origin standing in aid. Taken all in all, artificial teeth of hard enamel are chiefly to be recommended, and those of American manufacture are the very best known. The particular sort of teeth, however, will depend a good deal on the shape of the palate and the number to be set in a block. Excellent sets are made of hippopotamus ivory; that of the elephant is too soft, and stains too rapidly, to be of any great use to the dentist. As a matter of sentiment, the advantages of enamel or porcelain teeth, as we may call them, need no expatiation. Being wholly non-absorbent, they never stain or otherwise change color. This leads up to an observation and a precept; one that wearers of this sort of artificial teeth should more frequently remember than they do. It is this—natural teeth are never white. Except sometimes in early childhood they have not the faintest claim to whiteness. A miniature-painter, or others having a discriminating eye for color, would not fail to discover in by far the majority of natural teeth those mingled tints of green, blue, yellow, etc., that, taken together, go to make up a general result of grayness of some preponderating shade. If this be so of natural teeth naturally, by how much more will the tint of teeth be varied from white by the thousand contingencies of colored food and drink, of physis, and perhaps of smoking?

A common failing with middle-aged and elderly, nay too often young, people is, that they choose artificial teeth of the most brilliant whiteness they can find. Nothing can be more absurd. To commit this error is to reveal to any apprehension of ordinary acuteness the secret of false teeth. Another common error is that of having artificial teeth more regular and more block-like than is ever seen in nature. If the most regular set of naturally-grown teeth be examined as to absolute mechanical evenness, they will be found deficient in this quality, and still that very defect will conduce to the general result of beauty. The fact is certain, though the foundation of it lies too deep for easy revelation—maybe for any—that some degree of irregularity of feature is needed to awaken in an appreciative mind the highest sentiment of beauty. Few of us but can remember to have seen faces so wholly regular, so feature by feature unexceptionable, that the result fell tame and unimpressive on the eye. As regards the teeth, it will generally be found that the most pleasing expression, male and female—nay, the highest types of male and female feature-beauty—is correlated with some sort of irregularity in the teeth. In one the precise irregularity is, perhaps, that a tooth slightly overlaps; in another, the front teeth are slightly parted, it may be. Of whatever sort the natural peculiarity may have been, the dentist should be allowed to follow it in his copy. Here, too, in a general way, the remark may be made, that if by any chance a set of teeth gives admiration for its pure white tint and general evenness of run, when seen on a table or under a case, that set will not be satisfactory when placed to do duty, for beauty and utility, in the mouth. Persons who foolishly select artificial teeth of greater whiteness than is ever seen in nature will perhaps be surprised to learn at what cost of trouble and ingenuity varying tints are imparted by the manufacturer of artificial teeth to naturally white materials. Yellow tints are given by titanium; blue by platinum; bright blue by cobalt; bluish yellow by titanium and platinum mingled. If the very whitest natural tooth be carefully examined, three distinct shades of tint at least will be noticed upon it. First there is the tint belonging to the general body of the tooth; then that of the crown, or bearing-edge, or surface; lastly, of the part running into the gum. All these three tints must be imitated and indicated by the true dental artist. Occasionally entire blocks—several teeth, gums, and all—are made in one piece of this porcelain or enamel material. In this case, besides the three tints appertaining to the teeth proper, the roseate aspect of the gum must be represented. To accomplish this, the coloring matter used is gold; to which also are due the lovely red tints we admire in certain pieces of Bohemian glass; but these block-teeth can not, on the whole, be recommended.

CHAPTER IV.

A METROPOLIS IN MINIATURE.

DETMOLD, the capital of the principality of Lippe-Detmold, is one of the pleasantest, prettiest, and most agreeably situated of the smaller Residenzen of Germany. The castle, or princely palace, is a fine old building, situated in the midst of well-arranged gardens, and around these the little town spreads itself in all directions. The streets are wide and clean and quiet. Beside the river Wern, which runs through Detmold, and is here banked in so as to form a canal, there are pleasant paths and picturesque houses, draped with the rich Virginia creeper, sombre ivy, or delicate woodbine. Further there are delicious woodland walks branching out hither and thither through the great forest which clothes the Grotenberg, upon whose lofty summit the colossal Hermann's statue is one day to stand.

But not of these romantic shades or river margins was Herr Friedrich Peters thinking when the old Schimmel paused soberly before the door of the chief inn in Detmold, and then allowed the hostler to lead him with much deliberation into the stable-yard. Herr Peters had his share of the German love for nature and appreciation of natural beauty; but it was the metropolitan aspect of Detmold which most attracted him. In his eyes the wide, clean streets, the well-dressed ladies who demurely paced them, the shops with windows filled with large squares of clear glass, revealing garments and stuffs of last year's fashion, were absolutely magnificent. He could have almost envied the chemist from whom he intended to buy a modest supply of drugs, when he contemplated the crimson, and blue, and yellow bottles in his shop-window, the little semicircular counter topped with marble, and the half dozen colored scent-bottles arranged symmetrically within a glass-case. It was very grand, certainly, and very different from the dark little shop at Horn.

Peters made his purchases, and ordered them to be sent to the inn, and then he walked down the principal street, glancing at the inscriptions over the shop-doors, until he paused before a stationer's window and looked in with a hesitating air. There were two persons in the shop, an old man and a young one. The old man was making entries in a ledger or account-book; the young man was piling reams of coarse packing-paper on to a high shelf. He had taken his coat off, the better to perform his work, and his shirt-collar was turned down, showing a round, muscular throat. His movements were quick and dextrous, and he lifted and placed the heavy packets of paper with the ease of one whose strength was but slightly tasked. Peters stood staring in at the window until the old man, lifting his head, observed him, and then the apothecary walked away slowly. Presently he returned on the opposite side of the street, and this time, on looking in, he perceived that the stationer's shop was tenanted but by one person. The old man had disappeared. The younger one was still working, but had nearly filled the high shelf. Peters crossed the road briskly and went in. "Good-day, Otto," said he. At the sound of the high, thin voice, the young fellow turned round sharply, almost letting fall the packet he held in his hands, and uttered a joyful exclamation. A brighter, franker face than he turned on the apothecary it would not be easy to find. Otto Hemmerich is a great favorite of mine, and I desire to make my reader also feel kindly toward him. Sure I am that if the portrait be not a pleasant one the fault will be wholly the painter's.

A well-balanced, somewhat square head, broadly developed in the regions of conscientiousness and firmness; thick, curling, brown hair, that lay in close rings on his forehead; bright, keen blue eyes, which might have been almost fierce but for the merry laughing spirit that danced in them; well-shaped, though not strictly regular, features; strong, white, wholesome teeth: a skin tanned to a dusky red by sun and weather; a powerful, well-knit figure, rather beneath the middle height; and in his voice and in his gestures, in all he said and all he did, a sense of youth, and health, and vigor, an atmosphere of clearness and honesty, which refreshed one's moral nature much as fresh air refreshes one's body.

"My good Herr Peters!" he exclaimed in a loud, ringing tone. It seemed impossible to imagine Otto ever whispering, or even talking low.

"Hem!" cried the apothecary, with an elaborate cough. "Don't shout so, Otto. I'm not sure that my visit would be quite agreeable to your master."

In Detmold it is still possible to speak to a man about his "master" without offending him. "What, Herr Schmitt? Well, but you didn't come to see him?"

"No, my boy, I came to see you. But—the fact is, I—to say truth, your uncle does not know of my coming, and I am not certain that he would approve."

"Oh, because he will think you ought to have told him first, so that he might have sent a message, eh?"

"Ahem!" cried the apothecary again.

"Oh, well, Herr Peters, that can't be helped now. Here you are, and I am right glad to see you."

"And how do you get on here, Otto? A fortnight is but a short time to judge of your new life. But do you seem to—to think you shall—like it?"

Peters put his head on one side, and looked at Otto insinuatingly, as though to persuade him that he ought to like it very much indeed. It was the kind of manner which the apothecary assumed in administering a peculiarly nauseous potion to a sick child.

"Not a bit of it, my good friend," replied Otto, in his fullest chest voice. "I don't like it at all. And, what is worse, I'm afraid I never shall like it. But I knew all that beforehand. I am not such a boy but what I know that it will be my duty to do a good many things that don't just please my fancy. I shall stick to it for the three years my uncle has bound me for, and then—"

"And then?"

"And then we shall see. Lord, we may be all dead and buried in three years! It's an awful long time to look forward to. But now tell me the news of the good people at Horn. How's my uncle, first and foremost?"

"The Herr Küster is wonderful for a man of his years. I saw him last night at the Pied Lamb. He was full of conversation, and very—very pleasant. He is a man of great experience and wisdom, is your uncle Schnarcher."

It may be observed, for the credit of Peters's sincerity, that he really believed what he said.

"And old Quendel? Is he growing any thinner? Ha, ha, ha! And the Steinbergs? And Granny Becker? And big Hans? And the blacksmith's poodle? And your own Schimmel? Tell me all about every body—dumb beasts and all!"

"They're all well, as far as I know, Otto. But there is an old friend of yours whom you haven't asked for. And he was talking about you last night, too."

"Is there? An old friend whom I haven't asked for!"

"Farmer Lehmann! I thought he was your prime friend and favorite, Otto. You used to be always at the farm before you went to Halle."

The last packet of paper, which Otto at this moment placed on the shelf, must have been peculiarly heavy, for the effect of lifting it seemed to bring the blood into his face, as he answered, "Ah, dear Farmer Franz! Was he talking about me, Herr Peters?"

"Yes. But, Otto, what dreadful weights you are lifting! Don't overtax your strength, my boy."

Otto burst out laughing. "My good Herr Peters," he said, "only see, I can lift these packets with one hand! Honestly, this is the part of my work I like best. I like to feel that I am using my muscles, and doing something for my daily bread. Head-work I'm a dunce at, and I'm afraid Herr Schmitt has got but a bad bargain."

"Yes, Lehmann was talking of you and of your poor father of blessed memory. I called at the farm this morning, and saw the Hausfrau. She's a bitter weed. Ach du lieber Himmel! And I got a parcel to bring to Detmold for Liese."

"For Liese! Is Liese in Detmold?"

"To be sure she is. Didn't you know it?"

"Not a word of it!" cried Otto, hotly. "I went twice or thrice to the farm after I came back from Halle, but I never saw Lieschen, and Frau Lehmann gave me to understand that she was purposely keeping out of my way."

"O Lord!" muttered Peters under his breath, "what a woman she is!" Then he added, more loudly, "I never heard there was any secret in Liese's being in Detmold in service. She went off almost on a sudden. I don't think things were going quite comfortably at the farm. Poor little Lieschen! She's a kitten that hasn't yet grown to be a cat, as they all do sooner or later."

Otto stood quite still leaning on the counter, with a thoughtful, frowning face.

"Well, good-by, lad," said Peters, holding out his hand. "Time is going, and the days are short now, and I have to dine and settle my score at the Blue Pigeon before I can turn the Schimmel's nose homeward. Besides, this errand for the Lehmanns will take up half an hour or so."

"Good-by, good friend. I'm thankful to you for coming. Give my dutiful greetings to my uncle, pray, and messages to any one who may care to hear of me at Horn."

"Shall I greet Lieschen for you?"

"No, thank you. Liese Lehmann wants to hear nothing about me."

Otto wrung his old friend's hand hard, and stood for a few minutes watching the apothecary's tall, lank figure disappear down the street. Then he returned to the shop, and having resumed his coat, sat down to label and number, from a printed list which lay beside him, a series of photographic views which were presently to adorn the window. But, as Otto had himself confessed, head-work was not his forte, and he was unusually absent and preoccupied to-day. Under his fingers many beauties of the Rhine scenery were unjustly attributed to the Moselle, and some views in the Harz country got labeled "Black Forest."

Peters meanwhile made his way to the house where in Elizabeth, or, as she was always called, Liese Lehmann, was filling the post of servant in the family of the Herr Justizrath von Schleppers. It was a pleasant house to look at—built of dark red brick, partly covered with ivy, and with its long, low façade fronting the river. Every window-pane glistened crystal clear in the sunshine. The door-handle and knocker of polished brass were dazzling in their spotless cleanliness, and the white dimity curtains that shaded the parlor windows seemed to have come that instant from the hands of the laundress. But the house had an odd look of not being really used and inhabited. All its colors were as vivid and staring as those of a doll's house: the bricks very red, the door very green, the window-sashes and frames a bright yellow. Only the deep hue of the old ivy somewhat softened and harmonized the general effect. Peters's hand was raised to the knocker, when the door opened and a portly matron came forth, who looked at him with an expression of countenance which was, to say the least of it, not conciliatory.

"If you want the Herr Justizrath," said this stately dame, "you must go round by the back-door to his study. He receives no one on business by this entrance."

"My business is—" began Peters, mildly. But the lady interrupted him.

"Excuse me, I do not seek to know your business. I make a point of never interfering with law matters. The Herr Justizrath is in his study."

"But," said Peters, a little nettled at this cavalier treatment, "I don't want to see the Herr Justizrath. I have neither the good fortune to know him as a friend, nor the ill luck to need him as a lawyer. I suppose you are the mistress of the house?"

The lady made a magnificent bow, which might be translated into the vernacular, "I should rather think I am!"

"Then, if you please, Madam, I should like, with your permission, to speak with your servant-maid, Elizabeth Lehmann. I have brought a parcel for her from her home."

"Liese!" exclaimed the lady, sharply. "Liese is not within at this moment. I have sent her out on an errand, and she has already been twice the time necessary to do it in. You can leave your parcel on the table there, since you are here; but another time I beg you will be good enough to go round by the yard-gate. This entrance is only used by the family or our own visitors."

Peters was a man unapt to anger at all times; nevertheless he did feel considerable indignation at this lady's tone and manner. But Frau von Schleppers was stout and stately, with a deep voice and an unsympathizing stare; and, above all, she was a woman! So she frightened him. He put the little bundle down on the table without a word, and left the house.

The mistress of it waited to see him fairly off the door-step, and then she closed the door with a bang, and walked, or rather waddled, away.

Peters adjusted his spectacles firmly on his nose, looked after her for a second, and exclaimed, with a short laugh, "Poor Justizrath von Schleppers! From my heart I pity thee!"

Then he turned toward his inn, feeling his spirits much relieved by this sarcastic ebullition. Herr Peters considered that he had been very bitter.

CHAPTER V.

THE PINK SATIN NOTE-PAPER.

It was true, as the apothecary had said, that before Otto Hemmerich had gone to Halle the young man had been a frequent visitor at Lehmann's farm. Every one liked him there. Even Frau Hanne, who did not like many people, extended her favor to Otto. He was handy; he was cheerful, he was able and willing to do numberless odd jobs of carpentering for the thrifty housewife. He brought her heaps of ripe blackberries in the autumn, and store of hazel-nuts. He helped in the apple-gathering, and did more work in play than the others got through in earnest. He mended, and made as good as new, some old leather harness that had hung disused for years in the stable. He cleaned and furnished up Franz Lehmann's rusty rifle, and with it shot—hear it not, ye British sportsmen!—shot a fox that had for many a night made havoc among Frau Lehmann's fat geese. He caught and tamed a squirrel as a present for Liese; and moreover, partly manufactured with his own hands a cage to keep it in. In brief, his accomplishments were highly esteemed and appreciated at the farm, and he was a welcome guest on any holiday afternoon that he chose to spend there. But notwithstanding her personal predilection for Otto, Hanne Lehmann did by no means approve of the spirit of rebellion which—rumor said—he was manifesting toward his uncle. Frau Lehmann's government of her own family was an absolute despotism. She would have honestly scorned the idea of giving her subjects a constitution. Her husband's nominal position as head of the household may seem to us a little incompatible with this undisputed female supremacy. But Frau Hanne Lehmann never theorized. She knew what was best for every body, and did it pro proprio motu. Otto's refusal to follow the profession his uncle had chosen for him was a high crime in Frau Lehmann's eyes. Above all was it a crime to decline to follow that special profession. A pastor! It was all that was respectable and reverend. It gave a man authority in despite of youth, and rank in despite of humble birth. In fact, she looked upon it as a piece of unparalleled presumption on the part of a boy like Otto to decline preferment which she, Frau Hanne Lehmann, would have been glad of for a son of her own. And then the thought struck her that Otto and Liese had been allowed to be a great deal together, and that perhaps—Well, she would put a stop to that, at all events. She would have no rebellious notions put into Liese's head. And Franz was so foolish and soft-hearted that there was no knowing what concessions or promises he might be led to make if the young folks had a chance of talking him over. Otto paid a visit to the farm soon after his return from Halle, but he did not see Liese. He saw no one but the mistress of the house, who received him any thing but graciously. Her husband, she said, was absent at Lemgo, selling some wheat. She supposed

Otto knew his own business best—though at his time of life that was scarcely likely—but for her part she couldn't help thinking that it was a pity for him to go against his uncle Schnarcher. She should be sorry for their Lieschen to behave so, that was all.

"But, Frau Lehmann," cried Otto, bluntly, "it is better to go against my uncle than against my conscience, isn't it?"

"Rubbish!" answered Frau Lehmann.

She was not strong in argument, and she didn't like being contradicted. Then Otto asked for Liese; and, to punish him, the Hausfrau simply said that he couldn't see her, without explaining that the good and sufficient reason why he could not see her was that she was at that moment in the house of Frau von Schleppers, in Detmold. Then—Hanne being one of those women who are capable of talking themselves into a passion on the shortest notice, and whose anger makes their tongues terribly unscrupulous—she went on to say that she could not, as a matter of duty to Liese, approve of her having acquaintances whose ideas were so strongly at variance with all that a pious education had instilled into her mind; and that she must do the girl the justice to add, that she had heard Liese herself animadvert on the sin and evil of disobedience and presumption in young people. And so wound up a voluble and rather incoherent tirade, of which Otto understood very little save that the Hausfrau was in a furious bad humor, and that Liese had been speaking unkindly of him and refused to see him.

Otto walked away from the farm with a heavy heart. Frau Lehmann's sharp speeches he might have borne with tolerable indifference; but Liese! Could she turn against him? And then his old friend Farmer Franz too. He couldn't bear the idea of losing his friendship. He would go again to the farm on the chance of seeing Lehmann. But then came the announcement of Simon Schnarcher's resolution to send his grand-nephew to the stationer's shop in Detmold; and Otto's departure was so hurried that he had no time to revisit his friends at the farm.

The young man revolved all these things in his mind as he sat pasting the labels on to the photographs in Herr Schmitt's shop. He had refused to send greetings to Liese Lehmann, and now on reflection his heart misgave him somewhat for having so refused. Peters's announcement of Liese's being in Detmold had changed the aspect of affairs. Who knew how long she had been there? "But then surely the Frau Lehmann would have told me the truth about her when I was at the farm?" thought honest Otto.

"If you please, have you any pink satin note-paper?" said a soft voice in his ear.

"Any what?" Otto jumped off his seat with a bound, and took two little cold hands in his. "Why, Liese, is it you? Thou dear Heaven!"

"Otto!" and the two cold little hands were left confidingly in his, and a pair of brown eyes looked at him in glad surprise. Little Liese Lehmann was very small and shy. She had a clear, fair skin, soft brown eyes, and silky hair of the same color. This hair was coiled in a twisted knot at the back of her head, and one plaited tress was brought down low on either cheek, and put up behind the ears, after a fashion prevalent among German maidens. She wore a gray stuff gown, a blue cotton handkerchief pinned across her breast, and a large checked apron.

"Dear Lieschen!" said Otto, "I had only just heard by accident that you were in Detmold. How goes it, Lieschen? Do tell me, are you well? Are you content here?"

He was too glad to see her to think of any ground of offense he imagined himself to have against her.

"And I—did you think I knew that you were here, Otto? I never was so surprised to see any body!"

It needed not many words between the two young people to explain the history of Otto's visit to the farm, and of Liese's having been kept in ignorance of his coming. Neither of them had a suspicion that Frau Lehmann's desire to keep them asunder originated in any other motive than her disapproval of Otto's persistence in opposing his uncle Schnarcher. Every one who knew Hanne well was accustomed to see great anger arise from causes seemingly quite inadequate to produce it. None of her household or family ever thought of asking what reason the Hausfrau could possibly have for resenting this or that. They said, "She is angry," much as they might say, "It thunders." Both were phenomena which they could neither control nor account for.

"But she shouldn't have told a lie, and said that you had spoken against me," said Otto. "As to what she thinks, that don't so much matter."

"Oh, Otto!" cried Liese, timidly. This was a tremendous assertion, she thought.

"Well, it don't much matter to me, though Frau Lehmann used to be kind and friendly, too, in the old days. Do you recollect the apple-gathering two years ago?"

"Yes; and the time you brought her the blackberries."

"And the fun we had at hay-harvest, Lieschen!"

"And that day when Claus got tipsy, and you chopped the wood for fuel, and nearly cut your finger off. Ach Himmel! How frightened we were! But you didn't say a word. Cousin Hanne said you had the right manful courage. She likes folks to be brave. I ain't a bit brave. I remember she boxed my ears for crying when I saw the blood flow."

"What a shame!" cried Otto, indignantly.

"Well, but, Otto," remonstrated gentle little Lieschen, "you know if we had all cried, and done nothing else, you might have bled to death. But I was only a child then. I hope I should be more helpful now."

"Yes; you are not a child any more, Liese. You are the same, and yet somehow not the same. You have grown so—so different."

No human being had ever told Liese that she was pretty. And it may be doubted whether Otto had ever thought of considering whether she was so or not until that moment. But as he looked straight into her innocent upraised eyes, he made up his mind very decisively on the subject.

"Yes; I've grown an inch," said she, simply. Then they talked of Otto's prospects, and of his Uncle Schnarcher. And Liese ventured timidly to ask Otto if it were not a pity that he could not be a pastor. It was so beautiful, she thought, to teach and comfort the poor people, and tell them good tidings to brighten their hard lives. And Otto, in the superior wisdom of his manhood and his two-and-twenty years, had to explain to Liese's simplicity why it would be impossible for him to play this lofty part in life well, and how wrong it would be to undertake it while his conscience told him clearly that he must fill it badly. And Liese listened with humility, and said that of course Otto knew best, and that it was right and brave of him to speak the truth that God put into his heart. And then—the town-clocks struck one! Liese jumped as if a bomb had burst in the shop.

"Oh dear, oh dear," she cried, in dismay; "there's one going by the parish church! And there's the castle clock now striking the last quarter. Oh, please, have you any pink satin note-paper? I couldn't find it at the shop where we generally deal, and that delayed me, and now I've been talking here and forgetting the time. My mistress told me to make haste. Oh dear, oh dear!"

Otto lost not a moment in searching for the required article, and after opening sundry drawers and boxes, he came upon a small store of it.

"Two sheets, please, and two envelopes," said Lieschen, who had been watching his proceedings anxiously. "How much is it?"

"I don't know. Pay me the next time you come by. Here it is, Liese. And, I say, you'll find a parcel at home for you. Herr Peters from Horn has been over, and—"

But Liese had taken up her little packet, and with a hasty farewell nod had run out of the shop with it. She sped along at a pace very seldom seen among the sober denizens of Detmold. More than one housewife turned to look after "Frau von Schleppers's maiden," and shook their heads disapprovingly. But Liese was unconscious of their looks. Her heart was beating fast—partly from the haste she was making, partly from agitation. The surprise and pleasure of seeing Otto, disappointment at having missed Herr Peters, who doubtless had brought news from the farm, self-reproach at her delay, and dread of her mistress's displeasure, were all jumbled together in the poor child's mind. Still she sped on with agile feet, when, on turning the corner of a street, she ran against somebody. Some very heavy body it seemed, for Liese's light figure bounded off it again like a shuttle-cock, and on looking up, her eyes encountered the stern and astonished gaze of no less a personage than Frau von Schleppers herself.

PROVISIONING.

WE extract the following excellent rules for the choosing of meats and vegetables from "The Royal Cookery Book," written in French by Jules Gouffé, the chief cook of the Paris Jockey Club, and translated by Alphonse Gouffé, head pastry-cook to the Queen of England. This sumptuous volume, the most beautiful of its class that we have ever seen, is high authority in culinary matters; and we are sure that our readers will profit by the information which we design to give them from time to time from its pages:

It is quite evident that, without good materials, the greatest cook in the world will never produce any thing palatable. Too great a care can not, therefore, be paid to one's provisioning and marketing; this alone is a study of itself, to be mastered, as other branches of the culinary art, by experience and practice.

Before making your purchases, learn, first of all, the ruling prices of those things you require, which you can easily do by inquiring at different shops.

Never bind yourself to any special tradesman. Do not give your custom, nor your whole confidence, to one individual. Rely rather upon your own judgment and observation than upon a tradesman's word, however trustworthy he may be.

Whenever any article is pressed upon you, be more particularly on your guard; there are very few tradesmen who can resist the temptation of palming off, at all hazard, any remaining fish, game, or meat, of questionable freshness.

Be on good terms with all tradespeople, without becoming intimate with any. It is very seldom that a too great familiarity does not, in the long-run, result in some unfair advantage being taken of the purchaser.

The following are a few elementary principles which it will be well to be guided by in the selection of provisions:

BUTCHER'S MEAT.

Beef should be chosen of a bright red color, with light yellow fat, approaching the hue of fresh butter. If the beef should be hard and firm to the touch, with flaccid and little fat, of a brown and dull color, these are sure indications of inferior quality.

Veal should be chosen of a light color, with very white and transparent fat. Avoid lean veal of a reddish tint, and the kidney of which is surrounded by red-looking fat.

Prime mutton is known by the same signs as good beef, viz., a bright red color, freedom from gristle, and very white and transparent fat. Inferior mutton is of a dull red color, with yellow and opaque fat.

POULTRY.

In the first place, poultry should be selected very tender, particularly when not in season, from the 1st of December to the 1st of May. Spring chickens begin in May, but at any time they should be carefully examined before buying. A tender chicken is known by the size of its feet and neck; a young fowl always has large feet and knee-joints; these characteristics disappear with age. A tough fowl has a thin neck and feet, and the flesh of the thigh has a slight violet tinge. After examining these external signs, the flesh of the pinion and breast should be tried: if tender in both these places, the chicken can be used with confidence.

Never use Old Fowls.

I call particular attention to this principle, which I consider a very important one—Never use an old fowl in cookery. Whichever way you dress it, it will never be good. It is a great mistake to recommend, as in many cookery books, the putting of an old fowl in the stock-pot. Instead of improving the broth, it can do nothing but impart to it the unpleasant flavor of the hen-house.

A good turkey will be recognized by the whiteness of the flesh and fat. Beware of those with long hairs, and whose flesh on the legs and back is of a violet tinge.

To select a goose, try the flesh of the pinion and break off the lower part of the beak, which should break easily; the fat should be light-colored and transparent. Ducks are chosen in the same way.

Pigeons should have fillets of a light red color; when old, these darken to blackish violet, and the legs get thin.

FISH.

A fresh fish is recognizable by the redness of the gills, the brightness of the eyes, and the firmness of the flesh.

It is not enough to be guided by the smell: it may have laid days on ice without acquiring any noticeable smell, but the flesh in such a case will be dull and flaccid, and care should be taken not to employ fish in that condition. It should be borne in mind that fish will lose in quality in the spawning season; this should regulate one's purchases.

The remarks on old poultry apply even more particularly to old fish, which should never, on any consideration, appear on the table.

GAME.

Old hares should be discarded, they can be turned to no good account; leverets and young hares alone should be bought; you can tell a tender hare by the ease with which the fore-paw may be broken, by its large knees and short stumpy neck. Good wild rabbits are known by the same indications.

Pheasants should be selected with the spur but little developed; the tenderness of the bird is known by trying the flesh of the pinion.

Woodcocks are also tried by pinching the pinion and breast. Similarly with respect to wild ducks, teal, widgeon, and other water-fowl.

Partridges are also tested in the same way; their age can be ascertained by examining the long feathers of the wing—round at the tip in an old bird, and pointed in a young.

VEGETABLES.

The first consideration in the purchase of vegetables is to have due regard to the variations of taste and appearance which the same vegetables undergo in different seasons; spring carrots, for instance, are very different to those of autumn and winter. I will, at the proper place, state when each species of vegetables is in season; this should regulate their employment.

GROCERIES, ETC.

As to all articles to be had from the Grocer's, the Oilman, and Dairyman, I would more than ever recommend that none but the best be bought; this is sure in the end to prove more satisfactory and economical. An inferior quality of oil, used in cookery, will spoil the sauce or whatever else it may be added to; the same with butter, which should always be selected of the freshest and best. A small quantity of sweet butter will improve any preparation where it is required; whereas, with bad butter, the result will be exactly the reverse: the more you add of it the worse will your dish become. Never buy butter without carefully smelling and tasting it; these two tests are indispensable. If you have any doubts as to its freshness, do not on any account buy it, but try elsewhere; it is an invariable rule that "no good cookery is to be done with questionable butter."

Never employ eggs without examining them carefully, not only when buying them, but also when they are broken. An egg may appear perfectly good, and still have an unpleasant damp-straw flavor, which is sufficient to spoil a whole dish. Eggs should be broken, one after the other, and none put into the basin until their freshness has been ascertained.

With respect to bacon, one should likewise be very particular in selecting none but what is very white, with the least gristle possible, and quite fresh, and free from rustiness. Fresh pork should be of a light brownish hue, and free from any inequalities of color.

ROSE SONG.

See illustration on page 668.

SUNNY breadths of roses,
Roses white and red,
Rose-bud and rose-leaf,
From the blossom shed!
Goes my Darling flying
All the garden through,
Laughing she eludes me,
Laughing I pursue.

Now to pluck the red rose,
Now to pluck the white
(Hands as blossoms rosy),
Stopping in her flight:
What but this contents her,
Laughing as she goes?
Pelting with the rose-bud,
Pelting with the rose!

Roses round me flying,
Roses in my hair,
I to snatch them trying—
Darling, have a care!
Lips are so like flowers,
I might snatch at those;
Redder than the rose-leaves,
Sweeter than the rose.

AWAITING THE CONQUEROR.

See illustration on page 668.

I watch with a weary yearning,
I watch till my eyes grow dim,
For my hero home-returning,
And the chaplets weave for him.
For he comes from the fields of glory,
Where the foe lies stark and dead,
And his name for our children's story
Shall live when the years have fled.

He comes; and my heart to meet him
Goes forth o'er the shining sea;
We have tuned the harps to greet him
Who comes to be crowned by me.
And I would there were garlands fairer
Than these that our glad hands hold;
That nature had roses rarer,
Or a costlier gift than gold.

He comes; may the waves before him
Rest calm where the great sail swings;
May the gracious skies bend o'er him
With the fragrance summer brings!
And then, when a nation's altars
Are rich with the spoils of Rome,
I shall kiss with a lip that falters,
For joy that my love comes home.

THE GENTLE CRAFT.

An Echo.

See illustration on page 668.

Al, little maid, with the dimpled cheek,
That never has known a bitter tear,
All your thought is fishes to seek—
Roach and gudgeon and dace and bleak!
Wait till you come to twenty year.

Charlie may help to hold the rod,
Grasping it thus your cast to steer,
Lest the top-joint, with a needless nod,
Teach to the float behavior odd—
Wait till you come to twenty year.

If at a bite the float should throb,
Trust his teaching, although severe;
Heart may flutter and throat may sob—
But you don't get a catch for every bob!
Wait till you come to twenty year.

Twenty times over the season may pass—
Charlie may still be your only dear—
But you'll find all fishing is not, alas!
By the riverside, on the sunny grass:
Wait till you come to twenty year.

Try the swim again and again—
Only provided the swim be clear;
Just at present your only bane
Is when the lilies your float detain:
Wait till you come to twenty year.

The daintiest line that ever was dipped
Has brought the angler a basket queer;
Like the lightest rod that was ever unshipped,
And the prettiest stream that ever was whipped:
Wait till you come to twenty year.

I have angled in times gone by,
Little maid with the eyes sincere:
May you have luck no worse than I,
When in the river of life you try:
Wait till you come to twenty year.

Meanwhile, fishes alone to catch,
Give your mind to your angling gear
Time enough for a different match
When looks, not hooks, will the prey attach:
Wait till you come to twenty year.

Ah! little maid with the eyes of blue,
With a little lover so watchful near,
Hundreds there are that envy you—
And hundreds of boys that envy, too,
That little lover, as I would do,
Could I go back to twenty year.

Yes, little maid with the dimpled cheek,
Pure as the heaven of the upper sphere,
I but murmur an old man's pique—
Ah, to think of the love I'd speak,
Had I but come to twenty year!

MORAL.

Poor old dotard! and is this all—
All the wisdom and all the cheer
Sights like this innocent pair recall?
Sighing, "Could I but backward crawl
To the pure enchantment of twenty year!"

NOTE BY THE POET.

Dear little maid, with the dimpled cheek,
Though at your poet thus they sneer,
Do not think him a mean old sneak—
'Twas because I love you my words were weak;
But I'll tell you all in the Kalends Greek,
When we've both come to twenty year.

PETTY CHEATING.

IT is mortifying to learn that, by the use of fraudulent weights and measures, cheating is continually on the increase, and one's indignation fires up on reflecting that it is the humbler and struggling classes who are for the most part the victims of it. Of many of the street traffickers it may be said that cheating, in some form or other, is their normal system of doing business. It would seem that the weights and measures of the outdoor traders are not subject to the supervision of the inspectors; at any rate, we never hear of these gentry being brought to account for their exploits. A pound of cherries bought from a hand-cart in the street is rarely found to weigh a dozen ounces; oftener, indeed, it may weigh eight or nine. The so-called pound weight of the street fruit-seller is a nondescript lump of metal, manufactured for the purpose, and has no definite relation to a pound avoirdupois, unless in appearance. In selling fruit by measure there is the same sort of sophistication. False wooden bottoms are common, as the buyers of nuts know well. If the measure is correct, which is assuming a great deal, the method of filling it is a delusion. A practiced hand will fill a quart pot with a pint of plums or gooseberries, and make it appear as though it were brimful and running over. Watch him narrowly, and you will see how he does it. He lays the measure horizontally, and covers the lower side with fruit; then raising the measure gradually he heaps a handful of fruit over the top with his left hand; at the same time having a good-sized plum, say between the finger and thumb of his right hand, he ingeniously inserts that as a kind of keystone to prevent the crowning heap from falling into the hollow beneath: thus the measure appears choke-full and filled up, though something like half the due quantity is lacking. This clever piece of cheating is executed with astonishing rapidity—two seconds, we should say, affords ample time for it. When the measure, as in the case of strawberries and raspberries, goes with the fruit, the cheating, as every one knows, consists in filling the lower half, or more, of the box with some worthless material—grass, hay, fern-leaves, or any thing that comes to hand—so that half a pint of the fruit shall look like a pint, or a pint like a quart. It would appear that the summer fruits never have been honestly sold in the streets. It is cheapest in the end to buy of an honest, established dealer, whom you can trust as to the quantity and quality of your purchases.

HORTICULTURAL HINTS FOR AUGUST.

CONTRARY to the generally received impression, the months of August and September are very important months for horticultural labor; and a very large amount of work necessary to be done in the ornamentation of our country places and the cultivation of plants can be better executed and with more success at this time than in the spring or later in the season.

From the 15th of August until the end of September is a favorable time for the transplanting of evergreens. The past season's growth is then matured, the earth is warm and the nights cool, new roots are rapidly made, and the tree gets well established before winter sets in; and is, therefore, not so liable to be injured by the high winds of the late autumn and winter. Great care must be taken to prevent the roots of the trees to be transplanted from becoming dried. More trees and plants are lost from this cause than from any other; and if the trees are purchased at a nursery, the purchaser should insist that they be puddled as soon as they are dug up and kept moist. Puddling is dipping the roots into a mixture of fine pulverized clay and water of the consistence of thick cream, which, adhering to and encasing the roots, keeps them from being injured, as they otherwise would be if exposed to the air.

The trees should be planted as soon as taken up, and the earth well pulverized before being thrown over the roots. During the filling the tree should be well shaken up and down, so that the earth may fill up all the interstices between the roots, and not trodden down. When the hole is about three-fourths filled with earth pour in sufficient water to soak the soil well and settle it about the roots; when the water has all settled away, fill in the remaining earth, which will prevent the surface from becoming baked. If the surface of the soil becomes hard and baked it prevents the moisture of the soil below from being drawn up to the surface and so nourishing the plant, and also keeps the air from filtering through the soil to the roots, the air being absolutely necessary to their existence. Should the weather be dry and hot it may be necessary, in ten days or a fortnight after, to draw the earth from the tree so as to make a basin three or four inches deep, and to give a good watering, returning the earth as before.

Do not use soap-suds, manure-water, or any other liquid except pure water, and do not fill in the hole with wood-pile earth, earth from the woods, or with manure, nor mix any such ingredients in the soil; they are almost certain death to a tree when it is transplanted, and are about as healthful to it as strong ale or turtle-soup would be to a sucking infant.

From the long list of species of evergreens to be found in the nursery catalogues, the best for general purposes—that is, those combining absolute hardiness, rapidity of growth, and beauty of form—the following may be selected. Among the Pine family are the Austrian Pine, the Scotch Pine, the White Pine, Lambert's Pine, the Corsican Pine, and the Bhotan Pine. Among the Spruce family are the Norway Spruce, of which there are many curious varieties, some being dwarf, others contorted or of curious monstrous forms; the Eastern Spruce, the Hemlock Spruce, or common Hemlock, one of the most elegant of evergreens, the Cephalonian Silver Fir, and Nordmann's Fir. — Among the Junipers the Irish and Swedish, the latter the most hardy, the Prostrate, and the Scaled Juniper. Among the Arbor-vitæ, the Siberian, the Golden, the Chinese, the Plicate, Hovey's, "Tom Thumb," and the Globose, are the best and most distinct, the last three being very dwarf varieties. Among the Cypressess, Lawson's and the Nootka Sound Cypress are the best. Among the Yews the English, the Upright Irish, the Golden, the Pyramidal and Dovaston are the finest. Box-edging may also be reset or planted at this season, taking care to water it well after it is planted.

In this month, preparation should be made for stocking the greenhouse for next winter's use. Seeds of Mignonette, Sweet Alyssum, Schizanthus, Nemophila insignis, Rhodanthe, Calceolaria, Pansies, Daisies, Chinese Primroses, and Cinerarias may now be sown for blooming in the late winter and spring. The soil should be light and the seeds but barely covered, the pots containing them should be placed in a partially shaded place in a frame, and great care should be taken to keep them from becoming either dry or too moist by over-watering. Cuttings of Roses and Pelargoniums or Geraniums, as they are popularly, although erroneously, called, should now be made; they should be placed in a frame covered by a sash in a cool, shady place, and as they become rooted should have air gradually given to them.

Camellias, Azaleas, and green-house plants generally, which were not repotted in the spring, should now be repotted. The best soil for nearly all plants is well rotted old turf run through a very coarse sieve (say with meshes half an inch square), which, if not sufficiently light and friable, should have one-quarter or one-third coarse sand mixed with it, road sand answers a good purpose. Do not use any manure or leaf soil or wood soil—the tendency of all such matters is to produce fermentation, and to cause the soil in the pots to become sodden and sour. Plants grown in simple fresh turfy loam are always more stocky in their growth, and less liable to be drawn up or to make a spindling, weak growth. All the most successful growers are now abandoning the use of such materials, or if manure is given, or is considered necessary for such plants as Fuschias, Roses, Pelargoniums, and Cinerarias, it should be given when they begin to form flower buds, in a greatly diluted liquid state, once or twice a week until they are done blooming. Bear in mind not to put any crock, pot shred, or shell over the hole in the bottom of the pot, as it only prevents proper drainage; the hole is made there to afford drainage; to close it by covering it is only to do away with the purpose for which it was designed. The earth should be well shaken down into the space between the ball of roots and the sides of the pot into which it is shifted so as not to leave any open spaces, and then firmly pressed down with the fingers. The surface of the soil should not come nearer than within half an inch of the top of the pot in the pint, quart, half gallon and gallon sizes, and in larger pots a greater distance should be given. When the pots are filled too full of earth there is not space enough left to give a sufficiency of water at once; and while the of the succeeding year, their gardens would be flowerless, and that they would have to repeat the expenditure if they wished to have any flowers at all, so that after buying and planting for five or ten years they now have nothing to show for their money; yet, had they expended the same aggregate amount in purchasing herbaceous plants, they would have had in their flower-beds from one hundred to three hundred species and varieties, and they would have plants in bloom from the middle of March until November. We propose to give in our next article a descriptive list of some of the leading and choicest species and varieties as a guide to such of our lady readers as may wish to make a selection and trial of this beautiful and easily cultivated class of plants.

THE HOUSEHOLD ANGEL.

By FITZ HUGH LUDLOW.

CHAPTER XII.

THE three hours were scarcely up when Jim, on looking out of the window of the room where he was bathing poor Cuthbert's mangled face, and keeping an eye on him as the Doctor had ordered, saw a great crowd approach the gate, led by Derrick's buggy. All of them who rejoiced in equipages of their own came in that aristocratic way; but there was a large following on foot, and quite a large one on horseback.

One of the latter class approached the buggy, and after a short conversation with him, Derrick drove rapidly to the stables. To the last moment he preserved his air of deprecation at the proposed proceedings, begging off from any attendance at the trial, on the ground that he was Cuthbert's friend; but telling the managers where they could find him, if necessary, in the garden.

Cuthbert was lying in a stupor of despair upon the bed, and Jim, with a terror natural at that day, was trying to frame some explanation of the concourse other than its having come to "roast a live nigger," when it poured through the gate and stopped. A short palaver took place, a wagon was unhitched and wheeled into the middle of the lawn, half a dozen men took their place on it, and a committee was sent to the house to secure the culprit.

Perro, in an agony of fear, showed them their way to Cuthbert's room. He was roused by their knocking, and himself called them to come in. They announced their mission with as little ceremony as is usual on such occasions, and with a calmness which surprised even them, used as they were to stolidity and bravado, he dressed himself to accompany them.

"Never mind a cravat," said one.

"No! we furnish that!" said another, with pleasant sportiveness, as if he quite enjoyed the lark; while a third, looking up at the sky, remarked that it was "fine weather for hanging."

The negroes about the house were secured for the witness-stand as roughly as possible, and the committee took back their prey to the crowd, who were already beginning to clamor with impatience at their delay.

Between two of his stoutest captors, Cuthbert was set in a conspicuous place on the wagon. Seeing his bruised face the crowd set up a shout of derision, for the impression that he had shown fight seemed exquisitely facetious to them. A strange peace buoyed him up. He had a thousand times thought of some distant, unknown dying day with inconceivable terror. Here it was! He could tell, almost to the minute, how long he would have to look upon this green earth, that blue sky; but he felt no fear. All that made life desirable had passed away from him in the last twenty-four hours. His mind was clear now from all the fumes of drink—even from the bewilderment of wrath with which he had pronounced his malediction upon Derrick. He could look back sanely on the horrors of the last night; and he saw that, however wicked he had been otherwise, he was free of the crime, because innocent of the intention, of infanticide. Would not Lily say so when she met him presently? And if Lily, not the merciful Lord whom she loved? Already that Lord seemed so merciful! This was not the way in which he would have chosen to die; but of how little consequence was that when the day had been so timely selected for him! The good Lord had compelled him to stay on the earth only for a few hours after all its light had gone out for him, and he would sup to-night on new wine in the Kingdom, with his angel at the banquet beside him, where light is eternal, and they need no sun nor moon to lighten them.

The negroes, Kledda, Perro, and Jim, were successively "put through" by eminently jocular prosecutors, amidst roars of laughter, and with the same general nonchalance that would greet witnesses to the spoliation of a hen-roost. They had but one short, simple tale to tell. All three had heard the prisoner say that he killed his daughter. Their testimony over, Cuthbert was asked what he had to say for himself. "Nothing," he replied, in a firm and courteous voice, "except that what they have testified is true, and to say, what can not make any difference with the result, that I did not mean to kill her. I had suffered from a late severe domestic affliction, and been drinking to drown my trouble. I took too much liquor for my reason or self-control, and while under the influence of it struck a little angel, before lifting my hand against whom, in my sober moments, I would have cut it off. The blow, and the fall into a deep part of the Run, caused her death. I am glad that I need not stay long behind her, for life would be very hard if I had to."

His dignified and gentle manner made a very favorable impression on several here and there among his crowd of judges, who, having lost children of their own, used their handkerchiefs surreptitiously when he spoke so touchingly about his little girl, asked if the body had been found, and, on hearing that it had not, started legal questions as to whether the execution ought not to be arrested till the Run was dragged and it discovered. But the mass understood none of these subtleties about the necessity of a "corpus delicti," and chafed for a vote, which resulted largely in favor of Cuthbert Kearney's immediate execution.

He was asked if he had any thing to say before he was "swung off." He replied, after looking around among the crowd, that he did not see Derrick Dalmager, and would feel much easier in his mind if he could have a few minutes' conversation with him before he died. There were some brutes in too great a hurry for the show to grant him that trifling request; but on putting it to vote a large majority acceded to it.

The Committee found him in the garden, and brought him back with them. It was the first time their eyes had met since the fight in the bedroom, and for the only time in their acquaintance did Derrick find it impossible to stand the ordeal—dropping his own almost immediately, though he raised them again, and showing so much perturbation that of the two who sat whispering in the wagon a new-comer might likely enough have selected the wrong one as he who was about to be hanged. Derrick had brought this all about, and he could not help feeling—though he was mistaken—that Cuthbert knew it. He had never before known such inward disturbance in his life. He was on the very threshold of all his fulfilled wishes. The fruit which had dropped out of his illicit grasp this morning to-night he might legally hope for. The object of his long contempt; the attempted possessor of his paternal demesne; his obstacle with the woman he loved; his eyesore every where; the only man who had ever dared to smite him on the face; the man whom he had smitten in the heart—was in a few minutes more to be removed mean one of them now—don't feel one—no, not one."

(Cries of "Time's up!" from the crowd.)

"They're calling me. Well, that's all I have to say, except that I pray you and she may be happy here, and that we may all meet by-and-by in a world where all our offenses are forgiven and forgotten. I've been a great sinner, but I love my little angel's Jesus in spite of that, and I hope that I'm going the right way—yes! I humbly know I am, for He's the Way. Be kind to her, and both of you come that same way. Now I'm going to see my baby! Good-by, Derrick!"

Cuthbert wrung his hand, and without a word Derrick slipped down from the wagon, feeling as if through that hand lightning had passed up into his heart.

The tree selected for the ghastly work was a noble oak in the middle of the lawn, the most venerable tree on the Dalmager demesne. A light one-horse wagon was driven under a limb which grew about fifteen feet from the ground—a rope was thrown over this limb, secured by a slip-knot, and another noose was made at its other extremity. An empty box was set on end in the wagon to raise the victim high enough for a fall of about four feet, and on this he was ordered to stand up. The noose was thrown over his head, and as he turned away his solemn eyes forever out of his way: his chief desires were fulfilled on the very heels of their conception. Yet this man, over whom he had his final triumph, sitting there in such grave peace, seemed to triumph over him. He was going to the realization of all things—he could have no disappointment any more forever. Was what Derrick had got worth all he had paid for it? Would it pay hereafter? This man, with one foot in the eternal world, seemed strangely, immeasurably, his superior.

"STOP THE HANGIN'!"

"Derrick!" whispered Cuthbert, "I know all. If you love her, and she loves you, you will make each other happy. I hope you both do love each other now, though it was hell to think so this morning. I never was worthy of her. I could see many a thing, after I knew you, where I lacked in those things that win a woman's admiration; and—dear me!—how many of them you had! Well, well! Love her, and be kind to her; tell her I don't wonder she loves you; and—you won't be angry with me now—take my forgiveness, both of you—freely, heartily. You can let me send a kiss to her now, to make up till we meet again, can't you? I want you to forgive me too. I'm very sorry I was so bitter up there in the room: I humbly beg your pardon for striking you. And remember that now as I stand, where the two roads part—where I can look before and after, and see what both worlds are worth—I take back all those curses; I don't from the pitiless surging crowd, in which there was not one face that pleaded for him, to the bright blue sky, and the sun whose beams should cherish him no more, one of the managers fired a pistol, the driver started his horse forward, and with a prayer on his lips, he fell. As the victim's weight straightened the rope with a jerk the limb slowly bent downward, then came crashing to the ground, not broken off short at the arm-pit, but splitting out a long perpendicular splinter of the trunk itself from the point where it sprung to the very root of the tree.

"D—d pretty business this!" said one of the managers, as he loosed the cord from Cuthbert's throat and bid him take a respite till they could find a more reliable branch. The nearest of the crowd pressing around the tree, curious to examine the cause of the catastrophe, found that time and weather had made the venerable oak a mere shell. That piece of the trunk which had splintered out with the limb was fifteen feet in length, and from four to fifteen inches in breadth, but in several places not more than an inch in thickness. Every body on the estate had known for years that the tree was hollow; on one side of the trunk, a little higher than a tall man could reach, was a hole extending into the interior, through which, if so minded, he might easily have poked a Webster's Unabridged; but the exterior appeared so solid that the thinness of the sound wood took the examiners by surprise.

Suddenly a man, peering into the great cavity large enough for a comfortable ticket-office, exclaimed "Hello! What's that?" and borrowing a friend's cane, with the curve of it hooked out through the crevice a rusty iron box about eighteen inches square. He wiped from it its crust of mould and rotten wood-dust, and holding it up to the light, read, in tarnished gilt Gothic text, upon the cover, the name

Selbert Kearney.

Cuthbert had paid no attention to the explorations going on beside him. Motionless, with his hands tied behind him, and his thoughts far away, he stood looking dreamily across the lawn toward the fields where but yesterday he had wandered in such bliss with his little girl, and wondering how much more beautiful those shining meadows would be where he should stray with her, hand in hand once more, before they who staid on the earth had their sundown. He was rudely recalled from his reverie by the finder of the box, who nudged him, and pointing to the half-faded characters, said:

"Old man's name, isn't it?"

Cuthbert uttered an exclamation of astonishment.

"My father's cash-box! My friend, I should have been saved a good deal of sorrow if that had been found earlier."

"Double-locked, isn't it? What's in here?" and the man shook it. There was a metallic chink which corroborated the presumption from its heaviness that the box was decidedly worth opening.

"Got the keys with you?" asked the finder, greedily.

"No; all the keys that belonged to my father are on a string in the house."

"Where? where?" asked the man, with gloating eyes. "I don't suppose there's much in it; but 't might be just as well to see—where are they?"

"Found another limb!" shouted one of the managers, from a distant magnolia—"sent up a nigger to jump on the bough and make a sure job this time. Bring him along!"

"Hold on a minute, can't you?" called the finder—"me and the prisoner's got a little business;" and he wrapped the box up in his coat, taken off for that purpose, to hide it from any neighbor who might claim shares.

"Oh, damn your business!—d'ye think we can wait all day?—bring him along!"

Carrying his bundle, and sticking to Cuthbert like a leech, with an occasional whisper about "them keys," and "getting the matter off his mind," to which the prisoner paid no attention, he followed him to the magnolia, and stood chafing at the tail of the wagon, which was driven under the newly-selected gibbet. The box was put in, and once more Cuthbert was called on to mount.

He was about to obey when a clumsy farm wagon was seen coming up the Owlville road at a rate which made the wheels jump. The ill-matched span of heavy grays were in a lather of sweat and on the keen gallop. Just as the amateur hangman was bustling to prepare the lower slip-knot the team came back on their haunches with a jerk, and the lower gate of the Dalmager demesne, about twenty rods distant from the sacrificial magnolia, was thrown open by a shock-headed old man, who leaped from the wagon, in a striped jean coat, a hickory shirt, and pantaloons of corduroy. Every body on the outskirts of the crowd, and they who occupied that exalted central position where they could see the wagon beneath the magnolia, turned to look at the new-comer. Even Cuthbert and his executioner paused for a moment from their share in the dreadful ceremony. The old man jumped to his seat again with the same youthful alacrity he had shown in getting down, and laying the lash on his horses brought them, quicker than I have been able to tell of it, abreast the fatal tree. Thinking that this was only some worthy citizen who had got in a little late at the performance, and ascribing his empressment to the fear of a scolding from the two members of his family on the seat behind him who had nearly missed the show, the connoisseur Ketch was about slipping his noose over Cuthbert's head as the old man halted again, and, standing up on the seat where every body could see him, yelled,

"Stop the hangin'!"

An angry murmur ran through the crowd, with cries of "What for, d—n you?" "Who's that?" and "It's nobody but old Suggs!"

So it was. Our acquaintance of the Hog Scramble toll-gate turned to one of the figures wrapped in a coarse, light shawl behind him, and it climbed to the seat by his side.

"Ye ask Suggs what that's for, do ye? Give me your eyes, and I'll tell ye. Take off that kiver, gal!"

The shawl was dropped, and there stood Lily Kearney!

"Now go on with your hangin' if you dare!" cried the man of the toll-gate.

Just in time to avoid Cuthbert's completion of his own murder the executioner slipped the noose off his head, and he tumbled forward from the box a lifeless heap. Scarcely a person in the crowd had ever seen the little girl before, but Suggs told the nearest spectators who she was, and the information traveled among them like wild-fire. "It's his daughter!" "It's the little gal they said was murdered!" "By the Eternal, they were going to hang an innocent man!" Such exclamations went thrilling through the throng from circumference to centre. It was strange to notice how every man used the third person plural—"they said," "they were going to hang." All instinctively shunned the responsibility of the crime which in ten minutes more would have been on the soul of every one of them, and assumed the position of disinterested lookers-on, drawn to the spectacle by mere curiosity. Some besotted brutes grumbled at their disappointment, but there were other men to whom it became a salutary lesson of civilization—who for the first time were stricken with horror at a red-handed vengeance capable of making such frightful mistakes as this had come so near to being, and who resolved upon the spot that they would never attend a Lynch trial again.

The crowd parted for the little girl to pass through. She was deathly pale, and so weak that before she had gone three steps from the wagon her feet failed her, and her companion was obliged to lift her in her arms. This companion was a closely-veiled woman in a coarse, cheap gown of calico, cut after the most graceless fashion of "poor white trash" society, with a corresponding straw bonnet that seemed trimmed with odds and ends fished out of a rag-bag, and several sizes too large for her. They reached the executioner's wagon, and the woman, after helping Lily into it, stood motionless by the forward wheel.

The little girl fell upon her knees by Cuthbert's side, and kissed his pale face in a passion of daughterly tenderness. "Oh, papa! darling papa!" she cried, "won't you speak to your own lamb—your own little Lily?" Then she fell to chafing his poor cold hands, and tried to draw his inanimate face into her lap; but the man who had lately stood stolidly preparing to slaughter him had to help her, and did it with tears in his eyes.

By-and-by Cuthbert heard her entreaties sounding like sweet music from some far distance—it seemed to come closer and closer—and then he opened his eyes and fixed them on her face with unspeakable love. His poor pallid lips moved, but could frame no audible syllable, till one of the rude by-standers, touched by the little girl's pleading face, ran and brought her some water for her father in a rusty old camp cup from the Run. She wet his mouth, and in a tone of blissful, heart-satisfied peace, he murmured:

"Oh, my angel! I'm with you again—thank God, with my darling again!"

"Oh yes! thank Him—thank Him more than tongue can tell! You're safe, my own papa—you're safe!" and she hugged him with wild, joyful kisses as if she could never let him go.

"It was so quick—so easy," whispered Cuthbert, with half-open eyes. "I never thought how easy it would be—I never felt it—yet I am here—thank God! thank God!"

He paused a moment—struggled to open his dim eyes wider, and continued:

"I can't see very plainly yet, but it seems as if I saw a cut upon your forehead, darling—"

"Don't think about that," said she, hastily pulling down the handkerchief which was bound over the strip of plaster on her wound. "That's all over now. You didn't do it; it was the naughty little stone; but it don't hurt me, and it mustn't you, ownest own, lovely, loving papa!"

"But—the mark won't stay—will it? Such things don't show here—do they? I thought—"

"Here, papa? Where, precious?"

"In heaven," answered Cuthbert again, in the tone of immeasurable peace.

"Heaven? Oh yes! I know now! Did you think you had died?"

"Didn't I?" asked Cuthbert, in a voice of bewilderment.

"Look, dear papa! I'm alive—here on this earth!"

Cuthbert raised himself upon one elbow, looked hurriedly about him, saw the crowd, and dropped back upon Lily's lap, almost swooning again with astonishment.

"Don't faint, dear papa," said Lily. "Hark, and I'll tell you. When I fell into the pool, the dear old Run carried me out through that narrow crack, and as I was going down stream the Lord told it to wash me against a little log which was floating there. The little log had one little crooked finger, but it stuck it out and caught your Lily right by the waist of her frock, and I fell fast asleep just as we went sailing off together. I don't know how long it was, but by-and-by I was swept against a bridge, and the bridge held me. Then somebody passed by and saw me, and took me up and carried me to a house—queer old Suggs's house—a man that keeps a toll-gate—and got flannels and rubbed me and stopped my bleeding, and made me all warm and alive again. Then I woke, and in the afternoon, when I got just strong enough to sit up, somebody came to the toll-gate, and told old Suggs he was sorry, he was so sorry he had to go out to Hog Scramble, because there was going to be a hanging up at Dalmager's. The window was open right by my chair, and I could hear Suggs say, 'Who is it?' and the other man answered, 'It's that Yankee fellow, Kearney—they're going to hang him because he killed his little girl.'"

"Then I and the person that saved me almost died. But Suggs was very kind to us, though he is a poor old man and drinks and swears like grandpa. And he took us with his own team, and whipped it all the way; and dear Jesus helped us, and we got here in time. Good man," she continued, addressing the pleasantest face in the crowd that stood pressing and gaping about them, "won't you please ask them to go away—just a little way off—so I can speak to my papa alone?"

"Yes, I will, you dear little gal!" said the man, wiping his eyes with the back of a brown, hairy hand. "I had just such a little rose-bud as you are up to six weeks ago last Sunday—come on, fellers, and leave 'em private."

All retired save the woman in the white trash gown, and Lily went on,

"Don't you love the good person that saved me, papa?"

"Oh, my Lily, I thank whomever it was next to God!" sobbed Cuthbert Kearney—"thank and love, too; so much that there is nothing I wouldn't do to show it."

"Suppose it was somebody that had been very wicked and cruel to you, would you forgive him?"

"If it were my worst enemy, darling. Oughtn't I when he had saved your life and mine? It wouldn't be forgiveness; for the debt, whatever it was, would be wiped off—nobody could be my enemy so much that to love him for to-day would be any thing but common gratitude."

"And if he hadn't any home in the world—but was cast off and wandering, with nowhere to go, nobody to take him—would you give him a home yourself, dear papa?"

"While I had a place for your head and mine, as long as I lived, he should share it."

"Then, poor thing, come here and see papa," spoke Lily, to the veiled woman standing behind Cuthbert by the wheel. "You've got Love and Home and Somebody to be dear to you always."

The woman leaned over Cuthbert, her whole frame convulsed with weeping, and tremblingly lifted her veil.

"My wife! My wife!"

"O God! Oh, Cuthbert!"

"Kiss her! Oh, papa, kiss her!" cried Lily;

"tell her you forgive her!"

"Can you—can you forgive? Let me hear you say it, and I'll go away satisfied!"

Cuthbert clasped his arms around her neck, and, pressing her to his bosom, told her that, if she would stay, she should go away from him no more forever.

"Oh blessed Jesus!" whispered Lily, her pale face lighted with Heaven's own peace, "I knew you would bring back my mamma—and you have, dear Jesus—how I love you! You have!" She threw one soft arm around the neck of each, and for a little space, with their cheeks bowed together, they all wept silently as if their hearts would break. Oh happy hearts, that break for fullness of bliss!

MEDIEVAL FRENCH COSTUMES.

THE costume of the period is worthy attention. Trowsers had no pockets like those of modern times. They were held up by a belt. Besides this belt, another belt was worn, which encircled the long gowns worn in common by both sexes. Upon this belt were suspended the keys, the purse, and the knife of the wearer. If he was a lawyer, he carried his desk slung upon it. The belt, which was visible, became after a short time a fashionable luxury among the women. It was sometimes made of silk, of silver, or of gold, and gave rise to the proverb so soothing to the jealousy of the women of the middle and lower classes, that a good renown is worth more than a golden belt. The same fashionable love of finery was extended to purses, which took different names according to their size and quality. When the charge of debt was brought against a man, his belt was taken from him in the presence of the judges, and this was interpreted into a declaration that his property no longer belonged to him. Widows who had resolved not to remarry, deposited their belts upon the graves of their husbands.

FLIRTING AS AN ART.

SOCIETY bears far too hardly upon flirts. The majority of these not uninteresting creatures are simply the victims of a peculiar temperament. Flirtation, in their case, is due to physiological, not psychical causes. They coquette with men for the same reason that kittens play with each other; it is their instinct thus to amuse themselves. Their pretty wiles are not the result of a theory, but the quite unconscious, unintentional, and innocent play of a natural impulse. The sly looks, the quaint graces, the pert airs which seem so very artificial are no more artificial than the color of the young person's eyes or the tapering form of her fingers. "Be natural, and abandon these meretricious pretensions and affectations," says society; and the flirt is natural, but alters neither her habits nor her manners. Then society, never very logical at the best, becomes angry. She sees her finest boys being tortured, and turned away from the serious business of their life, and altogether made fools of, by this little woman with the languishing eyes and the shapely mouth. Eldest sons as well as younger sons are the prey of the flirt; and more sedate young women, whom it would be highly advantageous for these boys to marry, sit unsolicited and alone. Society begins to call the flirt names. She regards the tiny woman (nearly all girls who are flirts by nature are small in person) with the virtuous indignation of a disappointed mother. She thinks it a monstrous thing that the dangerous little creature should be tolerated; and she is amazed to see the attentions paid to her by the men. Hence the name of flirt has become one of dire opprobrium. Out of mere self-defense society has been forced to excommunicate this subtle enemy. Flirtation is the secret poison which, introduced into the social body, disarranges its functions, upsets its equilibrium, and tends to produce decay and death. For it is the business of society to get people to marry. All its institutions have, more or less openly, that end in view. What are its balls, parties, picnics, and so forth, but so many opportunities for love-making and consequent match-forming? They are as much ruled by one ultimate aim as are the rustic games of villages, which are essentially so many ingenious devices for allowing young people to kiss each other. Now, flirtation enters this pretty scheme as the serpent entered Paradise. It is the one foreign element. It overturns all the nice calculations of prospective mothers-in-law. It defeats the prospects of many a very worthy and honest girl. It turns the head and empties the pocket of many a very tolerable young gentleman. Sometimes it occasions a suicide. Need we wonder that society regards this thing with horror? Unfortunately, however, society refuses to recognize the distinction between flirtation and the flirt. Flirtation may be—nay, is—bad enough; but if the flirt only acts in consonance with the unavoidable impulses of her silly little nature, how is she to be blamed? We shut the leper out beyond the gates, or we lock him up in a hospital; but we are not moved by any ill-will toward him. Why should we be angry with this gentle creature of nineteen, who can not help looking at you with her big eyes in a peculiar way; who can not help writing in an ingeniously suggestive manner; who sucked in a tendency to flirtation with her mother's milk? As yet, we have no hospital for the cure for flirtation in which we might shut up this fascinating invalid. Flirtation-doctors have not yet arisen; and while we take no precautions to prevent or cure the disease, we console ourselves by abusing and vilifying the persons afflicted. Such treatment does not accord very well with our generally professed notions of benevolence and mutual sympathy. It may be more or less satisfactory to ourselves, but it is not very logical.

If, in this matter, society must direct its rage against some one, that scape-goat should not be the flirt natural, but the flirt artistic. The one is the victim of a poison running through her veins; the other is a skillful elaborator of this poison, using it as a charm to produce all kinds of devilment and sorcery. The flirt natural is an unfortunate; the flirt artistic is a criminal. One may forgive a girl who owes to the chemic action of her blood a disposition for indefinitely making love to every body; but she who simulates the symptoms of this ailment in order to procure for herself a passing amusement removes herself into another class. The flirt natural is not nearly so dangerous as her artistic sister. The former is very likely to bring her career to a close by suddenly marrying, and then her husband, acting as keeper, prevents her committing ravages upon society to any great extent. But the flirt artistic is not caught by any of these sudden gusts of passion. She is too cool, self-collected, self-conscious. She does not flirt because she can not help it; she chooses flirtation as her favorite pastime, and prepares herself for it. Mr. Briggs, going out fishing with a splendid assortment of rods, gaffs, landing-nets, hooks, feathers, lines, reels, and what not, is but a feeble representative of the artistic flirt, when she enters a room clothed in æsthetic armor. She bristles with weapons. She can throw pointed knives with the precision of a Chinese juggler. Where the flirt natural draws out her forces so clumsily as sometimes to make her an object of ridicule in the eyes of the person attacked the flirt artistic manipulates them with the skill and accuracy of a general. She knows how they will best tell; she is further acquainted with her enemy's weak points. The natural flirt, prompted by her innocence, shows her hand too much. Making love to a widower she will get into rhapsodies over the beauty and angelic temper of as plain and pestilent a lot of little brats as ever tormented a visitor. She will grossly flatter to his face a cold-blooded author who is studying her for "material;" or she will pretend to be hurt by the negligence of a man who, instead of thinking any thing about her, is pondering over some railway-bridge he is building, or the price of some yacht he wishes to purchase. A woman who understands the true art of flirtation never commits such blunders. She knows, in the first place, that the easiest way to pique men into attention is by the display of indifference to them—a display, however, which must not be so overdone as to be apparent. She knows that men like to seek, not to be sought; and her object is to make herself, not worth the seeking, but seekable. That is to say, she does not care so much to possess that which men most love as to possess that which will provoke most men into fancying they love her. It is amusement she wishes; and she does not care to have the pastime grow too serious. Then there is the chance of exposure, scandal, and other unpleasantness. She prefers to make life agreeable to herself by reaping the gentle flatteries men bestow on the women who most attract them. The possession of beautiful eyes is only valuable to a woman if other people recognize their beauty; and the great art of flirtation is the securing of this attention by the skillful bringing out of the flirt's best points. The flirt's strongest weapon is undoubtedly her eyes. The eyes can utter so much without compromising their owner. They never blunder; they never shock unexpected prejudices; they never say any thing rude, or hasty, or injudicious. However great a woman's cleverness may be there is always a chance of her misrepresenting herself in a letter; however accomplished a talker she is she is always apt, especially in the subtleties of flirtation, to commit herself. But the eyes are never chargeable with inconsistency. They may be grossly inconsistent, they may make love to a man one moment and laugh in his face the next; but the victim of their inconsistency dare not complain. He can not prove his case against so intangible an enemy. It is this which makes the flirt's eyes so powerful and so dangerous. Her manner is also a strong weapon. Natural graces of form and feature she knows how to cultivate to the best advantage as well as other women; but in the acquired grace of her manner she has one of the principal instruments of her pet amusement. Other women may have as fine a neck, as pretty wrists, as delicate hands; but the artistic flirt knows how to make these speak the occult language in which she converses with her admirers. And it is to be noted that the woman who definitely chooses flirtation for her chief pastime, and who devotes herself to it with all the energy of which she is capable, has generally plenty of admirers and few lovers. The natural flirt, who flirts because her sympathetic and foolish little heart delights to bask in the sunshine of sham love-making, is far more likely to win the adoration of a real lover than the woman who treats flirtation as a science. The former may herself fall in love, if only out of a weak sympathy with a strong passion; the latter, loving a free life full of amusement, will not allow herself to be guilty of any such indiscretion, and takes care to stifle the premonitory tendency to it. A woman who is not swayed by any self-conscious theory, and who makes love to every body merely because making love comes naturally to her, is quite likely to be led, also naturally, into making love to some one in particular. Then comes the crisis of marriage, the cares of children and domestic duties, and the ceaseless battles with recalcitrant servants, to drive the quicksilver of flirtation out of her blood and transform her into an affectionate, motherly, and pleasant little woman. The artistic flirt is seldom captured and tamed in this way. Sometimes she becomes the victim of a grand passion; and gives her former admirers their revenge by committing some prodigious act of folly; but more frequently she amuses herself with sham love-making until real love-making is no longer possible to her, and she subsides into the comfortable quiet of elderly single life.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

A YOUNG LADY.—The great principle of all courtesy is to yield the advantage to the guest or stranger. Let this, therefore, be your guide, and adhere to no absolute law of precedence. If by letting your "guest step on first he or she would not know which way to turn" then take the lead yourself, for it is courtesy to save your guest every inconvenience or embarrassment.

In going down stairs the lady precedes the gentleman if there is not sufficient width for the two side by side. In going up stairs the same general rule holds good, unless crinolines or short skirts should suggest the propriety of an exception.

SIR.—While children and subordinates should never fall to say "Sir" or "Ma'am" to their elders or superiors in station, it is not considered good-breeding for equals, unless their relations are of the most formal or ceremonious kind, to repeat these titles of courtesy. The bluntness of "yes" or "no" can be avoided by the addition of "indeed," "truly," or any other phrase softer without the use of the "Sir" or "Ma'am."

INQUIRER.—Two, three, four, or more persons can play at Martelle, according to the number of balls provided. The price of Martelle is $15; of Planchette, from $1.50 to $3; and of Improved Croquet, from $16 to $20. Messrs. Kirby & Co., of New York, are the inventors of Planchette and Improved Croquet. By using only two colors, and designating the turn of the players by the number of stripes on the balls and mallets, the latter system greatly simplifies croquet.

GERTRUDE.—Trim your steel-colored silk with a cord fringe four inches wide of the same shade as the dress. Make a heading of a fold of the silk, cut bias, an inch wide, loose at the edges, and sewed on with a thick piping in the centre. We can not say certainly what will be the prevailing style in September. We anticipate that short dresses and paniers will still prevail, with scarf-shaped wrappings and mantles.

X. Y. Z.—The smell of a smouldering wick of a tallow-candle is hurtful, notwithstanding what you may have heard to the contrary. A case is recorded of destruction to life from holding such a wick under the nose of a sleeping boy.

Mrs. H. L.—The law authorizes the arrest of persons for certain frauds not matters for criminal prosecution, but a woman can not be arrested except for willful injury to person, character, or property.

A. Y. L.—If your "gentleman acquaintance" is an intimate friend you may recognize him at any distance or height; if not, it is "not the thing to see him across the street or up at a window."

Mrs. CHURCH.—We refer you to the answer given to "Yearly Subscriber," in Bazar No. 40, for the information you desire about morning dresses. Make the sleeves in the manner described in the "New York Fashions" of Bazar No. 41—a full coat-sleeve gathered into a broad starched cuff. In the same article you will learn that short gored skirts and loose saques are in vogue for muslin morning dresses. We gave a pattern of a kitchen apron in No. 84 of Harper's Bazar, which combines utility and beauty. We do not consider mud-turtles a commendable article of food.

HELEN LITTLE.—Java canvas is sold here at $2.50 a yard. We can not make purchases for our correspondents.

CHARLES.—The spelling Phyllipena would be correct if derived, as some think, from Phyllis, the daughter of a King of Thrace. Her betrothed took a journey, and not returning at the promised time Phyllis died of grief, and was changed, according to one tradition, into an almond-tree. Young lovers in consequence exchanged almond kernels in remembrance of her devoted love. Hence the Phyllis, to which is added the Latin pena, signifying sometimes "torment" or "regret." The whole word Phyllipena would thus signify Regret for Phyllis. There are some who spell the word Philopena, and derive it from a Greek word signifying "love" and a Latin one meaning "punishment." The term would thus mean "love of punishment," implying that those who play at this game of courtesy would like to pay the forfeit.

JANETTE.—Hypatia was a lady who flourished in the early age of Christianity, celebrated for her learning, beauty, and virtue; her father was Leon the philosopher of Alexandria, where she was born. She was regarded as the prodigy of her age and the glory of her sex, and is enrolled among the philosophers famous in history. She had acquired all the learning of the period, including the art of oratory, and became the wonder of the populace and the admiration of the learned. Her learning and her charms exercised also a strong political influence, and in a tumult at Alexandria between the Jews and Christians she was slain with the most inhuman cruelty, and her remains were consumed to ashes. Charles Kingsley made Hypatia the heroine of one of his novels.

PHILOLOGIST.—Fair used in the sense of genuine, as in the phrases "Fair dollar," that is to say, not a counterfeit one, "Fair horse," not a wooden imitation, or the picture of one, is an Americanism, chiefly employed by young New Yorkers. Clever is now being generally used in the United States by the cultivated according to its old English meaning of able, and not as amiable or good-natured, which was once the common acceptance of the word in America.

Mrs. M. S. C.—You will find directions for making a long gored skirt in the answer to Mrs. D. L. Thompson, in Harper's Bazar, No. 41. It is quite impossible for us to give such details as you require by private letter.

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly-invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by News-dealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

"AMONG THIEVES."

I.

BEAUTIFUL thieves!
When summer breezes lift the heavy leaves,
Brunette, châtaïne, and blonde,
With eyes and lips that sweetly correspond,
Some gay, some sad, some petite, and some tall,
But robbers all—
From noon serene till rises evening's star
How prettily they vex
Our weaker sex,
When they sell nothings at a gay Bazar.

II.

Unscrupulous thieves!
Each ruddy little mouth sweet nonsense weaves:
Charming sweet are they
To any one who throws his gold away,
Buys purses, garters, cushions, babies' shoes,
Whate'er you choose.
The pretty rogues full of gay witcheries are;
Not quite so kind are they
On the next day,
If you should call just after the Bazar.

III.

Oh sweet young thieves!
Your merry game nor injures nor deceives.
We throw our V's away
For toys for which a dime would overpay,
But with those self-same dollars do we buy
Glance of an eye,
Flushed cheek and musical laughter, costlier far
Than aught that Fate can give
To men that live
Till Aphrodite sings at a Bazar.

FACETIÆ.

TRUE IN ONE SENSE.—A writer may be said to be more free than a king, inasmuch as he can "choose his own subjects."

When is a scheme like the third of a yard?—When it's a-foot.

A MOTHER'S LAMENT.—A mother, not long since, was lamenting the loss of a child (one of a family of eight). "Because," she said, "there was just enough for a cotillion, and they did dance so prettily."

An ingenious quack is trying to prove that Absalom must have used some of his "restorative," else he could not have had such long hair.

AN IMPERFECT ANGEL.—One of the younger members of the French Legation at Washington is noted for his gallant and exquisite compliments. A few evenings since, at a "German" at Governor M.'s, he was introduced to a witty lady who had an ugly flat nose. The polite Frenchman discreetly complimented her on her dancing, to which she archly replied, "Ah! I have heard you are a flatterer, but you can not find it in your heart to compliment me on my personal beauty, so you praise my dancing." "Madame," was the reply, with a Parisian bow, "you are an angel from heaven, but you fell upon your nose."

A CLOSE GAME—Courting.

WOMAN'S WORD-BOOK.

Tune.—Music's argument.

Throttle.—Your writing and mine—especially yours.

Tyrant.—Sometimes Papa, sometimes Mamma, sometimes Baby—but very much Mamma.

Understanding.—What is beneath a woman's sole to discuss.

Undertaker.—Black Stick in waiting—for all of us.

Variations, mus.—Assault and battery on a favorite air.

Vice.—What women of the epoch assume, though they have it not.

Victory.—The happy possessor of a car woman is always wanting to drive.

Vine.—Wine in the wood.

Virtue.—A vice when made too prominent.

Voice.—What makes a nightingale of Mrs. Jay in her J's ears, and voice versa.

Waist.—A moveable feast offered by fashion to sight.

War.—Pluto's recruiting sergeant.

Water.—The lover's register.

Wedding-party.—The crowd at an execution.

Whim.—A fly that buzzes in the empty chamber of the brain.

Widow.—An old soldier on half-pay—ready to join at a moment's notice.

Wife.—A crown of glory to her husband—or a crown of thorns.

Will.—In her favor is as good as the deed.

Wine.—the juice to pay.

Wit.—The truffle of conversation.

Woman.—The first who added woe to man.

Youth.—The only age which feels too young.

Zoo.—A place of worship for monkeys.

VICTIMS OF THE FAIR—"AMONG THIEVES."

THE FASHIONS.—The ladies go to such lengths now in dress, that their trains are as extensive as excursion trains. Even the short walking-dress, or robe courte is a little above two feet.

THE UNIVERSAL METRIC SYSTEM.—One measure in which all civilized nations agree—The church-yard.

QUERY FOR METEOROLOGISTS.—When a storm has been brewing in the air, has the downfall ever been known to take the shape of beer?

BLOW HIM UP!—A scientific correspondent writes to us that he sees in the newspapers "Borwick's Baking Powder," and wishes to say that if he is, he is doing a very dangerous thing, and that there's safe to be an explosion.

MATRIMONIAL.—A gentleman, endowed with a great deal of brass, desires to meet with a lady possessing a corresponding amount of tin.

WHO'S AFRAID?—A little three-year-old was in the habit of helping himself to crackers in the pantry—lifting the tin lid and plunging his hand into the stone jar for them. One day, after listening to stories about rats, he went after a cracker, and hearing some noise that he imagined was made by the rats, he rushed back to the parlor, and with flushed face said, "Muzzer, I ain't afraid of wats, but I see so tired I couldn't lift the lid."

PRECIOUS (S)TONES.—Lovers' vows!

A long-headed man is never head-long.

"Little boys should be seen and not heard," as young Precocity coolly remarked to his teacher when he could not say his lesson.

WEDDING BREAKFASTS.

OF all ceremonies popular among women there is none more deservedly so than that of a wedding. It unites in one form, and crowds into a short space of time, the various elements which go to make up a woman's range of enjoyment. Joy, sorrow, triumph, and the participation in it, Champagne, church-going, and new dresses make up such an ensemble as may well appeal to every woman who has not grown old in vinegary ways. To undergo so many phases successively is much, but to concentrate them all into two or three hours is to obtain the quintessence of enjoyment, to dissolve—as Mr. Swinburne might put it—the pearl of pleasure in the wine of life and quaff it at a draught.

The wedding breakfast forms decidedly the most enjoyable point of the whole proceeding. It comprises a tangible, appreciable

Watch, or a vision
Between a sleep and a sleep;

for the church business is too initiative a part of the ceremony and too dimly religious to convey the sense of reality, and at the parting stage again dreaminess supervenes: it is all a medley of kisses, tears, fictitious hilarity, and the rumble of carriage-wheels. When the bridegroom walks down the aisle to receive his fiancée, and the bridesmaids come fluttering in, a diaphanous mist of prettiness, the whole party are mere somnambulists. Church, parson, choir, congregation, and chief actors simply constitute a dream; nothing is substantial to the principal actors. So, also, when the nouveaux mariés drive away on the 'moon. But the breakfast is a fixed point; there is time thereat to appreciate the situation. It is only unreal in a modified degree; a breathing-space is at least afforded, not for reflection, but for observation. There is the victrix and heroine of the spectacle at the head of the table—pleasant, modest, gorgeous of raiment, with a delightful air of self-consciousness overriding her evident desire to appear retiring. There is her companion on her right—conquered as to her, but triumphant as to the rest; with a curious sense upon him that he has reached the goal and terminus of life's journey; that the third volume is completed, the green drop about to descend, and that nothing lies beyond. He will awake to a different experience next week; but meanwhile the ideas of the present moment are intensely enjoyable. There is the gallant Best Man, a gay Lothario, the representative of manly chivalry, the spokesman of his sex and exponent of their devotion to womanhood; with no sense of responsibility on him, but with a powerful sense of physical enjoyment and the appreciation of cold chicken and full bumpers. There are the bride-maids, participants in the triumph of their sex, and with some prophetic fancy concerning their individual triumph at an unknown date. There is the heavy father, rotund of periods, philanthropic and hopeful to the last degree. There is the bride's mother, tearful yet reliant; and sometimes the bridegroom's mother, who years ago lost all proprietorial interest in her son, but who yet is capable of any amount of melancholy foreboding, if called upon to exhibit the same. There are the guests, related and unrelated, joyously sympathetic, but possessing an acute interest in the cold fowl and jellies, not to mention the liquors. Lastly, there are the curates, to whom the morning's experience is familiar, and who have known—alas, that it should be so!—dawns as brilliant end in disastrous noons.

Not to have got married, either personally or vicariously, is certainly not to have lived, from the feminine point of view. We should like to come across an ordinary girl—with the tastes and aspirations common to girlhood—who has never, in some shape or other, attended a wedding, and to ask her whether there was not an aching void somewhere or other in the region of her heart—some hope unfulfilled. We do not say that every unmarried woman has a frantic desire to attain the holy estate. There are crowds of decent, admirable girls who have neither call nor craving for matrimony; and they go quietly on their way in the world, adopt other missions, and make excellent spinster aunts. But what we contend for is that every girl, as a rule, either has, or at some one time has had, a longing to make one at a wedding.

The oratory of a bridal breakfast is not a theme to recapitulate when the table is cleared away and we have all gone home again. Like soda-water, its sparkle is lost if it is tasted after it has stood. It has that unsubstantial character which is of a piece with the artificial circumstances under which it is conceived. The bridegroom really intends at the time to be a very good boy and to live happy ever after, and his asseverations are tempered with no suspicions of the disagreements to be afterward evolved in the days of bills and duns and cold mutton. The Best Man is as loud-protesting and as trusting as his sex ever are before they have made the connubial acquaintance of woman. The rector is beneficent and amiable after the clerical pattern. The heavy father's confidence in the married happiness of the young people has the light of his own experience to guide him; he knows that he himself has had many rows with mother-in-laws, but his speech betrays nothing of this consciousness. Thus it may be said that all the earnest orations are dictated by inexperience, and all the others contain a goodly spice of hypocrisy. But it is best so. Who wants a memento mori at a wedding breakfast? The other knowledge will come in its own appointed time; be it never so late it is always premature. And when the carriage is out of sight, and we have gathered up the old shoes and returned indoors, let us endeavor to retain the remembrance of those two young people as we last saw them. The different knowledge which they will gain of each other a month hence, save in mercenary alliances, has nothing terrible in its reality.

SUMMER DRESSES.

THE SONG OF THE SKIRT.

By WOMAN HOOD.

"And the trail of the woman is over it all."

With fingers scalded and worn,
With wash-board placed aslope,
A woman stood by the steaming tub,
Plying her cake of soap—
Wash! wash! wash!
While the soap-suds spatter and spirt,
And still, with a voice of frenzied pitch,
She sang the "Song of the Skirt."

"Wash! wash! wash!
While I sweat from every pore!
And wash—wash—wash—
Till I fairly flood the floor!
It's oh! to be a slave
Along with the barbarous Turk,
Where woman has never a skirt to wash,
If this is decent work.

"Oh, Men with Sweet-hearts dear!
Oh, Men with Women of kin!
It isn't the linen they're wearing out,
But the linen they're bringing in!
Wash—wash—wash—
While the soap-suds spatter and spirt,
Cleaning at once, with a single wash,
A Crossing as well as a Skirt.

"Oh! but to smell the breath
Of the perfume bottle so sweet—
With the chandelier over my head,
And the 'Brussels' beneath my feet.
For only one short hour
To feel as my lady feels,
Gayly tripping along Broadway
With a yard or more at her heels!"

With fingers scalded and worn,
With wash-board placed aslope,
A woman stood by the steaming tub,
Plying her cake of soap—
Wash! wash! wash!
While the soap-suds spatter and spirt,
And still, with a voice that you wouldn't applaud
(Oh that its tones could reach Miss Maud!),
She sang this "Song of the Skirt."

HARPER'S BAZAR.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 22, 1868.

NERVOUSNESS.

THERE is nothing so difficult to define in words, and yet so thoroughly understood by the sufferer, as that state of misery called nervousness. This is a condition to which men the most robust originally may be reduced by any thing which weakens the brain and other sources of nervous power. Dissipation, excess of wine, spirits, or tobacco, too much work, but oftener too little, and accidental disease of various kinds, are generally the causes of the nervousness of men. The same causes will undoubtedly produce the same effect in women; but their nervousness, though much more frequent than that of men, is generally to be traced to a different source.

For the development of this disorder in man some extraordinary cause seems necessary. In woman, on the contrary, the malady would appear to be almost inherent, so common and ready is its manifestation. Nervousness, though a disease, is, in fact, the normal state of modern women, hardly one of whom can claim the possession of health.

Notwithstanding that nervousness, to a greater or less degree, is almost universal among womankind, it is not in any respect a necessary result of their organization. There is no natural reason why woman should be more afflicted in this respect than man. On the contrary, there seems to be a very good reason why she should not be, for her life exposes her less to the gross debauchery and other excesses which are the common causes of the nervousness of men.

The fact is, however, that women do suffer much more than those of the opposite sex, and the reason is obvious. They are feebler, not by nature but by art; and physical, moral, and intellectual weakness is the great predisposing cause of nervousness. With the notion, carefully inculcated for ages by her master man, for reasons of his own, that she belongs to the weaker sex, woman's education has been conducted in conformity, and care taken that she should never dispute with her lord the claim to power. Her muscles have thus been allowed, by a calculating neglect of exercise, to dwindle away or lose themselves in layers of ineffective fat, and her brain and nerves designedly so enervated and unstrung as to be incapable of acting in harmony with the original strength and independence of her nature. She has been made delicate of flesh and unresisting in mind, that she might be pleasing to the touch and complacent to the humors of her master.

It is not only the faulty physical and intellectual education which has deprived woman of her natural robustness, and thus rendered her nerves weak and morbidly impressible, but her sensibility has been also directly cultivated to a degree of acuteness which is fatal to health. At the earliest period the female child is reminded of its delicacy, and prevented from doing a thousand things which are allowed to a brother, on the ground that they are wrong for the one though right for the other. Emotional indulgence is encouraged in the girl while rebuked in the boy. Fear of the dark, fright at a mouse, a sudden noise, or any harmless thing is deemed becoming in the former, while it is considered disgraceful in the latter. Tears are supposed to adorn the face of the future woman, while they are thought stains upon that of the embryo man. The mother can never get over the idea that she and her daughter belong to a weaker sex, and the female propriety she inculcates is a feebleness of which only debility is capable and strength would be ashamed. An excessively acute sensibility is thus engendered in woman from the earliest age, and she becomes an easy victim of nervousness or nervous diseases, the horrors of which are thus described by an intelligent female writer:—"There are many of these affections which take on a definite form, producing violent pain in a particular spot, or some special local derangement; but the majority assume the most protean forms, simulating all manner of organic diseases, but without producing any perceptible organic change. There is no kind of malady which the nervous person will not imagine herself to have—scarcely any which the physician may not be induced to suspect, from the presence of diagnostic symptoms, till the non-appearance of certain results proves that it is only nervous. But is the suffering any the less real because the victim of nervous disease lives on and the body preserves to some extent its integrity? All the nameless horrors and the tortures of morbid sensation are terrible realities to the sufferer; and when, after trying in vain to obtain relief from doctor after doctor, and resorting to every new system or to every quack till the sympathy of friends is exhausted and hope is gone, she finds nothing left but to endure existence till she dies, it is a mockery to tell her she is only nervous."

Such a frightful condition of mind and body it is unquestionably better to avoid by the certain preventives of the early formation of good habits and a rational education, than deliberately to incur with the probability of its settling into incurable disease. If parents could get rid of the notion that their daughters necessarily belong to a weaker sex, and bring them up with the robustness of their sturdy sons, our women would have less reason to complain of the wretchedness of nervousness.

IDEAS OF RESPECTABILITY.

IN a country like our own, where there are no class distinctions recognized by law, it is amusing to observe the fanciful contrivances resorted to for the separation of man—and woman—kind into various ranks, or sets. In our large commercial cities the social grade of a family is generally established by the occupation of the individual upon whom it is dependent for its daily bread. Thus banker, ship-owner, commission-merchant, lawyer, importer, dry-goods man, grocer, tailor, and shoemaker, not only indicate so many different trades and professions, but an equal number of degrees on the social scale.

It is curious to note the frivolous basis upon which some of our social pretenders found their claims to distinction. Mrs. A. will not visit Mrs. B. for Mr. A. is an importer of rags, and Mr. B. being a paper dealer, is only a vender of them in the manufactured state. The raw material seems to be a patent of nobility, and is sure to confer unequivocal rank upon every woman whose husband has the good fortune to deal in it. No one hesitates to give to the dame of the wool-dealer social precedence over the tailor's wife. Calico yields the way at once to Raw Cotton, and Pig-Iron turns up its nose, as it is undoubtedly should, at Tenpenny Nails. Wholesale has an immensely preponderating weight over Retail, and Mrs. Gross naturally gives the cold shoulder to Miss Singlestick. Banking is unquestionably the genteel thing; and Mrs. Bullion is, of course, respectability personified. Brokerage is somewhat equivocal, and Mrs. Tenpercent only smuggles herself into the best society under the pretense that Mr. Tenpercent is a banker. Commission Merchant, Importer, and Jobber are doubtless very good friends down town, but their wives up town are forever incompatible.

Money will undoubtedly cover a multitude of sins of retailing, tailoring, and shoemaking; but it must be of a very large amount to bring the possessor to the highest degree of social rank. Unless the fortune is enormous the aspirant for a place in fashionable society must content himself to be represented by a descendant.

Of course nothing can be more absurd than these various social distinctions, or arbitrary trade-marks as they may be called. All sensible people need but hear to laugh at such Ideas of Respectability.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

Dining upon Herbs.

MY DEAR CONSTANTIA,—Mr. Peter Paul Pry and I have been upon a little excursion of recreation from the city, not of many thousand miles, and yet quite far away. Indeed, as we awoke last Sunday morning, and looked around us and out of the window, we agreed that nothing is more illusive than distance. If you choose to go in one direction from the city you seem never to escape it, but to carry it with you in its most subtle and effective form. If you go in another you cast it off immediately and entirely. This time we went across the Hudson River into the Jerseys. I do not say whether we stopped upon the shores of the Hackensack or the Raritan—whether we saw the sea, or climbed among the hills at Morristown. Yet I will confess that no neighborhood of New York ever seems to me such absolute fairy-land as the western slope of the Palisades, which you can not by any possibility behold until you have scaled those perpendicular cliffs, unless you approach from the sunset, or follow up the placid river from the Newark Meadows. I remember that Mr. Sparrowgrass tells somewhere a legend of treasure hidden under the Palisades. And why not, since he used to live opposite, and must have been familiar with their enchantments?

Think of your friends then, dear Constantia, as over beyond the Palisades, in some still inaccessible land—two hours away—awaking on a warm Sunday morning, not to the matins of the milkman, but of the thrush and the bobolink, and descending refreshed to the plain, rustic breakfast-table. Yet that is a stroke of fairy which I can not advise you to anticipate at every country inn. You must never forget, my dear Constantia, that the poetic view of country life proceeds from citizens, not from countrymen. The idyls and the eclogues are written in town. The sailor does not see the beauty of the ship in which he sails. And the plow-boy tugging at his task, sweating along the dusty rows of potatoes which he is hoeing, or melting in the pitiless midsummer noon as he mows, does not perceive the romance of rural life, and would willingly risk his rustic virtue in "the sweet security of streets." Perhaps to the full and true enjoyment of the country—or to its purely poetic enjoyment, a little strangeness is necessary. But it needed no want of familiarity with clean linen and white bread to appreciate what we found on the morning of which I am speaking; and as we sat at table we heard that the new minister of the village was to begin his duties that very day. Mr. Pry, with his usual laudable disposition, proposed that we should "go to meeting;" and when presently the little bell rang out modestly, and the wagons began to roll lazily in from the neighboring country, we walked gravely forth and entered the church.

It was a very different spectacle from that which Mr. Pry and I sometimes contemplate in the city. The Gothic fashion in our church architecture is very sombre and unsatisfactory; and I wonder no committee or society have yet been heroic enough to build a light, graceful, spacious, and sunny church of the Roman or Italian style. Old St. George's, in Beekman Street, was a poor specimen of this style—a simple, open building, full of air and light and cheerful suggestion—but that has been finally knocked to pieces this summer. Mr. Parton has described the usual Gothic Protestant church with a great deal of vividness and fidelity; and as we see it in the city of New York it does seem to me to interpose a great many obstacles to Christian's progress to the other city. The poor pilgrim seems to be painfully conscious of his clothes, so to speak. As you look around the elaborate but insufficient and unimposing structure, the miniature or Lilliputian cathedral, you feel that he is nervously anxious that his religion shall present a highly respectable appearance; and that his view, his sect, shall hold its own with that of Peter Phari-see or Samuel Sadducee. But, at least, it is a genuine appearance. The building is neither tinsel nor tawdry, like so many of the Romish churches—which are both the most magnificent and the meanest in the world. But here, in fairy-land—I mean in the Jerseys—the little church was simple and very plain; the windows were wide open, and, as the congregation assembled, I heard the whistling of the birds and the dry zee-ing of the locust. Indeed, this music was the only voluntary.

Now, my dear Constantia, the text of the young minister suggested to me a different sermon from that he preached, although it was a capital and practical lesson that he drew. Indeed, a good text is like a good apple-tree: it bears an amazing quantity of fruit. You may eat it raw, or make it into sauce, or a pudding, or a pie. You may bake it, or roast it, or, indeed, fry it. You may mix it into fritters, or dry it. I think our friends of the clergy are a little apt to dry it. But the young divine of whom I speak roasted it for us in a good, homely way. "Better," said he, not with a nasal singsong but with an air of conviction—"better is a dinner of herbs, and content therewith, than a stalled ox"—and so on. The young man enlarged upon the virtue of contentment. He spoke with sincerity, I think; but when you hear the praises of the cardinal virtues you find yourself asking whether it is the sincerity of admiration and desire, merely, or the warmth of actual experience.

I listened with attention and edification. I was not seriously diverted from the good young pastor even by the extremely studious and unrelenting gaze of curiosity which was directed at Mr. Pry and me by an evidently unmarried person of the other sex who must have had about fifty-five years, and, I humbly trust, content therewith. My dear Constantia, was it cynicism, or unkindness, or worldliness—or was it a perfectly fair and proper curiosity that made me wonder as I listened whether our young teacher were in possession of the virtue he extolled? If he ever climbs the heights above the river, and looks toward the city, do its bells ring to him alluringly, "Turn again, turn again?" He has his quiet little country parish; his small circle of rural interests; his gossip about the crops and the season; Squire Thompson's heifer, and Widow Jenkins's old Morgan mare. He has his few books; his little garden; his cure of souls: now a wedding, then a funeral. He has behind him the dreams of his youth, the vague hope, the illimitable ambition. He has indeed his dinner of herbs—has he content therewith? Would he not prefer the stalled ox of a city parish—with all its risks and consequences?

It seemed to me that he reasoned with a kind of desperation. He drew the picture of the contented man; but what was he? He was the individual whose desires are satisfied. It was an ideal portrait, and I think he felt it to be so. The old line that "Man never is but always to be blest," contains the wisdom of the subject. We must be content not to be contented. I could look from my seat out of the window, and I saw the oxen calmly grazing in the field. There, I said, is contentment—but they are oxen. Yet this was not at all the sermon suggested to me by the text, faithfully as I listened. The dinner of herbs and content therewith rather means the essential value and importance of little things; little words, if you please, little acts; little courtesies. Better the kind greeting of the humblest man than the supercilious nod of a stalled ox of a king. Better a hearty wish, a crust of bread given in sympathetic charity, than the most magnificently ostentatious alms. Or, refining it still further, it is the charm of merely pleasant words and pleasant ways.

On one of these tremendously torrid days I was dripping gently along a side street, and I saw a sign neatly painted, "Cool Iced Beer." Now, I am not Mr. Parton's coming man, and I paused a moment, surveyed the premises, and went in. Every thing was very plain, but very neat. The sign told the truth; and a clean young man brought me a glass of cold beer. I do not defend the beer, if you press me—I simply plead that I am the going man, almost gone. But better than the beer were the words "cool iced beer." It was, indeed, fair to presume that iced beer was cool; but the very words "iced and cool" were delicious in that temperature; and the man who so felicitously displayed them was fitly rewarded by the additional glasses of beer which they sold.

Or, again, in the omnibus as I was trundling up town in the stifling agony of one of those dreadful afternoons, there was a poor young woman carrying a hideous basket full of something or other. It was intolerably heavy, and I saw the poor girl actually panting upon the curbstone as we came up. I knew, moreover, she had no money to spare for her passage, but that she must pay it or sink on the street. The omnibus was full—crowded. Everybody wished everybody else out of it. Everybody's elbows transfixed his neighbor. Everybody's collar was prostrate, and an intense expression of "pshaw!" was imprinted upon everybody's reeking countenance. The omnibus stopped, and the weary young woman with the enormous basket appeared at the door. There was a universal gasp of horror. But suddenly I heard a pleasant voice saying: "Here, my dear, sit here!"

I turned and beheld old Carbuncle the mill-ionaire. He smiled, and squeezed, and said to his neighbor, "We must make room here!" And his neighbor was compelled to make room, and the girl came in, doing as well as she could with her load. Old Carbuncle took it as she approached, and rested the weight of it upon his knees, so that if any body had complaints to make, he might complain of him. Then he said to the young woman:

"My dear, this is a very heavy load for a very hot day."

She said something which nobody could hear, and the old gentleman did not insist upon conversation; but when she came to her stopping-place he had paid for her passage, and he handed her basket out at the door, and the young woman disappeared. I am very sure that she was happier for that little service than if he had given her ten dollars with a lofty air of condescension. It was a dinner of herbs, and content therewith, which she found infinitely preferable to a possible stalled ox.

Now very few of us could give a great many tired young women a ten-dollar bill, as Mr. Car-buncle can, but there is nobody in town who can not help a poor girl with her basket, and relieve her mind as well as her muscles by taking upon himself the burden of his neighbors' indignation about nothing. There is nobody so poor that he can not spread this dinner of herbs for every wayfarer. And, oh, Constantia! if all of us did it, what a hospitable and happy world this would be!

I believe I have dropped a hint or two upon this very subject before; but the sermon can not be too often repeated. What a fearful amount of friction there is in the ordinary journey of life! What occasions it? Not surely the contest with wild beasts at Ephesus, for very few of us travel by the Ephesus road. It certainly is not the necessity of fighting with lions, for there are very few lions in any body's path. The difficulty is in our shoes. It is the little peg and the little pebble. We despise them; we won't stop for any such ridiculous thing. So we go striding on, wounded at every step, until there is a blister, a fester, a sore. We won't dine at all except upon stalled oxen, and therefore we starve. But, dear brethren—I would say if I were that young Jersey preacher—take the pegs out of your shoes, and you can jump over the lions. Dine every day upon herbs, and you will not care for the ox.

You, my dear Constantia, are soon to be married. I hail the day; and as for Charles Henry, I merely think that no man is worthy. You have never kept house, but I know what your method will be. You will not suppose that your domestics are all saints in disguise. You will not expect them to do all their work perfectly when some of us in the parlor are sometimes not absolutely perfect in our work. You will help them by pleasant little hints; you will show them that you are interested in them not merely to grind out a certain quantity of work for your own interest, but interested in them as human beings. If any thing will excite a response upon their part it will be this. If they do well, you will praise them; if they do ill, you will show them in what way, and with a patience that will persuade them to try to do better. This untiring, incessant attention to the little things in your housekeeping, my dear Constantia, is the dinner of herbs with which is content. But the great events, the magnificent parties, at which you and Charles Henry will entertain the President and his Cabinet—the Chinese Embassy of the future, or Alderman and Mrs. M'Patrick O'Bludgeon—these are the stalled oxen: infrequent, exceptional. And as for Biddy, do you not feel as sure as I do that your constant, kind consideration in little things, in little words, in little ways, costing you not a penny, will be incomparably more grateful and a hundredfold more valued than the handsome new dress which you will give her formally and coldly at Christmas? That gingham gown is the stalled ox; but the pleasant tone is the dinner of herbs and content therewith.

Your friend—and preacher!
AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

SUMMER STYLES FOR BOYS.

THE sailor costume is admired for boys of from four to seven years. A short blouse of navy-blue cloth, belted in at the waist, is cut low at the throat, with a linen collar, pointed on the shoulders. The coat-sleeves have a square cuff, bound with braid. Loose trousers of white duck, and patent-leather boots with blue tops, or regular pantaloons reaching to the ankle, with white stockings and low patent-leather slippers. Sailor hat of white straw, with long blue streamers, completes the costume.

White piqué and linen duck are favorite materials for boys' summer wear. The jackets are short, rounding in front, with a pocket on the left breast. The trousers, buttoned to the belt of the under waist, have but little fullness about the hips, and are shaped to fit the knee. Bound with white braid, and trimmed with a narrower braid with feathered edge, such suits are sold for $10. Mixed black and white braid, or blue and white, are much used for trimming. For a boy just beginning to wear trousers a short cut-away jacket of buff piqué is open on the hips, and bound with scarlet galoon. A row of scarlet soutache, put on in scallops, follows the outline of the garment. Fancy pockets, turned-over collar, and chevrons on the sleeves. Tucked and ruffled habit-shirt. Full Zouave trousers, buckled at the knee. Straw cap, with visor. Buff boots.

Blouses of linen duck are made shorter than last season, and in the Bismarck shape, buttoning diagonally from right to left. With trousers nearly tight-fitting, the suit is furnished for $12. The hat and gaiters are also made of duck.

For everyday wear suits of brown linen are cut by a tailor, and neatly made, for $4. For small boys these have full waists, gathered into a pointed belt, with loose trousers, trimmed with white linen braid. The regular suit of jacket, vest, and pantaloons is chosen for larger boys. Buff Spanish linen looks more dressy than the brown. A very good quality is bought for forty cents a yard. The Garibaldi waist and trousers are trimmed with white figured braid, sold at about 75 cents for a piece of twelve yards. Suits of this kind are made at home at a trifling expense.

For cool mornings in the country light gray and chocolate-colored Cheviots are made in either fashion described. Delicate children at the sea-side wear suits of white Cheviot, like twilled flannel, for full-dress occasions. Gray Cheviot is prettily trimmed with blue. The trousers reach to the knee, disclosing the bare limb above the short hose and blue gaiters. The blouse is low at the throat, with a turned-over collar of the material, with linen collar and cravat of narrow ribbon.

White linen, with hair-line stripes of color, is made into habit-shirts and Garibaldi waists, without fullness on the shoulders, and gathered into a pointed belt. The buttons that fasten the pants to the waist should always be concealed. The new Lancaster cambrics, in small stripes of black, blue, or scarlet on white, are suitable for everyday shirts. They have French finish, and are sold at from eighteen to twenty-five cents a yard.

Boys of nine years old and over wear short Cheviot sacks of skeleton make—that is, without lining—and close-fitting pantaloons. Brown linen and cassimere for ordinary use are made in the same style. Black cloth jackets, with fancy shirt bosoms and white duck pants, are chosen for better dress. Vests should be avoided for boys as long as possible, as nothing gives them such an old-fashioned appearance. Boys of twelve wear short frock-coats, made like their fathers', with low rolling collars faced with silk. Dark blue and plum-colored tricot is the favorite cloth. Vest and pants of light cassimere, or of white duck. Shirts for youths just entering their teens should be fastened behind, leaving the pleated front without the opening that is so liable to be too widely open. Small screw studs of Roman gold are the most suitable ornaments.

The sailor hat is the shape most in favor for small boys. It is worn in black oil-cloth by both girls and boys. Another stylish hat has a round crown, with brim turned up all around. This is shown in the white split-straw, with brown ribbon band and binding, and in brown straw. Rough straws, that have a coarse look, black or brown, mixed with white, are worn by large boys.

Neck-ties of grenadine, in gay stripes, with white and thick striped ribbons, give an air of style, and relieve suits of sombre color.

GIRLS' SUMMER DRESSES.

White, buff, and blue are the prevailing colors for children's dresses. Entire suits of each are made for the little folks with goffered frills, flounces, fichus, and sashes, very much after the fashion of those worn by their elder sisters who have reached the dignity of young ladyhood. White muslin, pure and simple, is the dress of the season for ladies, and we find it repeated in miniature for the little mimics who never look so well in any thing else.

A dress worn by girls of from five to ten years at the summer hotels is of white nansook, with body and skirt in one, confined at the waist by a ruffled belt with ends. The corsage buttons behind. A standing ruffle at the throat is edged with Valenciennes, or if the neck is short a turned-down collar. The skirt is trimmed with two narrow ruffles. Crimped ruffles are prettier than fluted ones for small children. Skirts for girls from eight to twelve reach to the ankle. Younger girls wear them just below the knee. With this dress the hat of muslin is puffed over the crown, with a quilling edged with lace on the drooping brim. Bows of ribbon or a wreath of wild flowers around the crown.

For afternoon and full dress thinnest muslins over colored silk slips are made up in this way, with Valenciennes trimmings and ribbon sashes. A second skirt, very full and puffed in the back, gives the panier appearance. Dotted and sprigged muslins, of fine ground with raised work like embroidery, are trimmed with ruffles of plain Swiss.

Piqué is the most serviceable goods for children. The corded pattern is in favor, but will not wear well, as it splits between the cords. The bird's-eye figure is more desirable. A good quality is sold at seventy-five cents a yard. Box-pleated ruffles of nansook overcast at the edge is the prettiest trimming, and newer than braiding.

The Scotch ginghams, at a dollar a yard, are worth the money. They are quite as pretty as India silks, in small checks and stripes, are a yard wide, fine and strong. French gingham, labeled sea-side gingham, is not so durable as the Scotch goods, and is only three shillings a yard. The American cambrics, at twenty-five cents, can scarcely be distinguished from the French at forty. Striped linen, thick and serviceable, and the low-priced buff linen make up the list of materials for girls' ordinary use.

A sea-side dress for a girl of twelve is of blue and white striped goats'-hair, made princesse fashion, with ribbon bretelles tied at the shoulder with a bow and ends. An over-skirt of solid blue silk, long in front, to within a quarter of a yard of the bottom of the striped skirt, is rounded at the sides and back to within three-eighths of a yard of the belt. A bow and sash ends behind. Buff gloves and boots. An Italian straw toquet, turned up on one side, with streamers of blue ribbon behind. Another buff and blue toilette is more conspicuous. The under-dress is blue and white checked India silk, with solid blue ruffles pinked at the edges. A peasant's waist and tunic of buff pongee is trimmed with fringe on the scalloped edge.

An elaborate dress for evening, for a child of nine years, is made entirely of Valenciennes insertion and appliqué embroidery over rose-colored silk. The lace dress alone costs, at one of the furnishing houses, $150. A simpler dress is of blue silk, ruffled on the waist and skirt, worn under dotted muslin, looped up at the side with rosettes. White stockings, with blue kid gaiters.

The hair is worn in long plaits, tied with bows and wide ends of the blue silk of the dress, pinked at the edges.

Some hats of piqué, made on ratans, and ruffled around the crown, are preferred for girls, as they can be washed every week, and are much more light and youthful-looking than the broad-rimmed straws. A braid called cottonette, resembling chip, is made into pretty hats for school and the play-ground. Crinoline hats of the jardinière shape, with dented brims, trimmed with wreaths about the crown, and small flowers under the rim, are worn with the fancy country toilettes.

Buff or cuir-colored kid boots are worn with dresses of every color. They are buttoned at the sides. The heels are the concave French shape, but a careful mother will be sure that they are not very high, and that there is a broad surface, widened out at the bottom, after the heel has been narrowed in the centre. This is necessary for the child's comfort, and to prevent injury to the shape of the foot. High slender heels give a child an awkward gait, and are only tolerable for ladies who walk slowly. Bronzed and colored kid boots are worn with gay costumes, but a black kid stitched with white is suitable for any style of dress. Prunella clasps the foot tightly, and is consequently not so comfortable for growing children as the more elastic kid and morocco.

Victoria lawn aprons, embroidered around the skirt, pockets, and bretelles, with straps across the back and front, are imported for $5. They are large enough for girls of ten or twelve years. Muslin fichus, with long ends trimmed with fluted ruffles, and Swiss basques edged with lace or frills, are worn over blue and rose-colored dresses for the street.

There is no change in infants' clothing worthy of record. Some pretty crocheted bibs were shown us with raised flowers and shell borders, and others of quilted-piqué covered with embroidery. Summer cloaks are two large capes of piqué ornamented with braid and embroidery. The price varies, according to trimming, from $11 to $16. A French affair is of Victoria muslin over blue silk. The trimming is Valenciennes insertion and lace.

Thanks are due Messrs. A. T. STEWART & Co.; LORD, TAYLOR, & Co.; and Madame BAILLARD.

PERSONAL.

It may interest some readers of the Bazar to know that the first Sunday-school in England was established in the city of Gloucester, in 1781, by ROBERT RAIKES, printer and editor of the Gloucester Journal, in conjunction with the Rev. THOMAS STOKES.

A Monsieur JACQUES recently wrote to a Paris paper that he was a martyr to gout, led a stormy life, had a violent temper, but wanted a young and handsome wife, on whom he would settle 100,000 francs per year. He received forty-six replies, made his selection, and was married on the following Monday.

SWINBURNE is about to shed the lustre of his countenance upon the peoples of this continent, and will make a special point of paying a visit to WALT WHITMAN. He is said to be a prey to morbid melancholy, and his physician has ordered him to travel. Some Whitman will do him good.

CHRISTINA NILSSON has broken off her match with GUSTAVE DORE, who was opposed to her coming to this country, and who is said to be of a jealous turn of mind. He bothered her so much that she concluded to let the thing go.

The Rev. S. H. TYNG, Jun., recently officiated at one of the Sunday open-air services in Central Park—having previously obtained consent of the rector of the parish, ANDREW H. GREEN, Esq. This parish is the largest in the city, and on Sunday has more attendants. It extends from Fifty-ninth to One Hundred and Tenth Streets, and from Fifth to Eighth Avenues.

MISS STEBBINS, who ranks high among living sculptors, is a sister of HENRY G. STEBBINS, Esq. She has returned from Rome, and will soon, it is said, according to the advice of her brother, open a studio in this city. Her works have been great triumphs of art; and her friends believe that if she were to exercise her eminent talents in her own country her reward would be even more liberal than that which has been extended to her abroad. Her "Columbus," purchased by MARSHALL O. ROBERTS, and intended, we believe, for the Central Park, is regarded as a complete triumph by connoisseurs.

Mrs. JENNY C. WHITE DEL BAL, whose interesting memoir by her mother, Mrs. RHODA E. WHITE, has just been published, was the grand-niece of the celebrated Irish writer, GERALD GRIFFIN, whose eldest sister married the father of Judge WHITE, Mrs. DEL BAL's father. ANNA GRIFFIN, the only surviving sister of GERALD, is now Mother Superior of the Convent of Mercy in Youghal, Ireland. It was to her that the poet addressed his beautiful lines, "The Sister of Charity." On her mother's side, Mrs. DEL BAL was related to Mrs. MYRA CLARK GAINES. She was the first American woman ever resident in New Granada, and accomplished immense good there by her untiring energy, founding schools, arousing public spirit, and organizing military hospitals among a people panic-stricken by revolution. Her memoir is a touching expression of a mother's devotion, and her charming letters give a graphic picture of South American customs and politics, together with an inside view of the domestic life of a high-minded Catholic family.

Among the ladies present at the reception of Mr. BURLINGAME, at Washington a few evenings since, was Mrs. THORNTON, wife of the British minister. She is a tall, rather slender and angular, but graceful blonde, very lady-like and self-possessed.

THE CROWN PRINCE OF PRUSSIA, the husband of VICTORIA's eldest girl, has an income of about a million dollars a year, out of which he lays by, yearly, a couple of hundred thousand.

Mr. GROTE, whose celebrated History of Greece, published by the HARPERS, is one of the best works of its class ever published, has been elected President of the London University in place of Lord BROUGHAM.

—Boston is about to honor itself by giving a public reception to the first of American historians, Mr. MOTLEY, on his return from Europe.

—The Rev. Mr. BEECHER, in announcing to his congregation the close of Plymouth Church until the 1st of October next, mentioned that when the vacation ended he would have completed 21 years of pastoral labor with that people. He had often rebuked them and they had rebuked him, but the essential harmony had never been disturbed. Men very much mistook the aim of his ministry and of his church when they regarded it as a Reformatory Church, placing any instrumentality above the Gospel. Men complained of him that he preached sometimes one way and sometimes another, and that it was difficult to tell what he was driving at. He said he had intended just such results. Sometimes he preached on one side of a subject and sometimes on another, but he never mixed things. Whatever subject or side he took up he completed it, and then left it. He trusted to his long ministry and to the education his people had in religious matters to equalize things, and he thought, judging by the fruits, that his people did it as well as any people. He cautioned his church against boasting and unduly praising Plymouth Church, its ministry, and its arrangements. It was in bad taste. They must remember that while they were not behind most congregations they were on the whole only an average lot.

—M. TAINE, an eminent French writer and lecturer, has just been married at Paris to Mlle. DENUELLE, in the Foreign Missions Church; Messieurs RENAN, VACHERAT, BERTHELOT, and many other celebrities in science, literature, and art, were present.

—Lord BROUGHAM was, at his death, the Father, or senior member of the Royal Society of England. He was elected a Fellow in 1803, at the age of 25. He was only 18, in 1796, when was published, in the "Philosophical Transactions," his paper on "Experiments and Observations on the Inflection, Reflection, and Colors of Light." The EARL OF LONSDALE, elected in 1810, has succeeded Lord BROUGHAM as "Father" of the Royal Society. Next below him are Sir HENRY ELLIS, late Librarian of the British Museum; Sir JOHN HERSCHEL, son of the astronomer and himself an illustrious man of science; and Lord BROUGHAM, better known as Sir JOHN C. HOBHOUSE, the friend, early and late, of BYRON, with whom he traveled, when both were young, in Greece and Turkey.

—Dr. LYON PLAYFAIR, Professor of Chemistry in the University of Edinburgh, and generally believed to have written most of the speeches and addresses which the late Prince ALBERT delivered as his own, is a candidate for the representation, in the House of Commons, of the new constituency formed by the conjoined Universities of Edinburgh and St. Andrews. If elected, he will resign his chair and devote himself to his Parliamentary duties. He is forty-nine years old, Companion of the Bath, Officer of the Legion of Honor, and several other knightly orders of Europe, and one of the best of British practical chemists.

—Miss MULOCK's story of "The Woman's Kingdom," now in course of publication in Harper's Magazine, is one of that lady's best productions. It is noticeable that since Miss MULOCK was married her stories have been full of the joys of early matrimony—as though marriage had just been invented and she was the first who had tried it. Traces of this are here and there noticeable in "The Woman's Kingdom" (a very delightful kingdom); yet the story is sweet and good.

—The Queen of Mohely, who queens it over a few thousand mongrel Arabs occupying a group of islands (Comores), in the north of the Mozambique Channel, has arrived in Paris to see the lions. She is a young woman of 31 years, tall, reasonably good-looking, somewhat bronzed, and of strong will. She has ladies of honor with her, a lord chamberlain, and cook; which last little fellow is quite a wonder with sauce-pans. After he has cooked her Majesty's food, mostly of rice, her Majesty graciously adds, on her own hook (or "personal curve," as they felicitously phrase it in Mohely), a slight drop or two, or three, as it were, of best cogniac. Her Majesty dresses in scarlet and yellow silks, with plenty of diamonds and precious stones. Her husband's harem is said to contain beauties so fat that they can scarcely walk, dressed in a kind of jacket and pantaloons reaching to the ankle.

For some years he was Deputy-clerk of the Senate of this State. In 1861 he went to Washington as Private Secretary of Secretary Seward, and remained up to the termination of Mr. LINCOLN's administration. After this he was appointed United States Commercial Agent at Bradford, England, and filled that position for nearly two years. Last year he was appointed Deputy-Surveyor of the port, and continued in that office until a few days since, when he was appointed to his present post. Mr. WEBSTER is a gentleman of fine abilities and great executive power, and will prove one of the most efficient Assessors in the service of the Government.

This, we believe, is the best man-and-water time on record; though at the Sandwich Islands young people, especially girls, paddle about in the water all day long.

Squares in Worked Guipure (Point de Venise).

The square, Fig. 1, is worked in guipure point de Venise. It may be set in with other squares, and used for tidies, toilette-cushion covers, etc. The fineness of the thread must correspond to that of the linen, and both to the object for which the square is designed. For beginning the work prepare a piece of linen of the requisite size by drawing out the threads both ways till regular squares are formed. In the original (Fig. 1), which is of fine linen, twenty-eight threads have been drawn out each way. This gives the squares shown on Fig. 1. After every twenty-eight threads which have been drawn out leave seven or eight threads, which form the frame-work. Stretch on pasteboard the linen thus prepared, and work the inner edge closely ly and firmly with middling coarse cotton, then work the threads of the material in point de reprise with the assistance of Fig. 2, which shows a quarter of the square magnified four times. This illustration shows the manner of working on the unfinished portions. Having worked the whole in point de reprise, make the figures of the design in button-hole stitch with the assistance of both illustrations. The circular and serpentine figures consist each of three button-hole stitch rows; the figures which imitate rosettes and parts of rosettes are worked with one row in button-hole stitch. For every row of button-hole stitch the working thread must be previously run around in the right direction, as shown by Fig. 2, in doing which the thread must be fastened to the bars. For the knots which are worked in the last row of the figures make, as shown by Fig. 2, another button-hole stitch in the one just worked, after which run the needle again through the last knot. MATERIALS: Two strands of red and two of black silk twist of average fineness, black beads, a steel clasp, a black bead tassel, five steel knitting-needles.

twist, and trimmed with black beads and a black bead tassel, and is sewed on a steel clasp. Begin the purse in the centre of the lower part, and cast on seven stitches of black silk. With these knit backward and forward fourteen rounds in such a manner that the work shall be all knitted on one side and all purled on the other. Take off the first stitch of every round, and purl the first round of this part. * Then on the side where hangs the working thread (which is left alone) take on another needle the back veins of the seven edge stitches of the part just knitted, and knit with these a new part which counts fifteen rounds, the first of which must be knitted. From * repeat ten times. To avoid being troubled with too many needles the stitches of several parts may be gathered together on one needle. Having completed the twelfth part, take the under veins of the edge stitches of this also upon a separate needle, cast them off together with the foundation stitches of the first part, and fasten the thread. Now take the seven stitches of the edge on the right of one of the black parts on a needle, lay on the red silk on which beads have previously been strung, and work with this on the stitches of the edge just mentioned fifteen rounds, purling the first round; and in this as well as in all the other purled rounds the first stitch must be knitted with the next stitch of the next black part. Besides this a bead must be knitted in with the purled rows in the second, fourth, and sixth stitches (with the exception of the first and last round). This is done by knitting each of these stitches crossed, and pushing through the stitch the bead which is on the thread at the time of drawing the thread that was thrown over the needle, by which means the bead is brought on the right side of the work. In the following knitted round knit the bead stitches of the former round crossed. Having completed twelve such parts of the red silk, work on the edge stitches twelve black parts, on which the beads are not knitted, but sewed on after the completion of the purse. Then work again three times alternately twelve red and twelve black parts; but after the completion of the last twelve black parts the stitches of the last black part must be cast off with the edge stitches of the first part of the row. In the same manner cast off the stitches of the sixth part with the edge stitches of the seventh part. By this means the parts which are of red silk are lessened by two, but the second, third, and fourth, and seventh, eighth, and ninth of these parts must be knitted six rounds longer. Then collect the stitches and edge of the ten parts on two needles in such a manner that the two black parts of which the stitches and edge stitches were cast off together shall come on the sides of the purse, and knit of black silk, first with the stitches of one and then those of the other needle as follows: knit one round, in which knit together every third and fourth following stitch, then backward and forward, and with the same number of stitches, three rounds, which must appear knitted on the right side of the work, and after this eight rounds in the same manner, but at the beginning of each of these rounds the first two stitches must be cast off. Finally, cast off all the stitches of the last round, and sew the beads of the former round. Now work * over the foundation thread a scallop of 5 ds., 1 p., 5 ds., fasten to the next picot, and repeat from *. At the end of the round fasten and cut off the threads. This completes a rosette. For the scallops which join the rosettes fasten both foundation and working thread to a picot of the rosette, carefully following the pattern. * work over the foundation thread a scallop of 5 ds., 1 p., 5 ds.; close on this work with only one thread a ring pointing downward of 5 ds., 1 p., 5 ds., and repeat from * four times. Then work another scallop like the preceding, and tie the working thread to a picot of a second rosette. Fasten the rings of the scallop row by means of a row of stitches worked over a foundation thread. THIS border is worked in fine crochet cotton. It consists of small rosettes, which are joined by means of tatted scallops. On each end of the row work over the foundation thread a scallop of 5 ds., 1 p., 5 ds., 1 p., 5 ds., then * a leaf of 7 ds.; fasten to the picot which joins the first two leaves of the upper row, again 7 ds.; then over the foundation thread a scallop of 4 ds., 1 p., 4 ds., and after this a leaf, which must be fastened to the same picot of the former row to which the former leaves were fastened, a scallop of 4 ds., 1 p., 4 ds., and another leaf, which must also be fastened to the same picot. This completes one of the five-leaved figures. Now repeat from * till the insertion-like part of the collar is finished, after which fasten the threads. Border this with an edge, which is worked over a foundation thread. Fasten the threads on the first picot of the corner scallop (see illustration), work 5 ds., 1 p., 5 ds., fasten to the following picot of the same scallop; work 2 ds., 1 p., 7 ds., 1 p., 2 ds.; * fasten to the picot of the next scallop (on the under part of the insertion-like part), 5 ds., 1 p., 5 ds.; fasten to the picot of the next scallop; 2 ds., 1 p., 2 ds. Repeat from * till the round is completed. The other edge is worked in the same manner. On the upper edge the number of stitches between every two picots of the insertion-like part must count ten. Next border the ends and under edge with the following the beginning and end of the working thread, thus forming the small six-leaved figures in the middle of the rosettes. Now fasten the working thread to a picot of the six-leaved figure, * work three rings as before, fasten to the next picot, and repeat from * five times. At the end of the round fasten the working thread to the picot to which it was fastened at the beginning of the round, and tie the two threads together. KNITTED EGG AND CRACKER BAG.

From the little whitewashed chamber at the top of a narrow wooden staircase, where I had slept ever since my first coming to Hauteville Hall, I found myself transferred to an airy and spacious tapestried apartment over the library.

with an oriel window opening on the Italian garden. A tailor from Warborough came to take my orders for several suits of the prevailing fashion, and Lady Barbara herself assisted me to select patterns and colors, while Mr. Snip waited respectfully with his pattern-book across his arm. My mornings were still given to the classics with my kind master Anthony Grimshaw; but after we had read an act of a Greek tragedy, or the funeral oration of Pericles, or a dozen pages of Tacitus, or dipped into the wicked romance of Petronius Arbiter, my tutor and I parted company; and unless I made it my business to join him as he took his after-dinner pipe on the terrace, we saw no more of each other till the next day. In short, I was now a gentleman, and my sphere was the drawing-room, where I sat by Lady Barbara's tambour-frame, or hung over Miss Hemsley's harpsichord, as if I had been to the manner born. How shall I describe the kindness of my kinswoman, who, having chosen to assume the care of my fortunes, was determined to fulfill her duty to the uttermost!

"It seems cruel to have left you so long to languish in this lonely place," she said, during our first tête-à-tête; "but I could not get Sir Marcus away from Madrid, and it would have seemed ungracious to leave him; so I waited, almost hoping for some breach between England and Spain, in order to bring about my husband's recall. And then the years slipped by so quickly. I knew Anthony would be kind to you, and I did not think Martha would be unkind, which I fear she was, though you refuse to admit as much. In short, dear cousin, believe me, I was not so cruel as I must needs have seemed."

"You never seemed to me any thing but my bountiful benefactress and friend," I replied; "I knew that I owed every thing to you, and must have perished but for your charity."

"No, Robert, I will not have that word."

"Nay, dear Madam, there is no other that fits your goodness."

And again my lady gave me her hand, which I once more raised to my lips in grateful homage.

I was now installed as one of the family, with as little sense of dependence as it is possible for a dependent to feel.

I was agreeably surprised by the conduct of Mr. Lestrangle, who treated me with a cordiality which I was far from expecting to receive from him, after his supercilious tone on the night of our first meeting. He was something of a fop and fine gentleman; but pronounced himself, nevertheless, delighted with the park and woods, the noble trout-stream which intersected the estate, and in which I was able to show him the deeps and shallows, the shadowy inlets where his fly might do most execution, and the reedy margins where he might be sure of a gigantic jack. He suffered me to do the honors of Hauteville, and entertained me agreeably with his own adventures at home and abroad, which he was never tired of relating, and which were of a nature to induce me to believe that the descriptions of Petronius were not so entirely fabulous as I had hitherto supposed them. In plain truth, I discovered by-and-by that this gentleman, who was yet on the sunny side of his twenty-seventh birthday, was past-master of the knowledge of evil, and had long outlived his abhorrence of the vices and his respect for the virtues of his fellow-men.

I did not, however, make this discovery immediately, being too much unused to the society of fine gentlemen, and to the world in general, to be a skilled observer. Little by little these things revealed themselves to me; and I had been some months in Mr. Everard's company before I had learned rightly to estimate his civilities or to appreciate his value.

His father arrived at the Hall within a week of Lady Barbara's advent; and I was presented to that important personage with all due ceremony. He received me with a somewhat cold courtesy, and I was quick to discover that my presence gave him little pleasure. Tolerance was, evidently, all I must expect from him; but the kindness of my benefactress would have compensated me for worse treatment from Sir Marcus, and while I took care not to intrude myself upon that gentleman, I rigidly refrained from any attempt to conciliate his good graces. My grateful affection for my protectress might be misinterpreted; but I was determined to eat no toads for Sir Marcus Lestrangle.

Happily for me, however, the diplomatist was by no means a domestic character. He spent the greater part of his day in his study, and of an evening played piquet with my lady in her dressing-room, while Everard Lestrangle, Miss Hemsley, and myself amused ourselves in the saloon, or strolled on the terrace and in the garden. He paid numerous visits to the seats of the neighboring nobility and gentry, traveling sometimes as many as thirty miles to a dinner, and altogether troubled us but little with his company. He was an elegant and accomplished gentleman, of about fifty years of age, in person much resembling his only son, but of more perfect although colder manners. Between himself and Everard there obtained a stately politeness which did not betoken a very warm affection. It was rather the manner of skilled fencers on guard than of a loving father and son. My lady told me in confidence that Sir Marcus desired to see his son united in marriage with Dorothea, or Dora, Hemsley, not only the most amiable of women, but a considerable fortune.

"Whether this will ever come to pass I know not," she said in conclusion; "but I am bound to assist my husband's projects. Dora is a very sweet girl, and my only fear is that Everard should prove unworthy of her."

"They are not betrothed to each other, are they, Madam?" I asked, perhaps more anxiously than the circumstances warranted.

"No, there has been no formal betrothal; but Dora can hardly be ignorant of her uncle's wish. She was left an orphan five years ago, and since that time has lived with me. I do not know what I should do without her. I have no children of my own, you see, Robert. There is a little grave in Spain that I can not think of at this day without a heartache, though it is fifteen years old; but no child of mine lived to call me mother. Yes, Dora is very dear to me," she added, abruptly changing the subject.

This confidence occurred within a week of Lady Barbara's arrival. In after-days, when I had suffered a bitter pain and languished under the burden of a secret sorrow, I could not help thinking that my benefactress had told me these things thus early in order that no peril might arise from my daily companionship with Dora Hemsley. But there is one disease against which antidotes and preventives are administered in vain, and from this cruel fever I was doomed to suffer.

CHAPTER VI.

I FALL IN LOVE.

DURING one of our earliest rambles in Hauteville woods I introduced Mr. Everard Lestrangle to the warren's lodge, where the traveled gentleman soon contrived to make himself agreeable to honest Dame Hawker and my sweet Margery, who had blossomed into rare beauty in the calm solitude of her woodland home. She was but just seventeen years of age, slim and graceful as the young fawns who had frisked around her and eaten from her rosy palm. Her beauty was that of a true wood-nymph, and had nothing in common with Dorothea Hemsley's white loveliness. Margery's skin was a pale olive, charmingly relieved by the deep crimson of cheeks and lips. Her eyes were hazel-brown, large, bright, and sparkling with the innocent vivacity of a pure and fearless soul; her hair also a rich nut-brown, tinged with gold—waving, rippling hair, which defied her girlish vanity when she would fain have pinned and pinched it into some semblance of the two or three fashionable heads which she saw at church.

I had happened to tell my new acquaintance that Jack Hawker was an excellent angler, and his daughter skilled in the fabrication of a famous trout-fly, whereupon Mr. Lestrangle expressed himself eager to see my foster-father.

"A very bower of Arcadia!" he cried, as we approached the dear old white-walled cottage. "And so this is where you were reared? I declare, Ainsleigh, you were a lucky dog to have a scoundrel for your father."

"Scoundrel or no scoundrel, as he was my father, I would rather you called him no hard names," I answered, somewhat sullenly; for I had no idea of suffering this gentleman to throw dirt at Roderick Ainsleigh's grave.

We found the cottage tenantless. Jack Hawker was doubtless absent on his rounds, and it was market-day at Warborough, whither my foster-mother went every week to make her purchases, and dispose of small produce in the way of honey and eggs, and vegetables from the fertile rustic garden. The doors being all opened, in the sultry midsummer weather, we went into the kitchen, whence we beheld as fair a vision as painter ever perpetuated by the work of his brush.

At the end of a narrow garden-path, over-arched by the straggling boughs of elder, quince, and hazel, stood Margery, in the centre of a little grass-plot, with the sunshine on her loose, uncovered hair and light chintz petticoat. She was feeding her poultry, which swarmed eagerly round her, and did sturdy battle among themselves for the barley which her pretty hands shook down on them from a well-filled sieve. So busily was she occupied as not to be aware of our approach till we stood within a few yards of her; and then it was a pretty sight to see her bashfulness and sweet blushing confusion when she glanced suddenly upward and perceived us watching her.

She came and shook me by the hand, and dropped a low courtesy to my companion. Her manner toward myself had much changed during the last year. She was no longer the familiar foster-sister who had been wont to hold up her rosy lips to receive the fraternal kiss, but a bashful maiden, whose eyelids drooped when we met, and from whom I had sometimes trouble to extort more than murmured monosyllabic replies to my talk, yet who would by fits and starts be vivacious and animated, playful and capricious, as some forest elf.

This I took to be the natural shyness of maidenhood, that tender early dawn of life in which a woman is wholly surprised and half ashamed to find herself beautiful and admired.

I requested Margery to show us some golden pheasants of her own rearing, the feathers of which were of inestimable value to the angler; and she conducted us to a roomy, rough wire cage, embosomed among roses and seringa, proud to exhibit her favorites.

After these had been duly admired Mr. Lestrangle complained of thirst, and I begged a bowl of milk for him; whereon Margery led us to her mother's dairy, a cool, shadowy chamber paved with stone, and odorous with the perfume of eglantine and honey-suckle.

Here she made us welcome to such refreshment as the place could offer, and we loitered for some time drinking milk and eating cheese-cakes of a substantial quality. I was surprised to discover how quickly Everard Lestrangle made himself agreeable to the rustic girl, contriving speedily to engage her in familiar conversation, and to amuse her by his talk of London, that marvelous city of which she knew less than she knew of fairyland.

We bade Margery good-by after she had promised to make us some flies against our next visit; and as we walked away from the cottage my companion complimented me upon my good fortune in owning so lovely a foster-sister.

"Methinks thou wert born under a lucky star, Robert," cried the gentleman, in that affected style which I found afterward to obtain between young men of his class.

"I do not know what you mean by good luck," I replied. "I love my foster-sister dearly; but I consider it no special good fortune that she should have grown up so handsome. Indeed, I doubt if beauty is the best of gifts for a cottager's daughter."

"Spoken like a true disciple of the saintly Noggors of Brewer's-yard, Warborough," cried Mr. Lestrangle, with a sneer. "Beauty is a delusion and a snare, brother Jumper—do you jump in Brewer's-yard meeting-house, by-the-way, or do you belong to the quieter folks who only preach and pray?—yea, verily, comeliness of visage is but a snare to the wicked and a bait for fools; and 'tis better to be a flat-faced and pug-nosed damsel than a bright woodland siren, with great hazel eyes in which the sunshine plays at bo-peep, and lips like ripe crimson rose-buds."

I did not care to hear these florid compliments; and though at this time I knew but little of Everard Lestrangle, I resolved that I would take him to Jack Hawker's cottage as seldom as possible.

"One would think, by your raptures, you had fallen in love with my pretty sister," I said, somewhat coldly.

"Why, thou simplest of rustics, such raptures are the common language with a man of the world where women are in question. We think and talk of them in hyperbole, and the homeliest among them is angel or goddess before marriage. It is only after the honey-moon that we descend to the regions of fact, and confess that Lesbia is a slattern and Marcella a scold. As for your pretty woodland nymph yonder, it would fare ill with me should I lose my heart in that quarter; for so surely as I am a skilled observer of womankind, hers is already forfeited."

"To whom, pray?"

"To you, Mr. Demure; to you, who pretend to be unconscious of your power. Did you mark how ready the sly puss was to converse with me, and how bravely her beautiful eyes met mine, stranger as I am! But at a word from you the dark lashes droop, and the gipsy face reddens with a sudden blush. I would forfeit my chances of favor with the Duke of Newcastle to be in your shoes, were I free to wish."

I understood these last words to allude to his relations with Miss Hemsley. I hastened to assure him that he was mistaken as to Margery's sentiments.

"We regard each other as brother and sister, but no more," I said. "I have watched her cradle many a day when I was little more than a baby myself. We were together for nearly eight years—constant play-fellows and companions—and the friendship between us has never been interrupted."

"And is that any reason that she should not love you?"

"The strongest. I don't believe that love is ever born of custom and affection. 'Tis the sudden sight of a sweet strange face that first tells a man he has a heart."

Mr. Lestrangle stared hard at me, and I felt my cheeks crimson under his gaze.

"And what sweet strange face has Mr. Ainsleigh seen of late that has made him so wise?" he demanded, with a sneer.

"I speak of love in the abstract," I answered, and hastily turned the conversation; but on several occasions after this I caught Everard Lestrangle watching my face with a somewhat unfriendly expression upon his own.

"The sudden sight of a sweet strange face." The words had escaped me unawares, and they hinted at a secret scarce known to myself. 'Twas the pale, wild white-rose face of Dorothea Hemsley that was in my mind.

And she was to marry this cold, cynical, supercilious worldling, with his sneers and affectations, because she had a fortune, and could advance her cousin's prospects! Remote and impossible a creature as she must ever be for me, I could but lament that family interests should assign her to so unfitting a partner; and I feared that so gentle a nature would never sustain any contest with the will of others, should the young lady's inclinations be opposed to the match.

This I had some reason to conclude was the case. I had seen Miss Hemsley and her suitor together, and had seen on her part an avoidance which was something more than maiden modesty. She was polite and gentle in her demeanor toward her cousin, as she was to the lowest servant in the house; but I observed that she artfully eluded all occasions of being alone with him. In order to do this she sometimes invited my companionship, and I was thus at an early stage of our acquaintance drawn into a dangerous intimacy with her. She volunteered to teach me chess, and instructed me in the performance of the simple symphonies and accompaniments in two or three easy bass songs by Handel and Gluck.

That these favors bestowed on me were displeasing to Mr. Lestrangle I had, even at this period, no doubt; but he contrived to conceal his anger, and treated his cousin and myself with perfect amiability.

I found it no easy matter to keep my lady's step-son away from the warren's lodge, where he managed to make himself vastly agreeable to simple Jack Hawker and his simpler wife, who thought this town-bred gentleman the most perfect specimen of courtesy and good-manners. Margery brightened at our coming, and seemed always alike delighted to receive us; nor was I well pleased to perceive the rapid progress which Mr. Lestrangle appeared to make in her favor, since I had by this time become acquainted with the loose ideas and contemptuous opinions which he entertained of all womankind, from the duchesses whose favors he hinted at to the dairymaids whose destruction he boasted. Toward me my foster-sister's manner was shyer and more subdued every time we met, but with Everard Lestrangle she gossiped and laughed with perfect freedom.

This gentleman often rallied us upon our secret attachment, and his jests covered the poor girl with blushes and confusion, much to the amusement of Jack Hawker, who saw no reason why his daughter should be an unworthy alliance for Lady Barbara's penniless protégé. I had told my old friends at the warren's lodge nothing of my cousinship with the mistress of Hauteville, and they still regarded me as a nameless waif, dependent on the charity of my noble benefactress.

I did not, however, continue to afford Mr. Lestrangle occasion for his broadly-expressed insinuations, which were embarrassing to Margery, and to the last degree painful to myself. As the summer advanced I spent less time in the woods, and left my lady's step-son to go fishing by himself, while I read with Lady Barbara and Miss Hemsley in the Hauteville library. My benefactress was well pleased to resume her studious habits, and we formed a little company of students, with Anthony Grimshaw for our preceptor. Together we read Virgil, Dante, and Tasso, and my lady was so good as to express herself much pleased with my progress as a linguist.

"The dear boy has a rare talent for languages," said my gratified master, "and we have worked hard at the cultivation of foreign tongues, which of all accomplishments is the most valuable for a man who has to make his way in the world. For Greek and Latin I will match Robert against any lad of his age; he knows Italian thoroughly, and is a fair Frenchman; and he has, moreover, a smattering of Sanscrit, which may some day be useful to him."

"I doubt whether his knowledge of Sanscrit will ever serve him for much," my lady answered, smiling, "unless he should have a fancy for extending his travels as far as the court of the Great Mogul, or should turn Jesuit missionary and convert the heathens of Birmah or Thibet. But the habit of study is a good one, and I am proud to think my cousin has been so diligent a pupil."

While I did my best to improve Miss Hemsley's Italian, which was far from equal to the obscurities of Dante, that young lady was so kind as to instruct me in the Spanish tongue, of which she had made herself mistress during her five years' residence at Madrid. With this gentle instructress I speedily mastered the soft, sleepy syllables of that harmonious language, and read Don Quixote in the original before our studies were concluded.

For these studies Mr. Lestrangle did not scruple to avow his contempt. He quoted Molière's Femmes Savantes, and christened my lady Bélise, and Dora Hemsley Armande. He spoke of us as the Hauteville Blue-stocking Club, and suggested that we should invite Lord Lytleton and Mrs. Montague to join the party.

I for my part was too happy to heed his sneers; days, weeks, and months slipped by, and I well-nigh forgot that I had ever been solitary and almost friendless in that house where my life was now so pleasant. My acquaintance with Dora Hemsley had ripened into friendship. She talked to me of my lonely boyhood, of her own happy youth surrounded by friends so dear, and of the bitter grief that fell upon her with the loss of them. She told me of Lady Barbara's tender kindness, and of the affection which had gone so far to supply the place of the lost. But of her uncle's desire to bring about a marriage between herself and his son she never spoke; nor was she ever betrayed into expressing any opinion respecting Everard Lestrangle. One day when Everard and she had been by chance alone together for some minutes, I surprised her in tears. Mr. Lestrangle quitted the room by one door as I entered by another, and I found Dora seated on one of the window-seats, with her arms resting on the broad stone sill, and her head and face hidden in her clasped hands. I saw the tears trickling between the slender fingers, and had not sufficient command of myself to refrain from questioning her.

"Dear Miss Hemsley," I cried, "for God's sake tell me what distresses you!"

She lifted her head and turned her sweet face toward me, bathed in tears.

"That I can tell to no one," she answered; "I have my secret troubles to bear, Mr. Ainsleigh, though I am but just eighteen years of age, and I must endure them with patience."

I knelt at her feet, and begged her to believe that if the sacrifice of my life could have served her I would have freely given it. She turned her tearful eyes toward me.

"Yes, Robert," she said, "I think you would do much to save me from sorrow. But you can not. I must bear my burden."

The sound of my Christian name spoken by her lips thrilled my soul like a strange sweet music. But at the same moment there came another sound that startled me. 'Twas the stealthy opening of a door. I looked up and saw Mr. Lestrangle peering in at us through a narrow opening from the doorway by which I had seen him leave the room. Our eyes met, and he clapped to the door; but in that one instant I had seen the expression of his face, and never did I behold more malignant hate upon the human countenance.

I would fain have pressed Miss Hemsley further, but she entreated me to refrain, and I left her, sorely distressed by her grief, and only able to guess at its cause.

"Everard Lestrangle has been urging his suit with her," I thought; "'tis clear she does not love him."

And then I suffered my fancy to beguile me with a bright dream of what might have been if I had not been a penniless dependent, and Miss Hemsley a fortune; and I cursed the wealth which made an impassable barrier between us.

PRECIOUS STONES.

MOST precious stones, like human beings, will scratch one another; but sometimes, unlike them, they will refuse to perform that kindly office. This peculiarity affords one of the best tests of their true nature. Thus, supposing it were wished to ascertain what gem a white stone was, we should know that if it were scratched by a sapphire it could not be a diamond, and if it scratched glass it must necessarily be a beryl, or quartz, or rock-crystal. Again, if its specific gravity were less than 3.9 it could not be a ruby or a sapphire; and if it did not acquire electricity by heat it could neither be a topaz nor a jargon. For the purpose, therefore, of satisfying his mind, all that is necessary for Aladdin to procure is a crystal of sapphire (cheap and easily obtained), a piece of quartz or rock-crystal, a piece of hard flint-glass, and a pair of scales for the purpose of taking the specific gravity. Then the African magician himself could not cheat him. But all kinds of frauds abound in this costly trade. There are "doublets" of which the under part is glass joined artistically without cement; or sometimes the top is sapphire, and the under part a gem of less value, such as garnet. Some stones have the interior of their setting enameled or painted, to throw a tint of color into the gem; and diamonds have the inside of their setting of polished silver, to correct a yellowish tinge. Even in the countries where the real gems are produced you are subject to deception. Blue glass cut into facets is exported from Birmingham and Paris to Colombo, for the Cingalese to dispose of to the passengers by the Peninsular and Oriental steamers. This should prevent persons residing in foreign countries from sending home worthless pebbles, under the impression that they are priceless gems. In one instance, a man actually left his business, and, at a very considerable expense, went to England to sell a quantity of diamonds which turned out to be nodules of rock-crystal. It is quite probable such persons are great pests to jewelers, and always fancy they are being cheated by them. Lapidaries themselves, however, are sometimes deceived. A noble lady in England formerly possessed a sapphire, which is perhaps the finest known. She sold it, however, during her lifetime, and replaced it by an imitation so skillfully made as to deceive even the jeweler who valued it for probate-duty; it was estimated at £10,000, and the duty paid on it by the legatee, who was doubtless chagrined when he discovered the deception.

Cleopatra's pearl is evidently a myth, as a pearl of the magnitude which has been ascribed to it could never have been dissolved in vinegar, but would have required a much stronger acid, such as would have destroyed not only the Egyptian lady's teeth, but her existence. Perhaps the gipsy humbugged her Roman lover with a false pearl (such as we learn are made of fish-bone), and was not so extravagant as she appeared to be. It was easy in those days to deceive persons about precious stones, for little was known of them, and every thing was credited. Serapius ascribed to the diamond the power of driving away "incubes and succubos;" but, on account of our ignorance of the nature of these objects, we can not form a judgment as to whether this was an advantage or the reverse. The ruby, according to Boëthius, was a sovereign remedy against poison. The jacinth produced sleep. The emerald, by changing color, indicated false witnesses. The sapphire procured favor with princes (which seems likely enough), and the chrysolite (also likely) assuaged wrath. The twelve apostles were each symbolized by a precious stone—Peter by jasper, John by emerald, and so on. Of the twelve stones in the breast-plate of the high-priest, there was (1) the sardius (any precious stone of a red hue), among the Jews supposed to be a preservative against the plague, and among the Arabs an agent for stopping hemorrhage. Hebrew legends state that the blushing ruby became the symbolical representative of Reuben. (2) The topaz; from the island Topazion, supposed to be situated in the Red Sea. (3) The carbuncle, which, in its Hebrew name Bereketh, signifies "flashing stone." A carbuncle was said to have been suspended—like our gas chandeliers—in the Ark of Noah, where it must certainly have been otherwise rather dark. This stone was said to drop from the clouds amidst the flashes of lightning. (4) Although the "Authorized Version" translates Nophek as emerald, this seems to have been also a carbuncle. Those of superior brilliancy are ungallantly called males; the inferior ones, females. (5) Sapphire; the most favorite precious stone in Holy Writ. The tables on which the ten commandments were engraved are said to have been made of it: it was even supposed to preserve the sight. (6) The diamond. Of this stone an author gravely relates: "A noble lady inherited two diamonds, which for many years remained hidden among her treasures; from time to time these stones gave birth to indisputable fac-similes and likenesses of themselves." (7) The turquoise. This precious stone was also the subject of a precious falsehood. An ancient writer upon it narrates with seriousness: "One of my relatives possessed a turquoise, set in a gold ring, which he wore on his finger. It happened that he was seized with a malady of which he died. During the whole period in which the wearer enjoyed his full health the turquoise was distinguished for unparalleled beauty and clearness; but scarcely was he dead when the stone lost its lustre, and assumed a faded, withered appearance, as if mourning for its master. This sudden change in the nature of the stone made me lose the desire I originally entertained of purchasing it, which I might have done for a trifling sum. However, no sooner did it obtain a new owner, than it regained its former exquisite freshness. I felt greatly vexed that I had lost the chance of procuring such a valuable and sensitive gem." One needs to be an emerald (or, at least, an Irishman) to credit this little story. (8) The agate. (9) The onyx, which has five variations; the fifth, black with white stripes, being the most valuable. (10) The chrysolite. (11) The emerald. Workers in precious stones, say the Rabbins, place this stone before them to rest their eyesight upon when engraving minute objects, since it bears so near a resemblance to the refreshing verdure of fields and trees. The best kind of emerald is found in the gold mines, and is excavated by excessive and painful toil. The griffin is said to build his (or her?) nest in its vicinity, and to keep a sharp look-out in the way of guarding it. (12) The jasper. According to tradition, the "Jashpeh" in the breast-plate represents the name of Benjamin. Jewels of immense value have been sometimes utterly lost in our own time, which is curious enough, considering the care necessarily taken of them, and their comparative indestructibility. The renowned Blue Diamond disappeared in the French Revolution, and has never been heard of since. There are said to be "sermons in stones;" but in each of the principal precious stones lies a gorgeous romance; and their histories, if written by a competent person, would make a charming volume. world seems to be the Braganza, belonging to the crown of Portugal. It was found in 1471 in Brazil, and weighs eighteen hundred and eighty carats; but great doubt exists as to its being a genuine diamond. It is imagined to be a white topaz; but the Portuguese Government are much too sagacious to permit it to be examined.

PINS.

IN the thorn Nature has provided man with the pattern and the first idea of the pin. When Adam and Eve, after their fall, but before their expulsion from Eden, made themselves aprons of fig-leaves, they doubtless used the thorn in the construction of their first garments. In the days of innocence there was no use for pins; and it was probably this fact which caused Byron to describe Juan when, metamorphosed into Juanna, he or she is unrobing in the seraglio, as

"Pricking her fingers with those cursed pins,
Which surely were invented for our sins,
Making a woman like a porcupine,
Not to be rashly touch'd."

The pins thus anathematized by the poet are, however, comparatively a modern invention. In all the records which we have of man's past history we find evidence that articles for fastening clothes always existed, but very unlike the present. In the museums which have been formed out of the ruins of Herculaneum and Pompeii, or Uriconium in England, we find skewers of bone, of brass, of silver, or of gold, which were used for this purpose. In the representations of the life of the people found in the Egyptian hieroglyphics we discern the means which they employed for the like necessary purpose; but nowhere do we meet with a modern pin. In Strutt's illustrations we find ribbons, loop-holes, laces with points and tags, clasps, hooks and eyes, of every form, size, and variety of use, and often turned to very extraordinary and surprising account in completing the toilette of the ancient belle and the adornment of the ancient beau. The modern pin would have been of little use in sustaining that towering head-dress; in fastening that wonderful cloak; in keeping up those curiously-slashed tunics; or in retaining the stiff uprightness of that extraordinary ruff. After pins came into use these eccentricities of costume and fashion were destined to give place to other fashions, in which, perhaps, the modern pin has played tricks as fantastic as its many substitutes in the olden time.

History tells us that iron-wire pins were first introduced into England in the year 1460. The finer examples of brass manufacture required a queen to procure them. They were brought from France by the beautiful Catherine Howard, one of his wives whom the "great" Henry VIII. beheaded. But though introduced by a queen, and doubtless at first an article exclusively applied to aristocratic uses, they soon became a measure of value for things not valued at all. "Not worth a pin," is a proverb which we find in use soon after their introduction. Thomas Tusser, who wrote about 1550, writing of a not very reputable character, says:

"His fetch is to flatter, to get what he can,
His purpose once gotten, a pin for thee then."

And Shakspeare makes Hamlet show his utter indifference to life by saying:

"I do not set my life at a pin's fee."

At the present time millions of these useful articles are wasted in a year.

We find pins first mentioned as an article of commerce in a statute of 1483. From a law passed in the reign of Henry VIII. we meet with some specific description of the kind of pins made—at least, of what they ought to have been. For instance, it is declared to be the will of the Legislature that "no person should put to sale any pins but only such as shall be double-headed, and have the heads soldered fast to the shanks of the pins, well smoothed, the shanks well shapen, the points well and round filed, canted and sharpened." A pin possessing these qualities would not be a bad pin even now.

Birmingham is the centre of this industry in England. Of the extent of this trade, and of the enormous number of pins made, a word or two may be said. In one manufactory in Birmingham three and a half tons of brass wire are used every week for pins alone; and of the fineness and thinness of the wire from which they may be made, it may be stated that two miles and three-quarters of brass wire "have been produced from a three-quarter-inch brass strip." More than ten tons of pins are made in a week; and England alone consumes in their manufacture from ten to eleven tons of brass wire. The English pins are classed among the best-made pins of commerce.

FUN.

UP and down the river, through all the fine weather, ply the excursion-boats, like nothing so much as some married couples. Grimy little steam-tug, puffing and panting, all sweat and smoke, the life and mainspring of the whole concern, and nobody giving it a moment's notice—that is paterfamilias. Overshadowing it, the tow! broad and big, sluggish and helpless, double-decked and scoured, flaunting with flags and full of dancing and fiddling, eating and drinking—that is Mrs. H— But I find that I can not finish the sentence; that I am about to invade the sanctities of private life, and sneer to the public, as I do in Mrs. Lumpkin's ear, when I see Mr. and Mrs. H— There it is again! The subject is too dangerous for handling, except as it leads me to speak of our dog Tip.

Tip has, I was about to say, an ear for music. But though people shiver or cry for music, it is with pleasure; whereas Tip's howls are so purely lugubrious that his prejudice against church bells and wind music are only too evident. His kennel is close by the river; and as there pass and repass six excursions a day, on the average, Tip's life may be imagined. Before the faintest squeak of violin or thud of drum has reached our ears Tip hears, and announces it by a long, melancholy howl. Fore-paws stiffly out, and head thrown back, "Oh, here is another excursion!" he says, as plainly as dog can say it; "Ow! ow! here it comes! Ugh! ugh! how can I bear it? Wow, wow, wow, wow! do somebody stop it! Oh! oh! oh! thank goodness, it is over!"

And in thus doing he expresses my sentiments so much better than can be done by words, that I present it as an explanation of my feelings whenever my niece Betty flourishes before my reluctant eyes a ticket for some new excursion into society.

Betty is seventeen, and a very pretty little person, but she has not yet discovered this last fact. She has no suspicion that people admire the pure whiteness of her complexion. She knows nothing about using her fine brown eyes. She is not aware that she came home last Tuesday with six old gentlemen hobbling after her, to catch a glimpse of her No. 2½ gaiters, though Mrs. Lumpkin was vehemently indignant over it, and I laughed till I cried. She is that sweetest thing in the world, a lovely young girl with no twists and grimaces, no shrugs and tossings, no lisping and set phrases—in a word, no "manner!" and long may she be preserved from it! But—

She is fresh from the country. She exhibits the same magnificent digestion, and horrible avidity for matinees, receptions, operas, balls, etc., that a school-boy does for sour, green apples. And to these receptions, matinees, and so on, I must accompany her! for how can we expect to keep this little bit of brightness, sweetness, and freshness in our house, if she is not amused?

Therefore when Betty, as aforesaid, meets me at the door with somebody's compliments, or the list of entertainments, not having the privileges of four legs, I do not throw back my head and howl, but sigh resignedly and think of Tip; or I favor my wife with a private imitation of that prejudiced animal, which causes her to declare that I am growing old and grumpy. That I like to sit in a corner and do not care to talk. And that elderly people are apt to flout and fling at mirth, especially those who were keenest after it in their youth, which may all be true, but though Mrs. Lumpkin is generally correct, does not, I think, apply to me. I think, on due reflection, that it is not I who do not desire society, but it is that society has no yearnings after an elderly gentleman turning bald, with an elderly wife and a small income. I find myself tapping out the time of the Hilda or Champagne Charlie as significantly as any body, and sitting still because I know that any young lady would pout on being shown such a partner. I find myself very much inclined to talk on Mill's last book, on the Pacific Railroad, on reconstruction, on the woman question, on ventilation, on wooden pavements, on every body's duty to every body else, and sitting mum because society, which is principally composed of mature young ladies like Betty and their admirers, shirks me and my conversation, forgets me in my corner, or looks over my head, or, if it nods to me, does it with an air of condescension, as who should say, you can not help it if you are old, you know; and I am inclined to think that I am not mistaken about the position assigned me, because I see dozens of elderly gentlemen like myself occupying exactly similar positions. And not gentlemen only, but ladies, like Mrs. Mille Fleur.

Mrs. Mille Fleur sits in a corner also, and I often go and talk with her. She is still young; still pretty; a clever and amiable woman of ripe judgment and fine fancy, who might, in some localities, be courted as a charming woman; but to whom the young ladies, who rule society, nod with that pleasant condescension that I so much prize in my own case while they sail past her with the superior air of belles and beauties and fair destroyers when in contact with the homely and unattractive virtues.

If society, then, has no yearnings after a woman like Mrs. Mille Fleur, how much less should it yearn after me! And that it does give her the corner, and leave her there, is a fact so marked that it attracted the enthusiastic recognition of my shrewd friend Miacomo, the Japanese ambassador, when on his last visit to our glorious Republic. This bridging over the noses of the Mrs. Mille Fleurs was, he contended, a distinguishing feature in our civilization, and one of those similar traits that bound the Japanese and American nations by friendlier ties.

"With us," he was fond of saying, "the married woman blackens her teeth, pulls out her eyebrows, and so signifies abnegation of vanity and desire for society; and with you a lady of wit and intelligence accepts a position which must be as trying as blackened teeth and gums. She has no longer individual rights. She is a fraction, and if her husband dies, she is described as a relic! a bit of broken human clay. She has not even a God except through her husband! 'He for God only; she for God in him.' Is not that what your great Milton sings? Her sole business is to wait on her husband's coffee and slippers, obey dutifully, and keep as much in the shade as possible. And so universally is this recognized that when she does appear in society, it is, as it were, by a sort of relaxation of authority, and in that obtrusive manner and costume that in other countries is assigned to young girls; while she defers, even when supposed to lead, to the young ladies of sixteen and upward, who rule society with such good sense and knowledge of the world. This is quite as it should be. The American damsel acquires a certain hardness and independence not to be witnessed in any other part of the world; while the American matron approaches so nearly to the lofty Japanese standard of wifely duty that I regard it as the best possible omen of that friendliness founded on similarity of ideas, though our excellent Mrs. Lumpkin would have me believe that I quite exaggerate the custom, and that such cases as I have described are isolated relics of barbarism."

As indeed my wife was fond of declaring with much warmth—and many will side with her—but here I am again strayed away from my subject, which, after all, is Betty, in the corner with Jack M'Donald. I talk with Mrs. Mille Fleur, but I keep my eyes upon her—Betty I mean. She is listening and looking down, and I know, as well as if I could hear her heart, under her little white lace tucker, that she is feeling that life might be an enchanted garden, all heliotrope, and Hilda waltz-beat, and eye-glances, and murmured compliments, and vague, delightful thrills, in a general atmosphere of love, and heroism, and romance, if Jack M'Donald could lead her through it; shaded off with a despairing consciousness that her gown is turned, her slippers cleaned, her whole life coarse and shabby, compared with that in which this inscrutable being must live, who is so wholly composed, who understands both himself and her, and who wears such perfect clothes.

Jack made the same excursions into society that Betty did, and till the memorable eve of Mrs. Dépense's ball there was the same tableau; Betty, with her thoughts written in blushes on her face; and Jack, murmuring in her ear, and looking tenderly at her. No "give" in his well-trained muscles betrayed that he was undergoing slow torture from his boots, and vowing to pull them off on the curb-stone. Nothing about him hinted that he fairly ran away from his friend Hughes when he found him with small-pox; or that he sat squarely in his seat while poor old Mrs. M'Intyre stood feeble and trembling, and gave it with a flourish to the first pretty girl who flounced into the car; or that he had money anxieties, and thought twice about two-and-sixpence; or that he was not in love with Miss Betty; and if he were would not marry her, because she has no money.

Every night, as I say, there he was with my poor little girl—the hero of Betty's modest admiration, her knight of chivalry, Bayard, without fear and without reproach. Every young girl knows that the race of Bayard is not extinct, and that there are still knights without fear, and without reproach. And if these be not young men with broad shoulders and lustrous eyes and fine mustaches, in Heaven's name where should a young lady look for them?

Betty, at least, would look no further. If I had pointed out to her Tom Dobson as Bayard, she would have laughed in my face. What! that insignificant man! and it would have been useless to tell her that Tom had the courage of a lion and the faith and gentleness of a woman. Tom admired Betty, but she never even saw him, leaning on Jack's arm. She gave Jack her flowers, and, touching them to his lips, he put them, he said, over his heart. Tom would never have thought of that. Betty wore Jack's ring, with the signet turned inside, as if every body would not know it by instinct; and when in the waltz Jack whispered "would that it might last forever," she did not check him.

Perhaps just then Mr. M'Donald was himself a little, a very little, in earnest. Betty's face looked up to his, fresh as a white moss-rose. The clear brown eyes knew no depths of guile or shadow of concealment. She was at that rarest and fairest moment of a young girl's life; possessed at once of a woman's loveliness and the simple grace of a child—the unconscious look still in her eyes, while all her face was brightening to an awakening love. So fair, so trusting, so much in earnest, Jack M'Donald himself must have loved her just then. The conservatory was just behind them, cool, half-lit, and sweet with jasmine; and Jack swung Betty through the open door into its twilight. There, of course, I lost sight of them. I could not interrupt Mrs. Mille Fleur, who was really so interesting that I felt less like Tip than usual. Neither can an elderly gentleman scuttle across the room, and pop in on two young people sitting under a rose-tree, or an oleander, or something of that sort, with "What are you doing here, my dears?"

The leaders of society must be left to conduct the battle of Life in their own way, and use what strategy they see fit. Therefore I know nothing of what passed in the conservatory. But I observed, as we rode home, that Betty's face wore a pale, transfigured look, as if some light in her thoughts shone out; also, that she was blind, deaf, and dumb; and as an old gentleman of some experience I drew my own conclusions, and said to Mrs. Lumpkin:

"My dear, we are at the dénouement."

What that dénouement must be I never doubted for an instant. Jack M'Donald had no money and luxurious tastes, and Betty had no money. Besides he was that nineteenth century ogre whose daily fare is a fresh, young heart served up with tears. But I did not hint my suspicions to Betty. Of what use would it have been? She was still in the deaf and dumb state of happiness, and dressed herself for Mrs. Dépense's ball as he liked to see her—in white, with a water-lily on her breast. She was never so lovely. I felt as if even M'Donald might relent, and questioned with myself all the way which were worse—that he should leave her and disenchant her at a blow, or marry her and disenchant her at leisure?

I might have saved myself the discussion. As Betty's first eager glance swept across the room she saw him in attendance upon a lady. The lady was dark and stout, and rustling and good-humored, and not handsome. But Jack bent over her with the air that Betty and I knew. When he saw us he smiled in a friendly, indifferent fashion, and I think he came to claim Betty for the third Lancers, and for one dance after supper. I urged Betty to come home, but she persisted in sitting there in the corner by me. She had been so long monopolized that nobody thought of coming to her. She looked and tried to smile and toss her head, and declared that she had a delightful evening—poor little hypocrite!—and she came down the next morning with a headache that made her eyes red, and fell into a habit of starting at every pull of the bell, no doubt expecting that Jack would come to make his peace. But he never came.

It was a bitter lesson: a sharp schooling—that was being administered to our little Betty. But great is amour propre. However terrible the fall, there it is, always under us, a sort of cushion to let us down easy. Betty was deserted, but she could explain her desertion. She had offended Jack. He had asked for her ring, and she had refused, lest she should be teased about it; and he had retorted that she cared more for Mrs. Grundy than for him. And it was this frightful wound, this exhibition of a thorough selfishness on her part, that had sent this sensitive man about town, the arrow still ranking in his heart, to pay court to buxom, uncomely, rustling ladies with large fortunes, and square his shoulders in forgetfulness of poor little Betty.

Who has not heard such theories, and mercifully acquiesced in them, as we did, when Betty ingeniously contrived to ventilate her "explanation," declaring at the same time that she cared nothing about it? For that matter, she bore up well, and would go out every evening; and at Mrs. Upset's was quite the belle, and showed a brilliant, handsome girl, though for my part I liked the simple, clinging Betty better. Even Jack was surprised, and looked her way as if doubtful and half-repentant. She saw the look, and her color and spirits rose. But, after all, it was a weary farce, played with an aching heart. She loved Jack all the more for her rebellion against him; and if he would have said to her three kind words she would have dropped her head on his shoulder, and believed in him more heartily than ever.

When the excitement was over and she sat cloaked and waiting, I never saw a sadder face. Head bent down, eyes downcast, she seemed to forget me, and so we sat quite still behind the curtains of one of Mrs. Upset's deep windows: so still that Jack, who was waiting for the rustling lady, never suspected our neighborhood. He, too, was tired, for he flung himself heavily on a sofa near our window, saying something to his companion about the "infernal din."

"The din is well enough," answered a voice that I knew to be Hughes's. "The twist is in your temper. What is the matter with you and Miss Betty? You seem to be out of her books."

"I do not know that I was ever in them," answered Jack, shortly enough, while Betty made a move to rise, and I held her fast like a cruel surgeon.

"She looked well to-night," persisted Hughes, with a spice of malice. "She was the finest girl in the room."

"She will do very well," returned Jack, patronizingly, but evidently stung, "when she takes life less in earnest."

"You mean when she takes men like you less in earnest," retorted Hughes. "What a pity that you have no heart, Jack! It is your only fault."

"No heart! why? because now I am cool to her?" asked Jack, rousing himself. "What is the use of talking that stuff, Hughes? She is a charming girl. Very charming. Something like morning dew on a landscape; but she has no notion of Fun. She takes every thing in dead earnest. She thinks all this delicious nerve quiver and flutter of flirtations would last forever. Her notions of love-making are patriarchal and prodigious. Love is to last forever, and cover a man's whole range of thought on sixpence a day at that. I know better. I have learned to analyze. Half of this love to begin with is music, flowers, gauzy dresses, and youth. I know, too, that she would grow stout and that I should grow gray, and that we should be to each other just an ordinary man and woman, and that we should probably jangle about the price of beef-steaks and flour, specially on sixpence a day. The morning dew and the aroma would be all gone, and we should be scowling at each other and wondering why the deuce we ever married?"

"I can not say this to a woman, particularly to a little apple-blossom of a girl like that; and with my blood thrilling under the touch of her fingers, or the brush of her curls against my cheek. So I forget her. I do not see her surprise and her piteous looks. I devote myself to the stout lady, sure that I can do no harm; for if it comes to the worst, she has a hundred thousand in her own right. It is all fair. Somebody, I forget who, played me the same trick several centuries ago when I was as fresh as she is. Besides, it is the best thing for her. If we were married we should have short commons! And I am always the very devil on short commons. Here lie the pleasant paths of peace and safety. More nerve flutter, more waltz music both for her and me. She will play her part coolly enough by-and-by, and take her Fun out of some other poor fellow! do you see?"

"I see you are a brute," cried Hughes, wrathfully.

"No," answered Jack, pleasantly. "Only practical."

I looked at Betty's quivering face, and thought of Miacomo and of the leaders of society at the mercy of practical gentlemen like this in their search for fun. And then I took my poor little morning dew-drop home, and after that she had a long headache which kept her in red eyes for a great many mornings. And after that she was cured? I do not know that. She was calm! and at any rate Jack M'Donald had his Fun.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

A MILLINER.—The best authorities say it is impossible to clean real blonde lace.

I. M. W.—You are mistaken in saying we have omitted all mention of shoes in the Bazar. We gave an illustration of boots and slippers in one of our earliest Numbers, and have more than once described the prevalent styles in the Fashion article. Notwithstanding the experience of your friend we are convinced that high slender heels will in time injure the shape of the foot and make the wearer walk ungracefully. A full dress boot for the street is made either of Grison's kid or of satin Français for $10 or $12. It is buttoned of course, the tops are scalloped and stitched with white, the heels of the French concave shape, not more than two inches high. The heel curves toward the centre of the foot, a fashion that at the first glance gives the impression of a short foot, but which spoils the symmetrical appearance by making the heel very prominent. Kid is preferable to prunella, as it is more elastic. A black boot is in good taste with any dress. Colored boots are too gay for city promenades. Bronze is very much worn. White kid, silk, or satin boots are used for full evening dress, buttoned with imitation pearls, and trimmed with blonde lace and silk braiding. The material of the dress, when of rich silk or satin, is made-up for party shoes. Plain kid slippers are made stylish by the addition of curved heels, and a large rosette that extends high up on the instep.

B. Y.—By pièce de résistance the French mean the more substantial dishes of a meal—namely, the joints of meat.

TWO SUBSCRIBERS.—The "safest time to go to Cuba" is between December 1 and February 1. The price of passage from New York to Havana is $60 in gold. Board at the best hotels $3 50 in gold a day. Railway traveling costs 5 cents a mile, and carriage hire is about 20 cents an hour. A person can with economy live and move about on the island of Cuba for $5 in gold a day.

X.—Madame de Pompadour has the credit of having invented the "dumb waiter," so that her têtes-à-têtes with Louis XV. might not be interrupted by the presence of a third person who could either hear, see, or talk. "At the petits soupers of Choisy," says Rogers, the poet, "were first introduced those admirable pieces of mechanism, a table and a side-board, which descended and rose again covered with viands and dishes."

R. J. S.—The glossy taffeta silks are not now fashionable, but we hear they are to be restored to favor. At present corded silks, known as gros grain, and poult de soie, are the first choice.

H. W.—Lord Chesterfield, who was considered in his day a judge of manners, particularly enjoined upon his son always to pay his own "scot," and not allow himself to be "treated." In England it is the practice of gentlemen to insist upon paying their share of a casual entertainment. The practice of "treating" so prevalent in this country is a bad one, fatal, we think, to good manners as well as good morals. We hope you may have the persistency of courage to continue your protest against it.

LOUISE.—These words: "Le ciel me prive d'une épouse qui ne m'a jamais donné d'autre chagrin que celui de sa mort."—God bereaves me of a wife who never gave me other cause for grief than her death," are generally supposed to have been uttered by Louis XIV. on the death of his queen. If they were, the grand monarch deigned to borrow them from the old and obscure poet Maynard. You are right in your high appreciation of the beauty of the sentiment and the nobleness of the words, which you justly say are worthy of a monarch's (ideal) lips.

MOTHER.—A flannel band of light texture, worn about the lower part of the body, is an excellent preventive of the prevalent diarrheas and other summer and autumnal ailments.

ANNIE F.—The exchange of portraits has lost much of its former significance since photography has made it so easy and common a practice. You need not fear "committing" yourself, as you express it, by giving your photograph to H— and asking his in return. This has become such an everyday affair that it means nothing more "serious" than that there is a vacant space in your album which wants filling.

M. N.—It is never safe in this latitude to leave open the window of the room in which we sleep. There is a story told of Franklin, who was a great advocate of what he termed the air bath. He and John Adams, while on their way as Commissioners of Congress to the camp of Lord Howe on Staten Island, put up at a hotel where they were compelled to sleep in the same bed. Before bidding each other "good-night" a warm discussion took place between Adams and Franklin as to the propriety of leaving the window open. Franklin, who strongly advocated it, carried his point, but in the course of the night Adams heard him get up slyly and close the window; for, as often occurs in our climate, the temperature had suddenly changed to an excessive coldness. These abrupt alternations of heat and cold render the practice of sleeping with the windows open very dangerous.

UNDER THE LIMES.

SHE sat beneath the linden trees:
Murmur of multitudinous bees
Was heard about.
She said, "A bee is in my hair;
And stings are things I can not bear:
Oh, take it out!"

"Lime blossoms in the summer-tide
To bees are sweeter," I replied,
"Than you can be.
A mere winged insect can not taste
Entangling hair, bewildering waist,
Which madden me."

CHAPTER VI.

FRAU MATHILDE'S TEA-PARTY.

FRAU MATHILDE VON SCHLEPPERS considered herself to be beyond question the leading character among the dramatis personæ of her somewhat limited society. Her self-importance was boundless. "We Von Schleppers are not rich," she would say, grandly, "but we are noble." It was true that the Justizrath was descended from the younger branch of a respectable old family. They could scarcely be termed "noble," but they had been gentlefolks time out of mind. Now the Frau Mathilde's papa had been court shoemaker in Hanover. The good lady would volubly discourse of the "dear Baroness This," or the "charming Countess That," giving odd little personal details about them that would seem to argue a great intimacy on her part with these aristocratic dames. But the fact was, she had never seen them out of her father's shop. People in Detmold, however, knew nothing about that; and it was so long ago that Frau von Schleppers herself seemed to have forgotten the true circumstances of her early life. She and her husband had endured many vicissitudes before coming to settle in Detmold. There fortune seemed inclined to smile upon them. The Justizrath gained a lawsuit for a member of the princely family, and in return received some courtesies from an illustrious personage. This circumstance fanned Mathilde's smouldering aspirations into flame. She gave herself airs of aristocratic hauteur, boasted of an invitation she had had to the Castle, and constantly reverted to the nobility of the Von Schlepperses.

At first some laughed, some sneered, some quarreled with her. But in the end many people succumbed to her assumption of superiority. To such as did so she took care not to be too civil—which caused a great many other people to succumb also. Meanwhile her husband, the Justizrath, steadily increased his connection, and established a reputation throughout the principality as being a sound, cautious, old-fashioned lawyer. By the time at which this story begins, Frau von Schleppers, if not altogether so great a woman as she fancied herself, was undeniably somebody in Detmold.

Liese's life in service had hitherto been fairly comfortable. Frau von Schleppers was reputed to be a difficult mistress to content. But Liese was humble, submissive, and constitutionally incapable of giving a pert answer. She had been well instructed by Hanne in all branches of domestic industry. And she had, moreover, an air of natural refinement and modesty which her mistress felt was creditable to the gentility of her establishment. But for a week following her interview with Otto poor Liese led but a sad life of it.

"Barmherziger Himmel!" exclaimed Frau von Schleppers, tragically; "to think of a young person in my employ tearing through the public streets in that indecorous manner!" And then she would treat Liese to a twentieth repetition of the severe lecture which she had pronounced on the day of that great misdemeanor. And it must be owned that circumstances had combined to aggravate Frau von Schleppers's wrath. When Liese had rushed against her mistress in the street the latter was not alone. She was walking with a new acquaintance, a hochwohlgeborne dame, the wife of a major in the Prince's service. And this was not the worst. The pink satin note-paper had been needed to write an invitation to this very lady, and to impress her with an idea of Mathilde's elegance in the most trifling details. But lo! the unhappy Liese, frightened, bewildered, taken by surprise, and trembling under her mistress's stern gaze, blurted out breathlessly that the pink satin paper could not be found in such a shop, but was at last discovered in such another—that she had purchased two sheets, for which she had not paid, but which she supposed could not come to more than a groschen—and adds, by way of averting her mistress's wrath, that she is very sorry to be so late, but that she had carefully set the cabbage-soup on the fire before coming away from home. Such a jumble of vulgarities was mortifying, it must be allowed. Cabbage-soup and elegant stationery, laid in a couple of sheets at a time!

When the major's high, well-born wife did come to tea Liese scarcely dared to meet her eye as she handed round the cakes and the bread-and-butter. There were two or three other ladies present, each with her little bundle of fancy-work; but the major's wife, Frau von Groll, was the bright, particular star of the party. She was a wizened, greedy little woman, who gobbled up the crisp tea-cakes at a terrible rate. But Frau von Schleppers did not care for that. She thought her tea-cakes well paid for when Frau von Groll, having devoured the last fragment of them, observed that those she had eaten the other evening at the Castle were not half so good.

"I'm not sure that I quite like the Castle tea-cakes myself," said Frau von Schleppers, musingly.

Liese, engaged in waiting on the ladies, did not find this kind of talk very interesting. She supposed it must be her rustic education which prevented her from enjoying it as the "quality" seemed to do. Presently her attention was attracted by the mention of a name which had been familiar to her in Otto's mouth—"Hermann."

"The Hermann's Denkmal."

"You have not seen it yet, I suppose?" said a bony spinster, addressing Frau von Groll. The speaker was a lady of undoubted gentility, who existed on an infinitesimally small pension, which she enjoyed in consideration of her late father's services in some office in the princely household.

"You have not been here long enough to have visited all the spots of interest around Detmold." "No," answered Frau von Groll. "I don't generally care about seeing places. In my own country—the so-called Saxon Switzerland—people make a great fuss about the scenery; but, for my part, I can't find it charming. When you are not clambering up-hill, you are sure to be scrambling down-hill; and what pleasure is there in that? I like a nice flat pavement, or neat gardens, such as those at the Herrenhausen Palace in Hanover."

"Ah, dear Herrenhausen!" sighed Frau Mathilde, plaintively and parenthetically.

"Oh, really!" rejoined the bony spinster, who was romantic. "I adore scenery. And the view from the Hermann's Denkmal is entrancing. Himmlisch schön! But then you certainly have to go up-hill for it."

"What is the Hermann's Denkmal?" asked Frau von Groll of her hostess.

"Well, it—it isn't any thing exactly, just now."

"Isn't any thing?"

"That is to say, it is only a sort of—of stone—what do you call it?—a thing that they put statues on."

"Pedestal," suggested the spinster.

"Yes, a pedestal. Only it's very big, and there are stairs inside; and you go up to the top, and the wind is awful there. Very few days in the year are there when it doesn't blow a gale up in the Grotenberg."

"There is to be a colossal statue of Hermann there some day," said the spinster, enthusiastically; "an heroic figure with a helmet and a drawn sword defying every body like this." And the Fräulein brandished a long knitting-needle above her head.

"Ach!" exclaimed a stout, placid matron, who had not yet spoken, "that will look terrible."

"Well," asked Frau von Groll, rather contemptuously, "and who was this Hermann of yours? I never heard of him."

Mathilde von Schleppers positively envied the major's wife as the latter made this cool admission. There was something in rank, after all, which gave one wonderful courage, she thought. The Justizrath's wife had often longed to ask "who was this Hermann of yours?" But she had not dared to confess her ignorance.

Then the spinster explained to the hochwohlgeborne lady that Hermann had been a hero and patriot, who defended his fatherland in arms.

"Humph!" said Frau von Groll, pressing her thin lips together. "A patriot who fought for fatherland, and they are going to put up a statue to him? That sounds to me rather revolutionary."

Frau von Schleppers shook her head solemnly, in a manner intended to imply that the same thought had given her many an uneasy moment.

"Oh, but," cried the spinster, "it was so long ago! And he fought against the Romans. Of course it would be very different now."

Liese, carrying away the tea-cups, wondered very much why it would be "so different now." She pondered over the question as she sat at her work in the kitchen, and resolved to ask Otto all about it the next time she should see him. When would that be, though? She had not hitherto dared to allude to the fatal pink satin note-paper. But now she remembered that it was not yet paid for, and she thought she would venture to ask her mistress's leave to go to the shop to discharge the debt. After all, it was a week ago, and the storm had pretty nearly spent itself, and the grudge Frau, the high-born major's wife, had been to tea, and nothing dreadful had happened in consequence of her (Liese's) ill-bred revelation about the cabbage-soup. Yes; she thought she would venture to ask.

Presently the Justizrath came peering into the kitchen to get a light for his meerschaum. He was a snuffy little old man whose clothes were too large for him, and he wore red slippers down at heel. The Justizrath generally spent his evenings at the Blue Pigeon in company with a few old cronies; but on this occasion he had been kept at home by some law papers which required close attention. He always wrote in what his wife called his study. It was a small, rather dark den, redolent of tobacco smoke, and littered with chaotic heaps of manuscript. Small as it was there was a stove in it, so that the Herr Justizrath did not, at all events, suffer from the cold there. But the bright glow of the kitchen fire was pleasanter than the dull, suffocating heat of the stove. Every thing in the kitchen was as clean as hands could make it—and cleanliness, like sunshine, has the power to beautify common things. And there sat little Liese, the fire-light playing on her soft brown hair and reddening the folds of her gray gown. She was industriously hemming a neckerchief—the real Manchester print neckerchief that Hanne had sent her—and her neat figure and modest face supplied a homely grace to this domestic scene. It was an interior such as Meissonier might have painted.

The Justizrath lit his pipe and sat down by the fire. Liese stood up respectfully, work in hand, but he took no notice of her. The Justizrath had the character of being very absent. He would look at you vacantly when you spoke to him, and answer wide of the mark. But three weeks afterward he was capable of correcting you in the minutest details of the interview, and of repeating your words letter by letter. He did not frequently choose to betray himself by doing so. It was convenient enough sometimes that people should behave in his presence as though he were a hundred miles away. But many were the unwary mice who had been terribly startled by the discovery that this motionless old Puss-in-Boots had been watching them unwinkingly with his half-shut eyes.

Liese sat down again after a while, drawing her chair away modestly into a corner, and stitching with downcast eyes. At first it made her uncomfortable to have her master sitting there silently staring at her out of a cloud of tobacco smoke. But by-and-by the feeling of shyness wore off. The Herr Justizrath wasn't thinking of her. No doubt his thoughts were busy with some of those wonderful law papers that she was forbidden to dust or move. Dear, dear, how clever and learned he must be to understand them all! And then she began to muse in a vague kind of way about the Hermann's Denkmal, and to wonder once more why it should be wrong and revolutionary to be a patriot nowadays. As she so mused her lips unconsciously formed the words, "I wonder."

"Eh?" said the Justizrath, sharply.

Liese knocked down the scissors by the great jump she gave, and her work nearly fell from her hand.

"Bitte, Herr Justizrath! I beg pardon," she stammered out.

"What's the matter?" asked her master, mildly. "Were you not saying something?"

"N—no, I—that is, I think I was thinking."

"Ah! So! You think you were thinking. Good. I think I was thinking too, but one never can tell."

There ensued so long a pause that Liese began to recover her composure. The Justizrath was so odd and abstracted. No doubt he had forgotten her very existence by this time. She ventured to glance at him timidly, and found his eyes fixed on a boar ham that dangled from the ceiling. But at the instant in which she looked he said, without removing his gaze from the ham, "What about?"

"What about, Sir?"

"What did you think you were thinking about?"

Liese blushed crimson. She felt very shy of discussing the subject of her meditations with the Herr Justizrath. But with her habitual obedient gentleness she answered, "About patriots, please, Sir."

This was by no means the kind of answer which the Herr Justizrath had expected. He prided himself on a great power of reading faces; and not less did he pride himself on the inscrutability of his own countenance. There had been a tender half-smile on Liese's downcast face which had induced him to watch it with some curiosity. But he certainly had not conjectured that the tender half-smile had been called up by thinking about "patriots." No trace of surprise, however, did he allow to appear in his wrinkled face, or in his dry, subdued voice. Herr von Schleppers was a man who had fought the battle of life in ambush, so to speak. His nature and his tactics were alike opposed to coming out into the open.

"Any special patriot, Liese, or only patriots in general?" he asked, gravely. Liese had no suspicion that she was being laughed at. Banter was a thing entirely out of her experience.

"I was thinking of Hermann, Sir."

"Ah! So! And is Hermann a patriot?"

Herr von Schleppers complacently supposed himself to have gained the clew to that shy, tender smile. Since Liese was a member of his household, it might be as well to know all about this Hermann. Sweet-hearts were inevitable evils; but a sweet-heart who was also a patriot might prove too troublesome. The Justizrath made a point of knowing all about every body with whom he had any dealings or relations in life. A large undertaking, one would say. But he fancied he accomplished it.

"Hermann," repeated Liese, doubtfully, "I—I—believe he's dead, Sir. He is renowned, I know."

"Oho! And you think people are never renowned until they're dead, eh?"

"Yes, Sir."

The Justizrath became interested. Liese proceeded, gaining courage as she saw her master's eyes still upturned meditatively, more as though he was talking to himself than to her.

"I know he fought for fatherland against the Romans; and that was right and good. There is the Denkmal on the Grotenberg that folks may remember him; but I was wondering—you know I am but an ignorant country maiden—I couldn't help wondering why it would not be right and good now."

"Now where the deuce did the girl pick up all this?"

That was what the Justizrath thought.

What he said was, "Ay, ay, indeed? Ach so!" and waited to hear more. Just then the door of the sitting-room up stairs was opened, and a sound of voluble and confused speech came forth. Above all other sounds, however, penetrated the shrill voice of Frau von Schleppers calling Liese.

"Oh, the ladies are going home, Herr Justizrath!" said the girl. "I must run and help them with their hoods and cloaks;" and she darted off.

When the honored guests were trooping down stairs they encountered the master of the house, pipe in hand, gazing confusedly from one to the other.

"Pardon, meine Damen," said he, bowing. The Justizrath's bow was peculiar. He always wore a mass of limp, and too often dingy, muslin round his throat, and when he bowed he merely stretched his neck so as to thrust his bald head a little way out of this envelope, and then drew it in again, in a way that reminded one irresistibly of a tortoise.

"Friedrich!" exclaimed his lady wife, with her most imperious air. "Now that is so like you! You bury yourself in your papers, and forget how time goes altogether. We wanted you among us this evening. Here is the Frau von Groll."

"Ach Himmel! I am so distressed! But you know I am a man of small leisure. There were all those papers in the affair of his Serene—I mean I have been very busy, meine Damen, very busy indeed."

"He is so absent," whispered Mathilde to her chief guest. "It is really terrible. But all these learned men are alike, I fancy. You will excuse the Justizrath on this occasion."

The ladies took their leave, and pattered home through the silent streets. As they went they observed to each other how henpecked the poor Justizrath was, and how much in awe he seemed to be of his wife. But in this opinion they were entirely mistaken, as it sometimes happens, even to our intimate acquaintances to be, in their judgments of us.

CHAPTER VII.

PRIVATE AND CONFIDENTIAL.

ON the day after Frau Mathilde's tea-party, Liese asked and obtained permission to go to Schmitt's shop and pay for the pink satin note-paper. Her mistress was in good-humor. Frau von Groll had paid handsomely for her tea-cakes in words which would pass current in Detmold "society," as being good for a considerable amount of deference. Besides that, the romantic spinster, Fräulein Bopp, had—not to be behindhand in politeness—compared Liese to a picture of Goethe's Gretchen which she had seen once in the private sitting-room of a member of the princely family. "You are like the dear Princess!" Fräulein Bopp had exclaimed to her hostess. "You love to surround yourself with the Beautiful! That maiden's face is ganz poetisch!" And Frau von Schleppers had professed that she thought she might venture to say she resembled her gracious highness in her absorbing devotion to the Beautiful. This profession had not been made in the presence of Herr von Schleppers; but even had he heard it, it would have caused no uncomfortable emotion in his breast. For did he not know full well how far higher a thing is spiritual beauty than any mere perfection of form? And, judged by this standard, his Mathilde doubtless deemed her husband's loveliness seraphic.

"Yes," said the Frau von Schleppers, in answer to Liese's application; "yes, child, go and pay for the paper, and bring me another ball of gray worsted for the Herr Justizrath's socks. And mind you have your hair neat and nice. People know by this time that you are in my service, so it is of some little consequence how you look."

Liese had not long departed on her errand when the Justizrath shuffled into the kitchen. His down-trodden slippers made a clapping noise on the stone floor, and caused his wife to look up in surprise. That excellent lady, who was too thorough a German not to be a good housewife, was engaged in peeling and shredding onions for the soup. She prided herself on her cookery, and really was never so happy as when she could cover her gown with a large apron and devote her energies to the preparation of the daily food. But mere happiness was not Mathilde von Schleppers's end and aim. Noblesse oblige!

The Justizrath shuffled into the kitchen and shuffled to the fire-place, and stood there warming his hands.

"Do you want any thing, Friedrich?" asked his wife. He made no answer, but slowly rubbed his wrinkled hands together over the red charcoal fire made up for cooking.

Mathilde was not a very acute woman, but she had been the Justizrath's wife for thirty years, and in the course of that time she had gained a very thorough knowledge of his disposition. She could not have made a psychological analysis of Friedrich von Schleppers's character, but she knew it in a dumb, instinctive way, as a dog knows the nature of his master. Mathilde was quite aware that her husband had perfectly heard and understood her question, so she did not repeat it, but went on shredding the onions, and occasionally wiping her eyes with a corner of her apron.

"What were you women talking about last night?" asked the Justizrath, presently, in his subdued, monotonous voice.

"Lord, Friedrich! I don't know, I'm sure. There was a pause."

"Well?" said the Justizrath, by-and-by.

"Well; let me see: Dear, how the onions make one's eyes smart! Frau von Groll said my tea-cakes were better than the tea-cakes at the Castle."

"Has she ever eaten or drunk in the Castle?"

"Oh yes, that she has! They're quite in the Court set, the Von Grolls. Why else do you suppose I asked them here?"

The Justizrath nodded gently. "Well, Friedrich; and it's true that Major von Groll is to be the new land-steward of the Prince's Detmold estates."

"Ah, yes," murmured Von Schleppers, abstractedly.

"But it won't make a bit of difference to you. All the law business will be left in your hands. The old land-steward was a sharp, prying fellow, who thought he could manage every thing himself."

"HAVEN'T GOT ANY," SAID THE CADAVEROUS BOY, IN A DESPONDENT TONE OF VOICE.

"Bopp was a good man of business, my dear, and very zealous for the Prince's interests. He thought he knew law, which was a mistake. But Bopp was a very good man of business."

"Ah, well; you'll be master now. See if I am not right."

In strictly private and confidential conversations Frau von Schleppers was apt to relax a little in the aristocratic majesty of her deportment, and to speak with more energy than dignity.

"Humph!" said the Justizrath, poking out his head from the muslin cravat, and then drawing it in again with the tortoise-like action.

"You'll see. Von Groll is as stupid as an owl. And he doesn't know a bit about the state of affairs here. His getting the appointment was all a matter of interest. He will have the salary and you will do the work. But then—you'll also have the power, Friedrich."

"Tut, tut, tut! What power? what power? Nonsense, nonsense!"

The Justizrath spoke quite sharply, and seemed genuinely displeased. He did not approve of such things being said, even in a tête-à-tête.

"Lord!" cried his wife, answering his thoughts though not his words, "who is there to hear? And if they did what matter? I should think you are the proper person to have the power, Friedrich. In our position it's only natural and fitting that we should help to take all trouble off the Prince's hands. He is away so much, and has so many occupations—and, besides, the well-born can always understand each other. As far as that goes I should hope that the Von Schleppers are as noble as the Von Grolls!"

"There's no question of being well-born or ill-born," said the Justizrath, testily. "I hope you didn't talk in that way last night."

"Why, Friedrich?"

But to this question her husband did not reply. There ensued so long a silence that Mathilde began to think her liege lord had extracted all the information he desired for the present. But after a while she felt that the catechism was not yet at an end. Von Schleppers said nothing, but he stood in an attitude of expectation, rubbing his hands over the fire, and turning his head sideways toward his wife.

"And then," she proceeded—"and then—oh dear me! how can I recollect every word? Fräulein Bopp was a good deal taken with Liese. She says she is like a picture of Goethe's Gretchen that she once saw in the Princess's private sitting-room. Do you think she is, Friedrich?"

"Let us hope so, my dear."

"Yes. It looks well to have nice-looking servants. I recollect the Countess von Stumpfenhausen, in Hanover—What did you say, Friedrich? Oh, about Fräulein Bopp! Well, she made up to Frau von Groll a good deal, and asked her if she had seen much of Detmold, and if she had been up to the Grotenberg to see the Hermann's Denkmal. I was vexed at the foolish, romantic kind of way that Fräulein Bopp talked in, for the major's wife didn't seem to approve of the Denkmal at all. But of course poor Bopp, though her father was about his late blessed Highness so much, has no noble blood in her veins. And that makes such a difference!"

"How does the girl seem to get on?"

"Fräulein Bopp?"

"No; not Fräulein Bopp, Mathilde. I think I know pretty well how Fräulein Bopp gets on, and has been getting on any time these thirty years. I mean the little servant-maid—what do you call her?"

"Ah, to be sure! Well, now, as to Liese—"

"Liese Lehmann."

Frau von Schleppers evinced no surprise at finding her husband quite well acquainted with the name he had just asked her to tell him, but went on:

"Yes; as to Liese Lehmann I have never had a fault to find with her but once, Friedrich."

Then Mathilde related to her husband the history of the pink satin note-paper, and of Liese's awkwardness.

"But," added the good lady, whose eyes and nose were by this time so inflamed as to give her countenance quite a pathetic expression, "after all, I don't think much of that. She is very rustic and untaught, but she is a creditable-looking girl, a good hand at pastry, darts a stocking the way I like, and we get her very cheap."

"No sweet-hearts?"

"Ach behüte! No, indeed! Not a soul has ever come to ask for her since she has been in the house, except a person who brought her a bundle of clothes from Horn."

"What sort of person?"

"Rather a presuming person, I should say. Decently clad, certainly, but a common fellow. Came ringing at the front door instead of going round to the back yard."

"I think that sounds rather like a patriot," muttered the Justizrath.

"What, Friedrich?"

"I say that if he comes again I should like to see him. The girl is under our protection, and we are bound to look after her."

"I'll look after her, never fear!" said Frau von Schleppers, majestically. Then she knew that the catechism was over; for, although the Justizrath stood for some minutes longer warming his hands, he turned his face toward the fire and paid no further attention to his wife. Meanwhile Liese, having duly executed her mistress's commission respecting the gray worsted, tripped at as fast a pace as she dared toward Herr Schmitt's shop in the main street. There was no one in the shop when she entered it, but on tapping on the counter a boy appeared—a boy with a pale, long face and his jaws bound up with a black silk handkerchief. Liese had made so sure of seeing Otto that this cadaverous apparition startled her, and she stared at the boy for a moment unable to speak.

"I—I—want to know, please—how much—what is the price of pink satin note-paper?" she stammered out at length.

"Haven't got any," said the cadaverous boy, in a despondent tone of voice.

"No; but I want to—to—pay for it."

"I didn't expect you thought you'd get it for nothing!" retorted the boy, gloomily.

"No; but I did have some last week, and I want to pay for it. How much is it, please?"

"I don't sell it you; and, what's more, I don't believe there is any in the shop."

"Oh, indeed there is! I bought some; two sheets and two envelopes. Ask Herr Schmitt, or—or the other gentleman."

"Herr Schmitt's ill in bed, and the other assistant is out. I tell you what it is, you'll have to come back again. I don't know what the paper costs. It may be two kreutzers or it may be four. I ain't going to name a fancy price, and get myself into trouble to oblige you. I haven't been here more than ten days, and you can't expect a chap to get a whole shopful of things by heart in that time. Specially if he's subject to the toothache."

"I'm very sorry," said Liese, gently. "I'll call again the next time I go by."

"Yes," said the cadaverous boy, a shade less gloomily; "it won't be any trouble to you, you know."

"Would you mind telling Otto that I think I can come on my way from the market to-morrow morning?"

"Telling who?"

Liese blushed crimson. "The assistant: I know him. Say Liese Lehmann, please."

As she left the shop she encountered her master walking at a brisk pace up the street. Contrary to her expectation, he recognized and stopped her.

"Tell your mistress, little one," said he, "that I shall not be at home until to-night, at all events, and perhaps not until to-morrow morning. Business will take me to Horn."

"Oh!" cried Liese, and then stopped short.

"Ay, ay," said the Justizrath, benevolently; "that's your home, isn't it? To be sure—to be sure. Your father and mother live there, eh?"

"Not quite in Horn, Sir, but just outside it. You pass the farm going to Horn from Detmold. And they ain't my father and mother, Sir, but my cousins. My poor mother's cousin, that is, and they adopted me. I beg your pardon, Sir."

Liese added the last sentence timidly, for the Justizrath's attention was apparently far removed from what she was saying, and he was absently forming letters on the pavement with the point of his walking-stick.

"Eh?" said he, looking up when she had ceased speaking. "Ah! No doubt;—no doubt, my good girl." And then he walked on, getting over the ground more quickly than one would have given him credit for, looking at his awkward, shuffling pace. As he passed Schmitt's shop he looked in and beheld the cadaverous boy seated behind the counter with his head resting on his hands, and a sheet of colored prints spread before him.

"That isn't the patriot," said the Justizrath to himself, with a transient grin. "No, no; the patriot must be the gentleman who rings at the front-door bell. I shall hear of him in Horn."

NELLY.

ONLY a little child,
Who sings all day in the street,
Such a tuneless song
To an idle throng,
Who pity her shoeless feet;
A poor, pale, pretty child!
With clothes so ragged and mean,
And a wild weird face,
On which ne'er a trace
Of childhood's joy can be seen.

Out in the damp, wet fog,
Out in the sleet and the rain,
Out when the cold wind
Sends its blast unkind
Through her again and again;
Out in the dreadful night,
By the hinge of the tavern door,
In hope as she sings
Of the pity that flings
Some pence on the beer-stained floor.

Mothers who pass her by Shudder with terrible fear,
Praying her fate may Never be some day
That of their little ones dear;
Children who hear her sing
Stare at her features so wild,
O'er her life ponder,
Thinking with wonder
"What, can she too be a child?"

Out in the damp, wet fog,
Out in the sleet and the rain,
Out when the cold wind
Sends its blast unkind
Through her again and again.
Brought up in Satan's school,
Hell's abyss falling in;
Is there no pity
In this great city
To save her from shame and sin?

THE HOUSEHOLD ANGEL.

By FITZ HUGH LUDLOW.

CHAPTER XIII.

As Derrick Dalmager had said of Suggs, he was a man that knew every body's business. One of the shrewdest men in the county, he had been surprised when Derrick's companion, after coming to his house with her seemingly dead child, had been compelled to ask his wife for the loan of one of her own dresses before she could appear at the Dalmager estate, and forthwith putting his several data together, arrived with tolerable correctness at the facts of the case. He bore a lifelong grudge against the Dalmagers—both on account of a land dispute with Derrick's father, and because his favorite daughter years ago had been ruined by that grand-seignior, Derrick himself. When now, watching keen-eyed from his wagon, he saw the long mediation by which Lily had prepared her father to receive her mother, instead of that instant rush into his arms, which would have been inevitable at such a critical time to any loyal wife, he made up his mind that Derrick had run away with Mrs. Kearney; and, furthermore, contrived this Lynch trial to get Cuthbert out of the path of his nefarious triumph. Having neither Lily's tact, nor the motives which led her to send people away before she spoke of her mother's case, after tying his horses he went among the crowd and spoke his mind with unlimited freedom. Feeling the reaction of their disappointment, they were glad enough of any stimulus in the way of a sensation which should replace the disproved murder, and listened to Suggs with eagerness and indignation. Gradually they could be seen, gathered in little knots under the trees, with flashing eyes, wildly gesticulating hands, and vociferating voices.

The reunited three still sat in the wagon, with too much that was all-absorbing of their own to pay any attention to the mob, when Perro and Jim came running up with old Seibert's cash-box, which they had kept their eyes on ever since its discovery.

"De fellow wasn't gwine to give it to us, Mass' Cuthbert; but I spoke to some white gentlemen—dey made him take it out of his coat (reckon he was faincin' to stole it), and tunc us to bring it to you."

"Oh yes!" said Cuthbert, with a strange sensation at being called again to attend to worldly affairs. "I'd forgotten all about it. Perro, run up to my desk and bring down a bunch of keys on a red cord that you will find there."

"I wonder why the crowd don't go?" said his wife. "The kind old man that brought us here seems to be going around among them every where, and wherever he goes he talks, and they look so excited. What can he be saying?" And with a troubled glance she dropped her veil once more.

Perro ran every step both ways, and after about five minutes' absence brought back the keys to Cuthbert. He instantly found the peculiar, old-fashioned one belonging to the cash-box, and opening it, began examining the contents.

Imprimis—A short will, made before Seibert Kearney left Massachusetts, witnessed by friends there, and showing that thus early relintings had entered a heart too proud to acknowledge them, by leaving to Cuthbert unreservedly the entire estate of which he should die possessed.

"Poor father!" said Cuthbert, with a sad smile. "He did not know how little that would be. I suppose land speculations killed him—he was a rich man then. Why—what! really this is not so bad after all!" This he said because on lifting the will he found—

Second—a pile of United States bonds. He counted them with eyes opening wider every instant—Seventy-five Thousand Dollars!

"Oh, my darlings! Isn't God good? Two lives, riches, and new hearts to use them for Him—my heart's beloved, my little angel. I—saved—all saved—and this in one hour!"

The tears flowed down his cheeks so fast, as he said this, that he could not see to continue his examination till Lily and his wife kissed them away.

Third—a large file of mortgages. A gasp of astonishment almost took his breath away as he hurriedly glanced over their indorsements. They represented over a hundred thousand dollars more, lent on Kentucky real estate, houses in Louisville, and rich farms in other counties, to Derrick Dalmager's father! Old Reuben Dalmager had the name, when he died, of having largely encumbered his property by extravagance; but how, where, Cuthbert had never asked—knowing nothing, without this box, of his father as the creditor.

"And Derrick must have known of these things all the time!" he exclaimed, feeling as if he never again could put confidence in human honor. "Why, I have been working like a dog this whole year, thanking that man for every crust I ate, wondering at my over-large salary, while I took care for him of acre after acre which was all my own! You see I never thought of looking for mortgage records in any other county but this. He knew that on Genet's, and Baker's, and the Cherry Creek place, and I don't know how many other farms that I've managed, one-fourth of seven per cent. was lawfully mine every quarter; but he has let me go with my head and my heart bowed to the very dust all this time, and never paid me one cent. I can now foreclose and complete my title whenever I will. Oh, the wretch! No—God forgive me! I've forgiven him."

Fourth, a package of $100 New York bank-notes—$25,000.

Fifth, a moleskin wallet, with a ticket attached, bearing, in a feeble, cramped hand, the inscription, "For my boy's little girl, if I like her when I see her, to invest till she's married." This contained $20,000 more, in both gold and bills.

Sixth, an old ivory miniature and a gray curl, which moistened Cuthbert's eyes again, for they were his mother's.

Seventh and last—folded in a newspaper at the bottom of the box—a package of papers.

Cuthbert opened it, and—greatest astonishment of all—found it to consist of ten receipts for various large payments, the last being a receipt in full of all demands, dated just before the giver's death, for the Dalmager demesne—made to Cuthbert's and signed by Derrick's father.

Too astounded to utter the thanksgiving which their hearts paid God, Cuthbert sat clasping his wife and child to his bosom, when the crowd had bestowed upon them; but fifty to one is not a long fight, and he was now writhing like a lion in the coils of the hunter—dreadful even for an antagonist to look at, but able no longer to do harm. Two stalwart desperadoes pinioned each of his wrists, and as he had shown signs of using the wild beast's weapon, those magnificent, strong, ivory teeth of his, Old Suggs had undertaken the task of disarming him in this respect by winding his hand, close to Derrick's scalp, in his long and splendid mane of jetty hair. Whenever the baited victim, with a muffled roar of rage, gnashed on his captors as if he would tear their throats, the vindictive old man would give his locks a deliberate twist, which almost brought the back of his head between his shoulders, and whisper savagely, "That's to remember Lucy by! She asked for a lock of it when she was a-dyin'—used to be fond of it, she did; so am I!"

Earlier in the afternoon there might have been a general knife-and-pistol fight before Derrick was left thus in the hands of the mob; but now many of his friends had dropped off, ashamed of their part in the proceedings, and returned to Owlerville. Such were the men who boasted property and social position, and therefore felt at least a class sympathy for Derrick, which could not be expected in the ignorant and besotted "poor white trash" who remained. The small minority who had resisted Suggs at first, sullenly gave over the unequal conflict when they saw how unequal it was, and without resorting to the arbitration of arms, which must have resulted fatally for them in a concourse where the lowest were as well equipped as the highest, and recklessly drunk besides—thus deaf to every remonstrance, and ready for any enormity.

Finding his own efforts vain and himself powerless in the hands of the mob, Derrick suddenly felt a reaction from the violence of his rage, and for the first time in his life experienced fear. The sensation of those iron hands, the look of those pitiless faces, that steady, involuntary Cries of "Damn the law!" "Influential friends be damned!" "We'll show the bloody aristocrats!" "Down with that parson!" and "Bring out the rope!" showed Cuthbert that he was on the wrong tack.

"Then forget all responsibility but that to yourselves and your God!" he continued, raising his voice to a clarion clearness under the stimulus of a horror for Derrick which he had not felt for himself, as he saw the chafing throng of madmen and Derrick's agonized look at the fatal wagon, the sacrificial tree, toward which they were slowly surging him forward intolerant of the harangue.

"Ask yourselves how you shall answer this question when you lie on your own death-beds; when your own souls shall ask it of you, and your God is to ask it again in even less time perhaps than you are giving this man to prepare his response for all the sins of a lifetime. Ask yourselves what has he done that is worthy of death—that a man is ever killed for even by such a court as this. Ask, and knowing that you are men, not devils—I believe that you will not do this wrong."

"Oh, noble—noble Cuthbert—good—great husband!" whispered his wife in a dream of astonishment at a chivalrous magnanimity she had never read nor heard of in her life, as he sank exhausted in the wagon by her side. "Oh, Cuthbert, thank God that even through great tribulation He has opened my eyes! I believe you are the grandest soul that ever lived. Oh, can you forgive even me, and let me worship you?"

"Love me, wife, and my soul is satisfied!" he answered, tenderly pressing her to his heart.

Suggs let go Derrick's hair, and stepped out before all the crowd.

"Look ye, young man!" said he, in a voice of cold, deliberate wrath that was far more terrible than any sanguinary barkings of the mob. "You want an answer to that question? You?"

I should ha' thought ye'd be the last one to hev to be informed. But I'll tell ye if ye want to know why this here Dalmager's going to be hanged in about ten minutes. He come into a happy family, and promised marriage to the prettiest little gal that ever God sent to make an old man's home happy and close his dyin' eyes. He took her off to Louisville, and when she come back she come alone—goin' to be a mother without no weddin' ring on her finger; and he was gone to Paris, with plenty of money, to see the world for six years longer when he ought to have seen hell the night she ran away with him. She died with her dead baby on her breast, and the old man was left with an old wife that had broke her heart. Is that true, Devil's Derrick? Oh! ye don't know your name; but, ha! ha! they know it where you're agoin' afore sundown! But we don't want your witness. Here's Jack Sterrett—him that was engaged to that little gal—him that loved her, him that she loved—sweet and innocent as babbies till Devil's Derrick took her away from him—a poor man—only a small planter—but as honest a boy as the sun ever shined on. Is once more absolutely forced itself on their attention. The little knots of angry discussion once more coalesced into one excited, surging body, and pressed toward the wagon. The majority of the mob had brought its liquor along with it, and been drinking freely enough, ever since they reached the lawn, to intoxicate a score of them, and infuriate a majority of the rest. Suggs's story had come just in the nick of time to take advantage of their previous baffled fever-heat, and give society an object for the lofty moral indignation which it was bursting to pour out upon some victim's head.

"TO THE TREE! TO THE TREE!" SHOUTED FIFTY FIERCE VOICES.

"To the tree! to the tree!" shouted fifty fierce voices.

"No, no! Let go of him, d—n you!" cried a dozen.

"Let go!" was the reply, in a voice of sarcasm, from Old Suggs, who led the division which was rushing to the magnolia. "Yes, we'll let him go when t'other end o' this here rope's over that branch yonder."

"My God! whom have they now?" cried Cuthbert, in a voice of horror. His wife one moment stood up breathlessly on the box, the next, and with a scream, she fell almost senseless in the wagon. Cuthbert summoned all his strength to catch her, then tottered to his own feet, and saw, desperately struggling with his adversaries, Derrick Dalmager! His face was pale as death—his eyes wild with fury. His coat hung in tatters from his shoulders, and one shirt-sleeve had been torn off in his desperate effort to reach the bowie-knife which lay in a sheath hooked on to the crossing of his suspenders. For a few seconds he had fought successfully: half a dozen of his foes were examining and condoling over the presents which that brawny, naked arm march, which no bribe nor threat could slacken, toward the fatal tree—when he once fully realized his will's impotence, his friends' minority, and his own irrevocable fate—sent through his heart a shudder of anguish whose kind as well as degree was new in his life. His knees smote together—he gasped for breath, and but for his cruel supporters he would have fallen to the earth. His face, lately pale with rage, grew ghastlier through terror, and in an agony his white lips cried,

"Is there no man here to speak a word for me?"

Cuthbert heard him, and though faint with that awful experience of his own which had made almost a feeble old man of him in the last twenty-four hours, arose and stretched forth his hands to the mob:

"Gentlemen!" said he, forgetting the many deaths and worse tortures that he owed Derrick—rather paying the debt like a Christian nobleman—"Better, Men! Friends! Kentuckians! remember your honor—remember your State's—remember your manhood! For God's sake, wearing His image, do not this horrible wrong! You are not beasts nor devils—tigers disappointed of one victim's blood and raging till you find another to glut you. Even if it be ever right to take the law into your own hands, as you would have done with me—this is not a case in which such speedy punishment is ever wreaked—what has this man done that you should kill him? For God's sake ask yourselves that question now—even as you will ask it to-morrow when your blood is cool and the deed's done, when it's too late! As the law may ask it of you, and this man's influential friends ask it of you, calling to have the manner of his death examined at the legitimate tribunals."

that true, Jack?"

"It's God's truth—damn him!" replied a stern-faced young Kentuckian in the crowd.

"Then the old man laid for Devil's Derrick. He didn't know it—thought it was all hushed up and forgotten when he come back, just as it is under that plain flat rock in the church-yard, and in that heart of his that's rockier yet. But the old man was only layin' for a chance. He owed the Dalmagers money, and he couldn't be thrown into jail to rot out the few months that were left him, and leave his ole wife to starve as he would have done if he'd brought on a fight with Devil's Derrick then. So he waited till he'd scrimped an' scrimped an' saved the money and paid that debt. Then says he, 'T'other debt next! an' no dyin' till that's settled.' Good God! he couldn't have laid quiet in his grave."

"Bimeby Devil's Derrick crept into the family of a gentleman—lived with him like a brother—taught him to drink like a fish—pizened his wife agin him, an' one moonlight night ran away with her in boy's clothes, meanin' never to come back. But he had to come. God Almighty sent a little gal after him that was 'most made an angel—but not quite. When he found that he'd lost the woman he stole he come back where he'd done the mean, hellish, Dalmager trick, and, to make his theft good, set about gittin' the man he'd wronged out o' the way on a charge o' murder. Just as he'd almost done it up come the little gal that was 'most an angel and saved the man he'd wronged, and put him in the hands that had got t'other debt to pay. Is that all true, Mr. Kearney? Not a word to say for your client, heh? Here's another witness, boys. An' now yer question's answered—what's Devil Derrick done to be swung off that there limb in five minutes for?"

"Now I've got a question for ye all! When ye see a rattlesnake crawlin' in and out among yer hearths, never shakin' his cussed rattle to warn ye, but stingin' and stingin', and stingin'—murderin' you, and your wives, and your daughters in the dark—how long does it take ye to answer 'God' and 'Law' and 'yer own souls,' and all the preachers that ever asked a question? Not over two minutes an' a half. Derrick Dalmager! You found my daughter an innocent little gal—jest as innocent as that little gal in the wagon—you ruined her—you killed her. You found another woman that loved her husband when you come, jest as that little gal o' mine loved Jack Sterrett, and you took her away from him. When you had to confess beat, you come back and engaged in a conspiracy to kill him. What's to be done with sech a man as that for the safety o' mankind? Answer, all on ye!" roared the old man, in a stentorian voice to the crowd which had grown madder at every sentence of his speech.

And Derrick heard irrevocable doom thundering down on his guilty head in the one fierce howl of "Hang him!"

They bound him tightly and rushed him to the wagon as before a wave of the sea. His life-long reckless courage failed utterly in the moment that Cuthbert's nature, God-stayed, not self-trustful, had become calm as heaven, and, almost fainting, he was pushed upon the wagon rather than helped to climb it himself. Before the terrible onslaught Cuthbert and his wife were driven off—and retired too horror-stricken to speak, to a distance of several rods from the magnolia.

Not so went Lily Kearney. As Derrick Dalmager fell panting upon the bottom of the wagon the little girl put her arms around his neck and sat down in his lap, covering him with her body.

"Oh, dear Jesus!" she cried, lifting her loving blue eyes to heaven, "sweet Jesus, you have done so many, many things for me—please do this—save poor Uncle Derrick!"

"Take away that little gal!" shouted a man in the crowd. "It's no place for children."

"Yes, this is my place," answered Lily, with gentle firmness. "Mr. Suggs, I'd have been up in heaven with your little girl—your little Lucy you told about, if this weren't my place. I'd have seen her this afternoon if you hadn't been so kind to me and got mamma those hot blankets for me. Won't you please let me stay now? I can't go away! Jesus won't let me! He saved me—He helped you to save me so He could send me here."

"What's the matter, Suggs?" said Jack Sterrett.

"Yes, what's the matter?" cried others in the crowd. "Why don't you go on?"

Suggs stood perfectly dumfounded before the little girl, then the tears trickled down his rough, bloated cheeks, and, turning round to the crowd, he said,

"I can't get the little gal away—she talks just like mine—she says Jesus tells her to stay here."

Jack Sterrett came impatiently to the wagon, but the pleading little face with its bandaged brow so touched him that he could not unclasp her hands as he had meant.

"Mr. Sterrett," said Lily, as he stood bewildered and hesitating, "when you see Lucy again—won't you please tell her that you know where she is now she wouldn't want you to kill any body for doing her wrong—and that you were kind to a sick little girl and forgave this poor man for Jesus' sake? Please—please, Sir!"

And he likewise turned away, saying, "I can't do the job."

The crowd getting more and more impatient for somebody to do the job, pressed closer round the wagon and made as if any moment they might rush upon their victim en masse.

"Oh, please listen to me, dear men!" said the little girl, in a gentle, fearless voice, which all hushed their breaths to hear—"Jesus told us to love our enemies and forgive them. If Uncle Derrick has done any thing to be an enemy to any body, it's to Mr. Suggs and Mr. Sterrett and papa and mamma and me. We've all of us forgiven him, we won't hurt him, and Jesus will forgive him if he's sorry, won't you forgive him? Oh, please listen to me; I know Jesus will love to have you, and Mr. Suggs's and Mr. Sterrett's little Lucy in heaven will love to have you! I'm only a little girl and I can't say much, but I have been very near dead only so little a while ago that it seems almost as if I'd been close to heaven and looked in, and seen where dear Jesus forgives us all who've been much worse to Him than Uncle Derrick has to us—and I know it makes it so much more like heaven, and us like Jesus, if we forgive one another while we stay here. Oh, dear men, please do forgive Uncle Derrick then, for Jesus' sake!"

One rough cub, far gone in beastly intoxication, staggered forward as she ended, and, while the tears streamed from her eyes with the earnestness of her pleading, tried to pull her arms from Derrick's neck. This turned the scale in her favor. The assailant was taken by the throat and handed to the back of the crowd with a rapidity which almost sobered him. Jack Sterrett jumped up on the wagon and swore a tremendous oath that the first man who laid hands on Lily Kearney did it at the risk of his life. Several of the better men in the mob stepped out and came over to his side, which, though nominally that of chivalry to a lovely little girl, was in reality now the side of mercy. For a few moments the baser portion indulged their sanguinary feeling in sullen growls; but the influential men, and those who had any lingering claim to respectability, or sense of decency, were visibly moved in Lily's favor. Following their lead the crowd again broke up into little knots, and spent ten or fifteen minutes in consultation; then, one by one, saying, "We can't do it! The little gal is too much for us!" began to move away. Lily unbound the cords, and Derrick was saved.

The next morning he knew of the discovery of the cash-box and all which it revealed. At nightfall he was gone, never to return to Kentucky. All that belonged to him, after doing Cuthbert justice and paying his heavy sporting debts—a sum not exorbitant, but enough for a man of prudence and good habits—was forwarded after him to some address in the North known only to his lawyer. Cuthbert heard of him no more till the second year of the war, when a newspaper paragraph announced his death on board of one of the Union ships in the Gulf, where he had fallen nobly at his post, after bravely fighting the yellow-fever and saving multitudes of lives, during a three-months' struggle more terrible than any battle-field.

From the hour that Cuthbert's angel came back to him he abjured alcohol forever. Her life's one madness over, and the scales fallen from her eyes, Mrs. Kearney beheld in her husband, as she had said, "the grandest soul that ever lived"—loved him with an intensity compared with which her first love was but the passionless affection of babyhood—and became a wife whom he hourly thanked God for. And Lily, now a beautiful maiden of seventeen and the loveliest thing that blossoms on the banks of Garnet Run, continued and still continues to be the Household Angel.

THE END.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

IN 1858 the Ladies' Christian Union of this city was organized. One of the principal objects of this society was the founding of a Home for Young Women, where those who were without friends in the city, and obliged to labor for their own support, might have safe and comfortable accommodations at a moderate expense. A house for this purpose was first taken in Amity Street, and when a larger building became necessary, one was secured in Fourteenth Street. But a permanent Home was purchased and taken possession of last May, situated in Washington Square, corner of Macdougall Street. There those engaged in industrial pursuits find home comforts at moderate charges.

In Boston there is a similar Home for Young Women in Beach Street. The rooms are neatly furnished and airy, and the charge for lodging varies from sixty-three cents to one dollar a week, according to the floor. A restaurant is connected with the Home, where the lowest possible charges are made—three dollars and a half will cover expenses of board, lodging, and washing.

A Woman's Home has recently been established in Chicago, on West Jackson Street, near Halstead. It provides board and lodging at the moderate price of $3.75 per week, with the use of the library and reading-room, and the privilege of listening to lectures given each week at the Home by the clergymen of all denominations in Chicago.

The "oldest man" lives in Cincinnati. According to his own statement he is four hundred years old. He also was on intimate terms with Queen Elizabeth, whom he calls "Lib," he loaned Shakespeare five dollars, which the poet never repaid; and he presented Columbus with a bosom-pin just before his first voyage to America. This remarkable veteran resides, at present, in an insane asylum.

A Boston paper records a most startling development of the "eight-hour" system. An eight-hour-a-day man, on going home the other evening for his supper, found his wife sitting in her best clothes, on the front stoop, reading a volume of travels. "How is this?" he exclaimed—"Where's my supper?" "I don't know," replied the wife; "I began to get breakfast at six o'clock this morning, and my eight hours ended at two P.M."

In the Western States women have in many instances devoted themselves to agriculture, and shown a decided "tact" for the business. Women left widows have taken their husbands' farms, and managed them with great success. The Iowa Agricultural College, recently organized, admits young women to all its privileges; so also the Kansas Agricultural College.

The English law has made it a misdemeanor to use mineral colors in candies and sweetmeats, on account of their poisonous qualities. Vegetable colors are now used as substitutes, and these are harmless.

It is said that a large proportion of the canned fruit put into the market last year was put up before it was ripe. In order to be really nice, all fruit should be perfectly ripe; green peaches and tomatoes are not ripened or improved in flavor by the process of canning. Nor will any brand of canned fruit, which is not properly prepared, be long popular.

In connection with other interesting exercises on "Alumni's-day" at Yale was the presentation of the Silver Cup by the class of 1865. This cup is given in three years to the first boy-baby born to any member of the class after leaving college. He is called "class-boy." This year the cup was received by proxy, the little boy being too sick to be brought to take his honors, and his papa being in California. A college chum of the father received and took charge of the cup, which was an elegant one, manufactured to order in New York. It was in goblet shape. A babe within a branch of ivy served as a standard, the leaves of the ivy spreading around and supporting the base of the bowl. The usual class and college seals, the inscription, and a heavily-carved monogram ornamented four sides of the goblet.

A gentleman living near Middletown went a gunning on the Fourth of July near the banks of the Connecticut River. In his rambles he went too near a slope, and slid down forty feet or more. He thought at first that he was lost himself; but, making sure of his own safety, he next thought of his gun, which was covered and filled with sand. To his surprise he found the barrel polished up very bright. On investigation he discovered that he had fallen into a deposit of emery, and at the same time fallen into a fortune. He at once bought the land; and as emery is valuable, and the deposit is large, he may regard it as a very fortunate Fourth of July excursion.

According to an English journal there is quite a rage among young English girls for young men of dark complexions. Late, however, a young lady who had advertised that she "wished to meet with a young man of dark complexion" was sadly disappointed. She discovered, after "matters were arranged satisfactorily," that the young man was of African descent, and, though respectable and well educated, she objected to carrying "matters" further.

A bequest has been recently made to a Reformed Church in New Jersey on the singular condition that the church grounds should be kept free from Canada thistles and wild carrots. If the growth of foul weeds be permitted to any extent the legacy is to be forfeited.

The velocipede was invented by M. Drals, at Mannheim, in 1817. It has been used but little excepting in France; but it is predicted that its use may become general. A water-velocipede has been constructed by an architect of Paris, and has been successfully propelled on the Lake of Enghien, near Paris.

The Alaska Herald is a paper of eight pages, printed in Russian and American type and language, in parallel columns.

Although it is too late to try any novel methods of eating strawberries this season, it may not be amiss to be informed upon the subject, so that we shall be ready to experiment next June. It is stated that throughout Sicily it is the custom to eat strawberries along with sugar and the juice of oranges. The strawberries, a small kind, come to table without their stalks, are crushed with white pounded sugar, and the juice of an orange is squeezed over them. The result is a most fragrant and agreeable compound, much superior in the opinion of some to strawberries and cream.

SEWING MACHINES AT THE PARIS EXHIBITION.—"There seems to be considerable contradiction among the successful exhibitors as to the awards made in this department. The recipients of the two gold medals severally advertise that theirs is the only gold medal, thus contradicting each other; while all the other prize-holders concur that no gold medal was awarded to any sewing machine whatever. Happily, it is not our duty to decide this knotty question; but, be it as it may, the GROVER & BAKER SEWING MACHINES have received the very highest prize—above all medals—their representative in Paris having been decorated by the Emperor with the Cross of the Legion of Honor."

We find the above in one of our English exchanges, and transfer it to our columns with satisfaction. It is gratifying to find that the GROVER & BAKER MACHINE, which stands so high at home, should also receive the highest honor abroad.—N. Y. Express.

NORTHWESTERN MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY.

Central Office, 416 Main Street, Milwaukee, Wisconsin.

ASSETS.....	$ 4,000,000
MEMBERSHIP.....	25,000
POLICIES ISSUED IN 1867.....	10,000
RISKS COVERED BY POLICIES ISSUED IN 1867.....	20,250,000

THIS VIGOROUS COMPANY now ranks among the twenty-five New York Companies Third in number of members; Fifth in amount of assets.

IT IS A PURELY MUTUAL COMPANY, that is, an Association of Policy-holders managed by men selected by themselves, from themselves, for themselves. Thus all officers and members are alike interested. Each member is a FULL PARTNER IN THE WHOLE BUSINESS, WITH LIABILITY LIMITED TO THE AMOUNT ACTUALLY PAID IN.

It thus adapts its plans to the benefit of its members, adopts all real improvements, and aims to be

A MODEL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY.

It was one of the first to adopt the popular feature known in insurance circles as the NON-FORFEITING PLAN, and now APPLIES IT TO ALL THE POLICIES IT ISSUES.

IT IS THE ONLY COMPANY that adopts the full benefit of the note system without doing a credit business or destroying the cash principle, and also gives the note privilege to the poor man, who needs it most, and takes a small policy.

IT WILL LOAN A MEMBER a sum equivalent to the surrender value of his policy, and thus often helps a member in extremity to keep his policy in force. Policy-holders permitted to travel anywhere in the United States and Europe, but risks in the far South not sought.

OFFICERS:

LESTER SEXTON,.....	VICE-PRESIDENT.	HEBER SMITH,.....	GENERAL SUPERINTENDENT.
A. W. KELLOGG,.....	SECRETARY.	C. D. NASH,.....	TREASURER.
EDWARD ILSLEY,.....	ACTUARY.	DR. LEWIS McKNIGHT,.....	MEDICAL EXAMINER.

Why should Men Insure in a Western Company?

WITH MORE REASON IT MIGHT BE ASKED: WHY SHOULD THEY INSURE ELSEWHERE?

NOT FOR GREATER SECURITY, CERTAINLY, for it will not be denied that money can be as safely invested at the West, where property is rapidly enhancing in value, as elsewhere; nor will it be claimed that as honest, capable, and efficient managers can not be found here.

NOT FOR GREATER CHEAPNESS; for the premiums are the same, or lower than the average of companies at the East, while the more rapid accumulations at the West, on equally safe investments, together with the acknowledged low rate of mortality, promise as large or larger dividends.

But there are Positive and Weighty Reasons prompting to the Patronage of THIS Company.

1. The rapid accumulation at the West. This more constant investment, with equally good security—is for people can afford to pay more for it than in the older States.

The advantages of such investment to the company (which means all the insured) appear in the following startling figures:

One Thousand Dollars Loaned for Fifty Years,

AT 6 PER CENT., COMPOUND INTEREST, PRODUCE.....	$18,420 15
AT 8 PER CENT., COMPOUND INTEREST, PRODUCE.....	46,901 61
AT 10 PER CENT., COMPOUND INTEREST, PRODUCE.....	$117,390 85

2. Its risks are chiefly in the healthiest portion of the country, and its rate of mortality consequently low.

3. All its profits are equitably divided among its policy-holders.

4. It combines the advantages of both the cash and note systems, making the payment of premiums easy and equitable by loaning to the SMALL INSURER AS WELL AS THE LARGER just so much of the premium as is secured by the "value of the policy" itself, and no more, thus really confining its business to the cash plan.

5. A member who has paid his premium in cash for a number of years, may, if circumstances require it, pay subsequent premiums wholly in notes until the amount of the notes equals the "value of the policy," or may at any time borrow of the company the "surrender value of his policy," and thus, frequently, save his policy from lapsing, or help himself over some temporary difficulty.

6. The FIRST payment secures its proportionate share of a ten-year policy.

7. Its dividends, made annually, commencing three years from the date of the policy, are not arbitrarily fixed, but are mathematically calculated with great care so as to give to each member the equitable portion of the surplus.

8. The reversionary insurance purchased by the dividends, and once issued, is not forfeited by non-payment of premiums on the policy.

9. ALL its policies are NON-FORFEITING.

10. In short, the company aims not to take advantage of its members or of their misfortunes, but to conduct its business on the basis of the strictest equity and an enlarged liberality.

Summer Hats.

ITALIAN STRAW HAT.—This pretty hat is trimmed with a scarf of white tulle, the ends of which are finished with white blonde lace. The edge of the hat is finished in the same manner. A wreath of leaves encircles the front of the hat and completes the trimming. The ends of the scarf are loosely knotted behind.

BRUSSELS STRAW BONNET.—The trimming of this bonnet consists of folds of brown satin, brown blonde lace, and daisies. The strings are of brown ribbon brocaded with daisies, and loosely caught together under the chin.

BROWN NEAPOLITAN BONNET.—Trimming of green crape, green ribbon, and roses, and a spray of buds and leaves.

ENGLISH STRAW BONNET.—Trimming of lilac velvet ribbon and marguerites. Strings of lilac silk ribbon, fastened under the chin by means of a velvet bow, and trimmed with grelots and small loops. Grelots likewise encircle the edge of the bonnet in front.

BLACK STRAW TOQUE.—The broad revers is covered with black velvet, and the upper edge is edged with a row of small feathers. The rest of the trimming consists of a scarf of black tulle and an aigrette of pheasant feathers set on the front just above the revers.

TALL AND SHORT WOMEN.

GRACE DARLING, the light-house heroine, was tall. So was the Countess Isabella, who so stoutly held her castle against the besiegers, and foreswore the ministrations of all washerwomen until her beleaguered stronghold was relieved. Marie Antoinette, if we are to trust Paul Delaroche's picture, was tall; so was Mary Queen of Scots, and they both died heroically. Elizabeth had pluck enough for the whole 88th regiment, and I doubt not would have fought Philip II. and the Duke of Alba single-handed, had they landed at Tilbury Fort. Flora Macdonald was a lassie of considerable inches; the electioneering Duchess of Devonshire was tall; so was Queen Caroline, who, whatever may have been her morals, certainly fought a good fight against George IV. But I hold the tall heroines to be exceptional; and when we have all humanity to deal with, the exceptions are relatively numerous. I adhere to the Little Women. Boadicea, you may depend upon it, was short. Zenobia was not of exorbitant stature. Her most gracious Majesty Queen Victoria is no giantess. The Princess of Wales is not colossal. Patti is diminutive, and Lucca quite a Lilliputian. So was Jenny Lind; so is now Madame Goldschmidt. Miss Nightingale is slight and slender; and where could you look for a more delightful Little Woman than Mrs. Keeley? I grant your exceptions; but for every ten tall heroines you bring me I will cap them with a hundred little ones.

COUSIN ALICE.

AND so you're married, caught at last;
Well, here's your health, my dainty cousin!
You jilted me, but what of that?
I'm only one of half a dozen.

"Poor," that was it; ah, bitter word,
It seems but yesterday you spoke it;
I trust he wears a decent coat,
And has a shilling in his pocket.

I hope he brings what love demands,
And keeps you, proud one, in a palace.
I always was a graceless dog,
A useless fellow, cousin Alice.

I never had the knack to please,
My ways were not genteel—unsteady;
I had no chance with men of taste
To win, in sooth, so fine a lady.

And yet, who knows, I might have grown
Less wayward and a shade more tender;
I might have soften'd in the light,
Fair coz, of your bewitching splendor.

I might have learn'd in time, perchance,
To ape the fashionable graces,
Or found delight in lisping tongues
And laughing eyes and sunny faces.

But there, I'll turn it to the wall—
The face I worship'd madly, blindly,
Nor wear withal so poor a heart
As breathe a word of you unkindly.

I'll think you might have loved me yet,
Had fortune placed me in your station,
Or had I been a worthier man,
And, cousin, not "a poor relation."

I'll think—or better still, forget,
Nor wrong you with a thought of malice;
May peace and joy and bliss be yours,
And love and sunshine, cousin Alice!

PLAIN-SPOKEN PEOPLE.

THERE are certain people who take credit to themselves for seeing through all the illusions of life, and tearing away every veil of gauze which individual fondness or social propriety may throw over the ugly and painful. These run a muck through society, attacking all its cherished deceptions however innocent and harmless. They would make a clean sweep of all the phantasms of the imagination, put to flight the airy creations of the fancy, and dispel the cloudless visions of dreamland. They would not that man should ever forget his primitive constitution of dust and ashes. With the least tendency heavenward before his time they tug him to earth at once.

These impertinent realists are the great destroyers of human happiness. They begin early, continue long, and never cease until the end of life. A mother's tenderness even can not soften their hard-hearted positivism. They will rudely blur the maternal vision of her child's beauty with the unwelcome assertion that it is ugly. "All babies are ugly," is a favorite proposition of these plain-spoken people. This may be a fact in natural history; but it is something that was never dreamt of in the philosophy of the mother to whom the ugliest child is most beautiful. In fact, as there are no absolute laws of beauty, there is no reason why the maternal fondness should not be accepted as the test in regard to the looks of her own infant. No indifferent person has the right to an opinion contrary to that of her who is so deeply concerned. A polite concurrence is the duty of every civilized being. Politeness, however, is never recognized as an obligation by the plain-spoken people, of one of whom we recollect an incident, strikingly illustrative of this statement. A fond mother was displaying her first-born to a circle of her husband's friends. Among these there chanced to be a plain-spoken person of the plainest kind. Every one but he hastened to utter the compliment appropriate to the occasion. He kept what he had to say until the mother had been warmed to the highest point of maternal vanity by the intense expressions of admiration of all but him, when he deliberately dashed upon her his bucketful of cold water. "Your baby, Madam," said he, "reminds me of a flat-headed Indian." The comparison, it is true, was not inappropriate. As for the suitability of the remark to the occasion we leave it to all tender mothers to decide.

These plain-spoken people have the audacity to declare in the face of every boy that there never was such a person as Robinson Crusoe or his man Friday, and that Jack the Giant-Killer is a myth. Boys fortunately have a sturdy faith, sustained by a young and vigorous imagination; and they are generally proof to the unwelcome and improbable verities of plain-spoken people. It is, however, none the less cruel to torment the youthful credulity with the uncertainties of doubt.

Never invite a plain-spoken person to dinner, for he will be sure to detect the Newark cider in your Champagne bottle, and announce the fact before the whole company. Don't trust in his presence to the delusion of a wig, or confide in the artifice of a hair-dye, for he will penetrate the deceit, and expose you in all the baldness and grayness of age. After death, let not your family invite him to your funeral, for he will tell all your failings to his companion as he walks to your grave.

Plain-spoken people perhaps have their good side also. They are quick to detect every sham, and may serve as correctors of false pretension. If they would confine their detective propensities and their public denunciations to all the false shows of wealth, gentility, benevolence, and religion, we might wish them God-speed. While, however, they continue to run a muck at all the innocent illusions of the imagination and the heart we shall keep our doors closed, and ourselves, if possible, secure from the shock of all "plain-spoken people."

DAINTY FEEDERS.

MANY of our over-refined dames seem to have adopted Lord Byron's notion, that eating is unbecoming to woman. It is a marvel how some of them manage to keep body and soul together with the apparent regimen of starvation to which they subject themselves. To see them at table you would hardly think them capable of the solitary pea to which Beau Brummell confessed. "Do you eat vegetables?" he was asked. "I once ate a pea," was his answer. Our delicate dames have in reality reduced themselves to the fabulous abstemiousness of the single blade of grass to which the old woman had gradually brought her cow.

At the regular repasts of the day the would-be genteel woman never seems to be hungry. She takes her place at the table apparently only as a matter of form, and handles her knife and fork with the same lackadaisical air of indifference as she would her painted fan at the Opera. She may possibly sip a spoonful of soup, or swallow an occasional crumb of bread, to pass the time; but of the substantial of beef and pudding she does not take enough to "choke a daw withal." Breakfast, dinner, and tea are no better than so many Barmecide feasts as far as she is concerned, and she might as well, for all she apparently eats, take her seat at the illusive board of Sancho Panza in Barataria.

It is hardly the genteel thing, perhaps, but we shall nevertheless venture to say to our lady friends, as Petruchio said to Katharine: "I know you have a stomach." Granting the fact of the possession of this important organ by women, we do not see why the genteel of them should be ashamed of acknowledging it, and frankly doing what may be necessary to secure it in all its integrity. There is only one way of doing this, and that is filling the stomach at regular periods with plenty of wholesome food.

In former times the most distinguished and refined of women were hearty feeders, and, without any of the sneaking delicacy of modern days, made no scruples of handling a vigorous knife and fork before the whole world. Queen Elizabeth and her maids breakfasted on great rounds of beef, washed down with full tankards of strong beer. "My lord and lady," records an observer of the habits of the Earl of Northumberland and his Countess, "have for breakfast at seven o'clock a quart of beer, as much wine, two pieces of salt fish, six red herrings, four white ones, and a dish of sprats." The Duchess of Orleans, the mother of the famous Regent, while in the full enjoyment of the luxury of Versailles, in the time of Louis XIV., wrote: "A good dish of sour-kraut and smoked sausages is in my opinion worthy of a king, and there is nothing preferable to it; a soup made of cabbage and bacon is more to my taste than all the delicate kickshaws they make so much of here." It is not astonishing that there were strong women in those days, such as the stout wife of a Duke Ernest of Austria, who could crack the hardest nut with her fingers, and drive a tenpenny nail home with her fist. And the Duchess of Orleans was wont to follow the hounds from morning until night, had been in at the death of more than a thousand stags, and had many a serious fall. "But," she says, "of the twenty-six falls from my horse that I have had I have been seriously injured but once." Such was the toughness engendered by sour-kraut, smoked sausage, and cabbage-soup!

There is very little doubt that much of the debility and disease so common among the women of our day is due to this genteel squeamishness in regard to substantial food. It is not that they absolutely starve themselves to death, for many of the most abstemious at the open dinner are the most voracious at the secret luncheon. Thus that fastidious dame, whose gorge rises before company at the sight of a single pea, will on the sly swallow cream tarts by the dozen, and caramels and chocolate-drops by the pound's weight. Women should know that health is not possible with a daily glut of bouillons and pastry, but that physiology teaches, and experience confirms, the necessity of a various and substantial diet, such as is supplied at the three regular meals of a well-ordered household. Let our dames get over their false shame of a vigorous use of the social knife and fork, and learn that in rejecting publicly beef and pudding, and devouring confectionery privately, they are in reality gross and not "dainty feeders."

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

Touching Neo-Platonism.

MY DEAR LAURA,—I beg your pardon sincerely, but I could not help hearing, and as I am so old a man, and have so hearty a regard for you, what is the harm? I was standing in the shadow, looking in upon the enjoyment of the young folks, when you and Harry passed—so much absorbed in each other that you could not be easily conscious of any one else, and I heard him say,

"Well, at least we may have a Platonic friendship."

I did not hear what you replied. I do not know that you replied at all, for I turned so suddenly, and in turning revealed myself—of which, indeed, I was very glad—that you both became silent and quietly walked away.

The truth is, that the words I heard Harry speak reminded me of all that I had observed in your intercourse, and not without pain, for Harry is not a youth whom I can wholly, nor even very much, approve. And his tone, his manner, and your evident pleasure in his preference, have made me very serious; so that when my friend Peter Paul Pry has said to me, upon observing you, "How pretty and pleasant is the cooing of doves!" I have remarked to him, "Yes; unless you fear that only one of them is a pigeon."

I did not hear what you replied to Harry, but I have very little doubt of what it was. Whatever words you may have used, your meaning was that a Platonic friendship is a very sweet and agreeable thing. My dear, you are not the first who has thought so and said so—and the believers in that doctrine have usually paid the penalty of a very sudden and severe suffering. I heard no more of your conversation; but Harry is by no means the only Neo-Platonist. The school is old, and the scholars are all alike. I know what he said, precisely as if I had heard him. For why should I deny, my dear Laura, what ought indeed to give greater weight to my words, that in other days I, too, have walked in those groves of Academe? It was the advice of the old poet that if you would write truly, you must look into your own heart. If I would know what Harry said, I have but to look into my own heart and remember. You and he loitered along that piazza, and an ancient apple-tree was in blossom as you passed. Dear child, the same pink flowers—so much the same that no one could distinguish—bloomed upon that tree how many years ago! And there is no more difference between you and Harry and the lovers of twenty years ago, who used to whisper in that same shadow, than between those apple-blossoms.
